care in so doing. But the law does not make the appellee an insurer in such case that such surgeons, doctors, or nurses will be guilty of no negligence, want of care or skill, or of error in judgment. The liability to mistakes in judgment of the efforts or means used in the endeavor to effect a cure or causing a union of broken ribs, or even in the determination of the dislocation thereof, are incidents of such injury, and when such mistakes occur (the injured party using ordinary care) the injury resulting from such mistakes, if any, is, in law, regarded as one of the immediate and direct damages resulting from the injury." Likewise, in Chicago City R. Co. v. Saxby (1904) 213 Ill. 274, 68 L.R.A. 164, 104 Am. St. Rep. 218, 72 N. E. 755, the defendant in an action for damages for personal injuries claimed that the diseased condition of the plaintiff's knee, for which she sought to recover, was not the natural and ordinary consequence of the injury received, but was the result of improper treatment by the plaintiff's physicians. The court, holding that the defendant was responsible for the entire injury, said with reference to the plaintiff's duty to secure competent medical aid: "All the law required was that she exercise such prudence as men and women of ordinary judgment, under like circumstances, would exercise in the choice of physicians and the means to be used to effect a recovery. She was not an insurer, bound to act at her peril, and if she exercised reasonable care in selecting her physicians and in the employ of other means for her recovery, if her physicians made a mistake in the treatment applied by them to her, or the means employed failed to effect a cure, then she may recover for the entire injury which she has sustained." So, in Variety Mfg. Co. v. Landaker (1907) 227 Ill. 22, 81 N. E. 47, the court held that the trial judge was fully sustained by the authorities in charging as follows, as to the right to recover additional damages for an aggravation of injuries caused by the unskilful treatment of attending physicians: "A should produce the death, either in whole or in part. If there be gross neglect or manifestly improper treatment, either in preventing or in aiding the fatal effects of the injury, the death of an injured person is not homicide by the party who inflicted the original injury." By way of illustration, a hypothetical case of manifestly improper treatment, where death was the result of the wound and not of the treatment, was stated, in which B., who had sustained a knife wound from A., severing a small artery, is treated by a surgeon who, instead of attempting to stop the flow of blood, administers chloroform and leaves B. to bleed to death. This, the court pointed out, would be homicide under the common law, but not under the Texas statute. The phrase, "gross neglect and improper treatment," as used in the statute, was interpreted as meaning not only acts which destroy life, but such "as allow, suffer, or permit such destruction of life." Thus, where it appeared that, in the treatment of a knife wound inflicted by the accused on the temple of the deceased, the attending surgeons were guilty of gross negligence in making incisions in the back of the skull, which were of themselves perhaps mortal, when with proper treatment the deceased would have had a chance to recover, the court held that the accused was not guilty of homicide.

In Brown v. State (1873) 38 Tex. 482, wherein the accused, on trial for murder, produced evidence of malpractice by the physician in attendance on the victim, the court held that the jury should be instructed that the accused could not be found guilty unless they were satisfied that the death was the result of the wound, and not of the malpractice of the physician. And, commenting on the statute, the court said: "Our law undoubtedly changes the rule of the common law, the theory of which was that he who caused the first injury should be held guilty, upon the theory that without the first injury no other would have followed, as resulting from the first."

And in Johnson v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 288, 65 S. W. 92, where the accused in a prosecution for murder alleged that the death of the deceased was the result of improper treatment and neglect by the attending physician, and that the wound of itself was not sufficient to cause death, the court held that the failure of the trial judge to charge affirmatively that if the wound was not necessarily mortal, but the deceased had died as a result of improper or neglectful treatment, the accused would not be responsible for his death, was reversible error.

In Sartin v. State (1907) 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 571, 103 S. W. 875, the court held that it was correct to instruct the jury in a prosecution for murder as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant . . . did shoot the [deceased] as charged, but you further find from the evidence that there has been gross neglect or manifestly improper treatment of said [deceased] by any one or more of the physicians or persons attending him, between the inflicting of the wound and his death, which improper treatment or neglect, if any, caused the death of the said [deceased], then you cannot find the defendant guilty of taking the life of the said [deceased]."

And, where the evidence in a prosecution for murder suggested that the death may have resulted from the improper treatment of the attending physicians, the court held that the failure of the trial court to charge that, "if the death of the deceased was brought about by improper treatment or gross neglect of the physicians, he would not be guilty of the homicide," was reversible error. McMillan v. State (1910) 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 525, 126 S. W. 875.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Renville County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ryerson & Rodsater for appellants.

Messrs. J. E. Bryans and E. R. Sinkler for respondents.

This action comes before us for a trial de novo, and is brought to set aside a fraudulent conveyance. On the 3d day of May the plaintiffs recovered a judgment against the McCormicks for the sum of $1,-140.25.

The indebtedness on which the judgment was founded grew out of the sale of an abstract business by the plaintiffs to the defendants on September 8, 1911, for $4,100, payable in monthly instalments of $50, and the action was brought on the instalments then due and unpaid. The transfer, which is sought to be set aside, was made by the McCormicks to the defendant W. A. Overing, the father of Mrs. McCormick, on the 10th day of April, 1914, and on the day of the commencement of the action on which the judgment was obtained. The trial court found the issues for the plaintiffs, and "that the said deeds were executed and the land transferred wholly and voluntarily without consideration, and with the sole intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiffs in the collection of their claim, and to hinder, delay, and defraud all of their creditors, and that the said W. A. Overing, defendant, accepted and received such debts, and the transfer of such land, with full knowledge of all of such fraudulent intent, and with the full and sole intent on his part to assist the said L. J. McCormick and Luina M. McCormick in their fraudulent purpose." After a full argument and a thorough examination of the record, we are constrained to affirm this finding, and nothing would be gained by relating the testimony at length. The matter, indeed, is one largely of probability and of the credibility of the witnesses, and on the latter point the trial judge had the opportunity of personal observation which is not presented to us.

There can be no question that there was in the minds of the defendants the desire to prevent the plaintiffs from collecting their claim, and, as far as the consideration for the deeds is concerned, all that is presented is a claim for money alleged to have been advanced by the defendant Overing to the daughter some fourteen years before, and before her marriage, but, which not only was long since outlawed, if, in fact, it ever existed, but on and for which, according to her own statements, no interest had ever been paid, no note given, and no payment even demanded, and the only evidence of which was a memorandum contained in a notebook owned by the defendant, Luina McCormick. It is true that the defendant Overing paid the past-due taxes and the interest on a prior mortgage just prior to the transfer, but the evidence clearly shows that he did this because he was led to believe that the deeds could not be recorded without these payments.

The case, indeed, in our minds, is not one where a debtor has honestly preferred a creditor, but one which clearly comes within the general condemnation of the authorities, which seem to hold that the law will treat "as null and void all fraudulent contrivances to screen the property of a debtor from his creditors; it is fraudulent to defeat them by reservations of benefits to himself; it is equally fraudulent to defeat them by benefactions conferred upon others. It is not the consideration, but the intent with which a conveyance is made, that makes it good or bad as against creditors. However valuable the consideration, if the conveyance be designed to delay, hinder, or defeat creditors, it is void." Note to Hagerman v. Buchanan, 14 Am. St. Rep. 732; Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward, 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271; Fluegel v. Henschel, 7 N. D. 276, 66 Am. St. Rep. 642, 74 N. W. 996; Paulson v. Ward, 4 N. D. 100, 58 N. W. 792.

The case also clearly comes within the provisions of § 7220 of the Compiled Laws of 1913, which provides that "every transfer of property or charge thereon made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors in interest and against any persons upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor."

Fraudulent conveyance—consideration.

There is, too, no doubt of the knowledge of the grantee, Overing, of the fraudulent intent, nor of the applicability of the rule of law announced by us in the case of Fluegel v. Henschel, 7 N. D. 276, 66 Am. St. Rep. 642, 74 N. W. 996, and where-in we said: "Where a conveyance of real estate is made by a grantor with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and the grantee, not being a creditor of the grantor, has knowledge of such fact, the consummation of the transfer is such a participation in the fraud by the grantee as will invalidate the transfer, even where full consideration is paid."

by grantee.

There is, of course, no merit in the contention that the abstract business was not worth what the defendants agreed to pay for it, and that therefore the plaintiffs do not come into a court of equity with clean hands. The matter is precluded by the judgment on which the collateral attack—execution.

We must assume that in that case the defendants interposed all of the defenses, both legal and equitable, which they had, or deemed themselves entitled to, and no appeal was taken from that judgment.

Nor do we believe that the defendant Overing is entitled to a lien for the taxes and interest paid by him.

Our conclusion from the record is that he knew of and was a party to the fraud which was sought to be consummated, and it is well established that "where, at the time of the execution of the conveyance of real estate made and received for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the grantors, the grantee, as a part of the same transaction, agrees with the grantors to pay off certain existing valid encumbrances upon the real estate so fraudulently conveyed, and subsequently, and in pursuance of such agreement, the grantee pays such encumbrances, he cannot, when such conveyances are declared fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the grantors, hold such conveyances as security for the amounts so paid." Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward, 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271.

The judgment of the District Court, however, goes too far, as it holds that the conveyance is void as between the McCormicks and Overing. As far as this action is concerned, it is void only as to the lien of the plaintiff's judgment and attachment. It is modified to this extent, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

Grace, J., being disqualified, the Honorable Frank Fisk, Judge of the Eleventh Judicial District, sat in his place.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

The purpose of this suit is to subject the half section of land in Renville county to the lien of the plaintiffs' judgment, which is \$1,140.25. In an action by the plaintiffs against the McCormick defendants on May 18, 1914, the plaintiffs caused a writ of attachment to be issued and levied on the lands in question. On May 13, 1915, a judgment in said action was obtained and docketed, and an execution was issued against the defendants, and the next day it was returned unsatisfied. Pending said action the McCormicks conveyed to W. A. Overing, father of Mrs. Luina M. McCormick, the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 27-161-84, and the E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the same section. The deeds were made and recorded April 10, 1914. The first tract was owned by L. J. McCormick and the second by his wife. Both tracts were worth about \$10,000, and were subject to mortgages amounting to over \$7,000. At and prior to the transfer the past-due interest on the mortgages and the taxes amounted to \$840; and the McCormicks were unable to pay the same. The mortgages were pressing the mand insisting on immediate payment and threatening a foreclosure. Under such pressure the daughter natural-

Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Miller (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 191 S. W. 374.

In Baldwin v. Lincoln County (1902) 29 Wash. 509, 69 Pac. 1081, the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries admitted that he did not know whether the person whom he had employed to treat his injuries was a physician. The defendant maintained that it was not responsible for the aggravation of the plaintiff's injuries arising from improper treatment by his medical attendant. The court stated that if the plaintiff had used ordinary care in seeking medical aid, he would not be held to assume the liability of improper treatment, but added that the converse of this proposition was true, and "if the injured party was negligent in the employment of a competent physician, or employed some person whom he knew to be incompetent, when competent physicians were accessible, and improper treatment was resorted to and the injuries thereby greatly increased, these facts may be shown in mitigation of damages." A verdict for the defendant was affirmed.

In Selleck v. Janesville (1898) 100 Wis. 157, 41 L.R.A. 563, 69 Am. St. Rep. 906, 75 N. W. 975, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 352, an action for personal injuries, the defendant sought to escape liability for the entire resultant injury by alleging that the plaintiff's diseased nervous system was a result of the negligence or unskilfulness of her physician in failing to reduce a dislocation of her ankle. The court, affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, said: "The wrongdoer may well anticipate that the person injured will employ a physician or surgeon, and in doing so will exercise ordinary care in making the selection; but, where that is done, such person cannot be expected to assume the responsibility of the very highest degree of skill." This statement of the rule by the court was affirmed in Selleck v. Janesville (1899) 104 Wis. 570, 47 L.R.A. 691, 76 Am. St. Rep. 892, 80 N. W. 944.

In Small v. Westville (1898) 40 N. S. 226, it appeared that the plaintiff was severely cut about the wrist by reason of the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff had used reasonable care in selecting a surgeon possessed of ordinary skill, but, by reason of the surgeon's failure to suture a severed nerve, the plaintiff lost the use of her hand. The defendant maintained that it could not be held liable for the unskilful treatment by the surgeon, but the court held that even though the injury was aggravated by the improper treatment, the defendant, in view of the plaintiff's care in engaging surgical attention, was liable therefor.

Mere good faith in selecting a physician, or a belief that a physician is competent, does not amount to the ordinary care which must be exercised by an injured person in securing competent medical or surgical aid. Flint v. Connecticut Paving Co. (1918) 92 Conn. 576, 103 Atl. 840. So, in Crete v. Childs (1881) 11 Neb. 252, 9 N. W. 55, an action to recover damages for personal injuries, the jury were instructed that if the plaintiff had employed such medical aid "as she thought competent, and in good faith," she was not responsible for the result. The appellate court said that the theory of this instruction seemed to be that the "thought" or belief of the plaintiff as to the competency of the persons she employed to attend her injuries was sufficient to relieve her of responsibility for the result of the treatment, but added that this was error, since the plaintiff's duty was "to exercise reasonable care and diligence in the employment of medical aid."

The rule as to the degree of care required of an injured person in his selection of medical attendants is not altered by the fact that the plaintiff himself is a physician and surgeon. Thus, in Boynton v. Somersworth (1878) 58 N. H. 321, wherein the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries maintained that no deduction should be made from the amount of damages recoverable because of any alleged improper medical treatment, the court held that since the plaintiff had exercised reasonable care in retaining a medical attendant, he was not answerable for the success of the treatment, although he himself was a physician and surgeon.

In Thorne v. California Stage Co. (1856) 6 Cal. 232, wherein the defendant in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sought to show in mitigation of damages that the plaintiff's surgeon had a poor reputation for ability, the court, while excluding evidence of general reputation, said: "It would certainly have been competent for defendants to show in mitigation of damages that the plaintiff's injuries were wholly or partially the result of improper treatment on the part of his physician."

b. Physician or surgeon selected by person causing injury.

It seems that where one procures a physician or surgeon to attend a person whom he has injured, and uses due and reasonable care in the selection of such physician or surgeon, he is not liable for the negligence or unskilfulness of the latter, which results in an aggravation of the original injury. This rule, while apparently inequitable when compared with the rule fixing liability on the wrongdoer for the negligence of a physician or surgeon employed by the injured person, nevertheless seems to be fairly deducible from the following cases: Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1883) 5 McCrary, 515, 18 Fed. 221; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Whitney (1911) 62 Fla. 124, 56 So. 937; Eighmy v. Union P. R. Co. (1895) 93 Iowa, 538, 27 L.R.A. 296, 61 N. W. 1056; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Foard (1898) 104 Ky. 456, 47 S. W. 342; Quinn v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. (1895) 94 Tenn. 713, 28 L.R.A. 552, 45 Am. St. Rep. 767, 30 S. W. 1036; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Scott (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 44 S. W. 589.

In Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (Fed.) supra, the plaintiff sued to recover for damages sustained by reason of personal injuries suffered while he was a passenger on one of the defendant's trains. It appeared that he had been attended by a surgeon furnished by the defendant, and he sought to recover additional damages for the alleged malpractice of the surgeon in treating his injuries. The court held that, since it appeared that the defendant had exercised reasonable care to secure the services of a surgeon possessing ordinary skill, no liability could be predicated on the latter's malpractice, and the plaintiff's only recourse for such damage would be an action against the surgeon himself.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Foard (1898) 104 Ky. 456, 47 S. W. 342, an action to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while employed on the defendant's railroad, the court held that it was improper to admit evidence of damages caused by the unskilfulness of a surgeon employed by the defendant, saying: "In the employment by a railroad company of its surgeons to attend the persons injured by its trains, the relation of master and servant and principal and agent does not exist; and if the railroad company is careful, and selects suitable surgeons, it is not responsible for their neglect or malpractice." To the same effect see Quinn v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. (1895) 94 Tenn. 713, 28 L.R.A. 552, 45 Am. St. Rep. 767, 30 S. W. 1036.

In Eighmy v. Union P. R. Co. (1895) 93 Iowa, 538, 27 L.R.A. 296, 61 N. W. 1056, wherein it appeared that the defendant company had exercised reasonable care in the selection of a surgeon whose services it voluntarily offered to an injured employee, the court held that the employee could not recover additional damages for the negligence of the surgeon.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Whitney (1911) 62 Fla. 124, 56 So. 937, it was held that a railroad company was not liable to an injured employee for an aggravation of the injury, caused by the negligence of its surgeon, the court saying: "As we have heretofore decided, the railroad company is not responsible for the negligent work of its surgeon, if not negligent in selecting or retaining him, and knowledge of his failings must be brought home to it. His general reputation may be so bad that the law will impute knowledge, but nothing short of this will make it liable."

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Scott (1898) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 44 S. W. 589, the court held that a railroad company was not liable to an injured passenger for an aggravation of damages arising from the negligence of a physician which it had furnished in the exercise of a reasonable care. The court said: "Where a common carrier . . . assumes to furnish a surgeon or physician to attend upon injured passengers, the duty devolved upon it is to furnish a competent one, and if this is done the carrier is not liable for any malpractice or neglect upon the part of the physician." But compare St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Doyle (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 461, wherein the court allowed a recovery for the entire injury resulting from the defendant's negligence, remarking that it was immaterial whether the surgeon furnished by the defendant had made a mistake in treating the plaintiff.

III. Criminal liability.

a. General rule.

When a person inflicts a wound on another which is dangerous, or calculated to destroy life, the fact that the negligence, mistake, or lack of skill of an attending physician or surgeon contributes to the death affords no defense to a charge of homicide.

The rule, and the reason therefor, have been well stated by the supreme court of Arkansas as follows: "The well-established rule of the common law would seem to be that if the wound was a dangerous wound,—that is, calculated to endanger or destroy life,—and death ensued therefrom, it is sufficient proof of the offense of murder or manslaughter; and that the person who inflicted it is responsible, though it may appear that the deceased might have recovered if he had taken proper care of himself, or submitted to a surgical operation, or that unskilful or improper treatment aggravated the wound and contributed to the death. . . . A different doctrine would tend to give immunity to crime, and take away from human life a salutary and essential safeguard. Amid the conflicting theories of medical men, and the uncertainties attendant upon the treatment of bodily ailments and injuries, it would be easy in many cases of homicide to raise a doubt as to the immediate cause of death, and thereby to open a wide door by which persons guilty of the highest crimes might escape conviction and punishment." Sharp v. State (Ark.) supra.

And in State v. Baruth (Wash.) supra, the court stated the prevailing common-law rule as follows: "Where one unlawfully inflicts upon the person of another a wound calculated to endanger or destroy life, it is no defense to a charge of murder, where death ensues, to show that the wounded person might have recovered if the wound had been more skilfully treated. Even unskilful or negligent treatment of the wound on the part of the wounded person or his physicians, which may have aggravated the wound and contributed to the death, does not relieve the assailant from liability. He must show that the negligent and unskilful treatment was the sole cause of death, before he can escape the consequences of his unlawful act on this ground."

In Parsons v. State (1852) 21 Ala. 300, wherein the defendant sought to shelter himself from a charge of murder by alleging the unskilful treatment of the wounds as the cause of death, the court said: "We agree . . . that if the wound was mortal or dangerous the person who inflicted it cannot shelter himself under the plea of erroneous treatment."

That case was cited in McDaniel v. State (1884) 76 Ala. 1, in support of the following statement: "The doctrine is established that if the blow caused the death it is sufficient, though the individual might have recovered . . . had the surgeon treated the wound properly. This we understand to be the rule where the wound is in its nature mortal, or likely to produce death. So, we think, it results as a corollary, if the death result in part from a blow wrongfully given, which may produce death, and partly from neglect or unskilful treatment, then the assailant is guilty of the homicide in the degree the attendant circumstances assign to the act." And, continuing, the court said: "The true test is whether the deceased's death followed as an ordinary and natural result from the conduct of the defendant. If so, it is no defense that the deceased, under another form of treatment, might have recovered. . . . But if the result is caused by the malpractice of the physician, the wound not being of itself mortal and the physician not acting in concert with the defendant, then the defendant is not responsible; for the wound, though a condition of the killing, is not its juridical cause."

In Daughdrill v. State (1896) 113 Ala. 7, 21 So. 378, it was said: "The true doctrine is that, where the wound is in itself dangerous to life, mere erroneous treatment of it or of the wounded man suffering from it, will afford the defendant no protection against a charge of unlawful homicide." And the rule, as stated in Daughdrill v. State (Ala.) supra, was quoted and applied in Thomas v. State (1903) 139 Ala. 80, 36 So. 734.

In Sharp v. State (1888) 51 Ark. 147, 14 Am. St. Rep. 27, 10 S. W. 228, the defendant, on trial for the murder of one Martin, introduced expert testimony to prove that the wound which he had inflicted was not mortal, and that the death of Martin was caused by the maltreatment of the attending physician. It appeared that the wound inflicted was necessarily a dangerous one, and the court said: "If a person inflicts a wound with a deadly weapon in such a manner as to put life in jeopardy, and death follows as a consequence of this felonious and wicked act, it does not alter its nature or diminish its criminality that other causes co-operated in producing the fatal result. Indeed, it may be said that neglect of the wound, or its unskilful or improper treatment, which were of themselves consequences of the criminal act, which might naturally follow in any case, must in law be deemed to have been among those which were in contemplation of the guilty party, and for which he is to be held responsible."

And where the defendant, who was charged with the death of another from the effects of a gunshot wound in the arm, claimed that death was the result of improper treatment of the wound by the attending physician, the court stated the rule applicable as follows: "If one person inflicts upon another a dangerous wound, one that is calculated to endanger and destroy life, and death ensues therefrom within a year and a day, it is sufficient proof of the offense, either of manslaughter or murder as the case may be; and he is none the less responsible for the result, although it may appear that . . . unskilful or improper treatment aggravated the wound and contributed to his death." State v. Bantley (1877) 44 Conn. 537, 26 Am. Rep. 486.

In Johnson v. State (1912) 64 Fla. 321, 59 So. 894, a prosecution for murder, the accused claimed that the death was not the result of the wound inflicted by him, but was caused by improper surgery. The wound in itself was dangerous to life, and the court held that mere erroneous treatment of such a wound would afford no protection to a charge of homicide.

In Downing v. State (1901) 114 Ga. 30, 37 S. E. 927, the accused in a prosecution for unlawful homicide maintained that the death was produced by the failure of the surgeons to extract promptly certain foreign matter from the wound, which he claimed was not necessarily mortal. The trial court charged the jury that the negligence of the attending surgeons in treating a mortal wound, or their improper treatment of a wound not necessarily fatal, but which was productive of secondary causes resulting in death, would not relieve the accused from responsibility for the death of the deceased, and on appeal this charge was affirmed.

And where the accused in a prosecution for murder maintained that the death was the result of improper medical treatment of the wound, rather than of the wound itself, the court affirmed an instruction to the jury that, "if you believe from the evidence that the defendant unlawfully inflicted upon the deceased a mortal wound from which he thereafter died, he is responsible, though such wound was aggravated by improper and unskilful medical treatment and the death would not have resulted in the absence of such unskil-

In Perdue v. State (1910) 135 Ga. 277, 69 S. E. 184, wherein the accused, in a prosecution for murder, requested a charge which involved the doctrine that one may intentionally inflict a wound on another, from which he dies, and that the quality of the act will be affected by the degree of skill and care which is exercised in the treatment of the wound, the court refused to give recognition to any such doctrine.

And where the jury was instructed that, if the wounds inflicted by the accused caused or contributed to the death of the deceased, the fact that the wounds were not treated more skilfully would not affect his guilt, the court held that the instruction was a proper one. State v. Edgerton (1896) 100 Iowa, 63, 69 N. W. 280.

Similarly, where there was evidence that the death of the deceased would not have resulted except for the alleged mismanagement of his physician, the court held that if the injuries inflicted by the accused had directly contributed to produce death, the fact that the victim would not have died had proper treatment been given him was not controlling. The court quoted Greenleaf to the effect that "if death ensues from a wound given in malice, but not in its nature mortal, but, which being neglected or mismanaged, the party died, this will not excuse the prisoner who gave it." State v. Wood (1900) 112 Iowa, 411, 84 N. W. 520.

In State v. Gabriella (1913) 163 Iowa, 297, 144 N. W. 9, the accused, on trial for murder, offered testimony to the effect that the cause of the death was not the gunshot wound inflicted by him, but the negligent performance of a surgical operation on the wound. The trial court rejected all this testimony, and this court in affirmation said: "There is no claim that Turso [the deceased] had recovered from his wound at the time of the operation, nor that there was any evil intent in the performance of the operation, nor that it was performed for any other purpose than in a good-faith attempt to save the life of the patient. Lack of skill, or bad judgment, or mere negligence in any form on the part of the surgeon will not avail the slayer to protect him against the final consequences of his wrongful act."

When a wound has been maliciously inflicted from which death might ensue, and which has been followed by death, the burden of proof is on the accused to show that death resulted from some other cause, such as malpractice, or want of skill in the treatment of the wound; otherwise he will be chargeable therewith. State v. Briscoe (1878) 30 La. Ann. 433.

The doctrine that the unskilful treatment of a wound by a physician or surgeon would not be a ground for the acquittal, in a prosecution for murder, of one who had inflicted the wound with murderous intent, was reaffirmed in State v. Barnes (1882) 34 La. Ann. 395.

And it was held in Com. v. Hackett (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 136, a case which has been widely quoted as the basic authority for the rule here expressed that an accused who had designedly inflicted a dangerous wound on another would be guilty of unlawful homicide, even though the improper treatment of the wound by the attending surgeon may have contributed to his death.

In State v. Landgraf (1888) 95 Mo. 97, 6 Am. St. Rep. 26, 8 S. W. 237, the accused, on trial for murder, maintained that the death was not the result of the wound inflicted by him, but of the unskilful medical treatment of the attending surgeon. The trial judge charged that if the jury believed that the accused had wilfully shot the deceased, producing a dangerous wound, and that such wound was the cause of death, the accused would be guilty of murder in the first degree, "notwithstanding you may also believe and find that unskilled medical treatment aggravated such wound, and that deceased might have recovered if greater care and skill had been employed in treating her." The court in affirmance stated that there was abundant support in the authorities for this instruction."

In State v. Strong (1899) 153 Mo. 549, 55 S. W. 78, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 278, it was held proper to charge that if the jury believed that the accused had wilfully struck another with a knife without a design to effect death, and that the victim had died from the effect of the wound, he would be guilty of manslaughter, notwithstanding that the jury might also find that unskilled medical treatment had aggravated the wound, and more skilful treatment might have resulted in a recovery.

And where, after the administration of morphine to one Harvey by the accused, his condition was diagnosed as intoxication, and the fact that he was poisoned was not discovered until after his death, the court held that the improper medical treatment would not relieve the accused from responsibility for the homicide, provided the jury found that Harvey had died as a result of the poison. State v. Daly (1908) 210 Mo. 664, 109 S. W. 53.

In Hamblin v. State (1908) 81 Neb. 148, 115 N. W. 850, 16 Ann. Cas. 569, a prosecution for murder, the accused maintained that the victim had died, not from the effects of the wound inflicted by him, but by reason of the malpractice of the surgeons in allowing a broken glass catheter to remain in the bladder of the wounded man for eight or ten days before removing it by operation, which negligence, the accused alleged, caused gangrene and resulted in death. There was sufficient evidence to show that the original wound was a mortal one, and the allegation of death as the result of the delay in removing the catheter was characterized by the court as speculative, the latter holding that, where a mortal wound is unlawfully inflicted, the fact that mistakes or other causes may have hastened death will not absolve the accused from responsibility for the crime.

In People v. Kane (1915) 213 N. Y. 260, L.R.A.1915F, 607, 107 N. E. 655, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 685, the accused, on trial for murder, maintained that the shots fired by him were not the cause of the death, but that intervening negligent medical and surgical treatment had brought on the fatal result. It did not appear that the maltreatment was the sole cause of death, and the court held that where the wounds inflicted by the accused operate as causes of death, the fact that the malpractice of attending physicians or surgeons may have had some causative influence will not relieve the accused from responsibility for the act.

And where the accused claimed that the death was not the result of the injuries inflicted, but that the negligent performance of a surgical operation was the proximate cause thereof, the court held that "when a surgical operation, apparently necessary, is resorted to for the purpose of saving one from the probably fatal effect of a wound, it must clearly appear that maltreatment of the wound, and not the wound itself, was the sole cause of the death." And, the evidence not establishing this condition, a judgment of murder was affirmed. Territory v. Yee Dan (1894) 7 N. M. 439, 37 Pac. 1101.

Similarly, where it appeared, on a trial for murder, that a drainage tube, inserted by the attending surgeons during an operation on the wound inflicted by the accused, had found its way into the spinal canal, and the accused maintained that this mistake was the cause of the death, the court held that "the prisoner cannot escape by showing that death was the result of an accident occurring in an operation which his felonious act made necessary." Com. v. Eisenhower (1897) 181 Pa. 470, 59 Am. St. Rep. 670, 37 Atl. 521.

In Clark v. Com. (1893) 90 Va. 360, 18 S. E. 440, the court found no error in an instruction, in a prosecution for murder, that "if the jury believe from the evidence that the prisoner wilfully inflicted upon the deceased a dangerous wound, one that was calculated to endanger and destroy life, and that death ensued therefrom within a year and a day, the prisoner is none the less responsible for the result, although it may appear that the deceased might have recovered but for the aggravation of the wound by unskilful or improper treatment."

And it was held in State v. Baruth (1907) 47 Wash. 283, 91 Pac. 977, that one who unlawfully inflicts a dangerous wound on another cannot avail himself of the defense that negligent and unskilful treatment of the wound was the proximate cause of death, except where it be shown that such treatment was the sole cause of death.

b. Qualification of rule.

Where a person inflicts on another a wound not in itself calculated to produce death, and the injured person dies solely as a result of the improper treatment of the wound by an attending physician or surgeon, the fact that the death was caused by medical mistreatment is a good defense to a charge of homicide. Parsons v. State (1852) 21 Ala. 300; McDaniel v. State (1884) 76 Ala. 1; Bush v. Com. (1880) 78 Ky. 268; Tibbs v. Com. (1910) 138 Ky. 558, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665, 128 S. W. 871; State v. Scott (1857) 12 La. Ann. 274; People v. Kane (1915) 213 N. Y. 260, L.R.A. 1915F, 607, 107 N. E. 655, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 685.

In Parsons v. State (Ala.) supra, wherein the accused, on trial for murder, sought to shelter himself from the charge by setting out the unskilful treatment of the wounds as the cause of death, the court said: "We all agree that ordinarily, if a wound is inflicted not dangerous in itself, and the death was evidently occasioned by grossly erroneous treatment, the original author will not be accountable."

In McDaniel v. State (1884) 76 Ala. 1, the court stated the proposition as follows: "The true test is whether the deceased's death followed as an ordinary and natural result from the conduct of the defendant. If so, it is no defense that the deceased, under another form of treatment, might have recovered. . . . But if the result is caused by the malpractice of the physician, the wound not being in itself mortal and the physician not acting in concert with the defendant, then the defendant is not responsible; for the wound, though a condition of the killing, is not its juridical cause."

And in Bush v. Com. (1880) 78 Ky. 268, it was said that while the common-law rule seemed to be that when death ensued from a dangerous wound, unskilled and improper treatment thereof would not affect the criminality of the act, still "if the wound is not dangerous in itself, and death results from improper treatment or from disease subsequently contracted, not superinduced by or resulting from the wound, the accused is not guilty."

In Tibbs v. Com. (1910) 138 Ky. 558, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 665, 128 S. W. 871, the court held that it was error to exclude evidence, in a prosecution for murder, that the wound inflicted by the accused was not of itself dangerous, and that the victim had died from the effect of improper medical and surgical treatment, since by establishing proof of these facts the accused would be absolved of the charge of unlawful homicide.

It has been said that the fact that the deceased may have had an unskilful surgeon in attendance on his wound cannot mitigate the crime of the accused, unless it plainly appears that the treatment was the sole cause of death. The rule has been stated in the words of Mr. Greenleaf, as follows: "If death ensues from a wound given in malice, but not in its nature mortal, but, which being neglected or mismanaged, the party died; this will not excuse the prisoner who gave it, but he will be held guilty of the murder, unless he can make it clearly and certainly appear that the maltreatment of the wound, . . . and not the wound itself, was the sole cause of his death; for if the wound had not been given, the party had not died." State v. Scott (1857) 12 La. Ann. 274.

In People v. Kane (1915) 213 N. Y. 260, L.R.A.1915F, 607, 107 N. E. 655, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 685, the court quoted Mr. Wharton to the effect that "where the wound or injury has contributed mediately or immediately to the death of the injured person, and the injury was neglected or mismanaged, to warrant the escape of the person inflicting the injury from the responsibility for the killing, the subsequent neglect or mismanagement must have been the sole cause of death."

Compare Coffman v. Com. (1874) 10 Bush (Ky.) 495, wherein the court held that it was for the jury to determine, in a prosecution for murder, whether the operation performed on the deceased was such as ordinarily prudent and skilful surgeons would have deemed necessary, or if it would have been deemed necessary and was not performed with ordinary skill and added that if death resulted from such an operation, and not from the injuries inflicted by the accused, he should be acquitted, even though such injuries would eventually have proved fatal.

c. Rule in Texas.

In Texas, it is provided by statute (Texas Penal Code, arts. 652 and 653) that "the destruction of life must be complete by such act, agency, procurement or omission [of the accused]; but, although the injury which caused death might not under other circumstances have proved fatal, yet if such injury be the cause of death, without its appearing that there has been any gross neglect or manifestly improper treatment of the person injured, it is homicide. . . . What is said of gross neglect or improper treatment has reference to the acts of some person other than him who inflicts the first injury, as of the physician, nurse or other attendant." See Morgan v. State (1884) 16 Tex. App. 593; Brown v. State (1873) 38 Tex. 482; Johnson v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 283, 65 S. W. 92; Sartin v. State (1907) 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 571, 103 S. W. 875; McMillan v. State (1910) 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 525, 126 S. W. 875.

In Morgan v. State (Tex.) supra, the court, commenting on the change which the statute made in the common-law rule, pointed out that at common law the improper treatment, and not the wound, must produce the death, in order to relieve the person who inflicted the original injury from the charge of homicide. And, continuing, it was said: "Our statute, as I interpret it, does not require that the neglect or improper treatment should produce the death, either in whole or in part. If there be gross neglect or manifestly improper treatment, either in preventing or in aiding the fatal effects of the injury, the death of an injured person is not homicide by the party who inflicted the original injury." By way of illustration, a hypothetical case of manifestly improper treatment, where death was the result of the wound and not of the treatment, was stated, in which B., who had sustained a knife wound from A., severing a small artery, is treated by a surgeon who, instead of attempting to stop the flow of blood, administers chloroform and leaves B. to bleed to death. This, the court pointed out, would be homicide under the common law, but not under the Texas statute. The phrase, "gross neglect and improper treatment," as used in the statute, was interpreted as meaning not only acts which destroy life, but such "as allow, suffer, or permit such destruction of life." Thus, where it appeared that, in the treatment of a knife wound inflicted by the accused on the temple of the deceased, the attending surgeons were guilty of gross negligence in making incisions in the back of the skull, which were of themselves perhaps mortal, when with proper treatment the deceased would have had a chance to recover, the court held that the accused was not guilty of homicide.

In Brown v. State (1873) 38 Tex. 482, wherein the accused, on trial for murder, produced evidence of malpractice by the physician in attendance on the victim, the court held that the jury should be instructed that the accused could not be found guilty unless they were satisfied that the death was the result of the wound, and not of the malpractice of the physician. And, commenting on the statute, the court said: "Our law undoubtedly changes the rule of the common law, the theory of which was that he who caused the first injury should be held guilty, upon the theory that without the first injury no other would have followed, as resulting from the first."

And in Johnson v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 288, 65 S. W. 92, where the accused in a prosecution for murder alleged that the death of the deceased was the result of improper treatment and neglect by the attending physician, and that the wound of itself was not sufficient to cause death, the court held that the failure of the trial judge to charge affirmatively that if the wound was not necessarily mortal, but the deceased had died as a result of improper or neglectful treatment, the accused would not be responsible for his death, was reversible error.

In Sartin v. State (1907) 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 571, 103 S. W. 875, the court held that it was correct to instruct the jury in a prosecution for murder as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant . . . did shoot the [deceased] as charged, but you further find from the evidence that there has been gross neglect or manifestly improper treatment of said [deceased] by any one or more of the physicians or persons attending him, between the inflicting of the wound and his death, which improper treatment or neglect, if any, caused the death of the said [deceased], then you cannot find the defendant guilty of taking the life of the said [deceased]."

And, where the evidence in a prosecution for murder suggested that the death may have resulted from the improper treatment of the attending physicians, the court held that the failure of the trial court to charge that, "if the death of the deceased was brought about by improper treatment or gross neglect of the physicians, he would not be guilty of the homicide," was reversible error. McMillan v. State (1910) 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 525, 126 S. W. 875.

L. J. McCORMICK et al., Appts.

Fraudulent conveyance — consideration — payment of debts.

1. Where, at the time of the conveyance of real estate made and received for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the grantors, the grantee, as a part of the same transaction and with knowledge of the fraud, agrees with the grantors to pay certain existing valid encumbrances upon the real estate so fraudulently conveyed, and subsequently and in pursuance of such an agreement pays such encumbrances, he cannot, when such conveyances are declared fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the grantors, hold such conveyances as security for the amounts so paid.

— consideration.

2. The law will treat as null and void as to creditors all fraudulent contrivances to screen the property of a debtor from his creditors. It is not the consideration, but the intent with which a conveyance is made, that makes it good or bad as against creditors. However valuable the consideration, if the conveyance be designed to delay, hinder, or defeat creditors, it is void.

— participation by grantee.

3. Where a conveyance of real estate is made by a grantor with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, and the grantee, not being a creditor of the grantor, has knowledge of such fact, the consummation of the transfer is such a participation in fraud by the grantee as will invalidate the transfer as to such creditors, even where full consideration is paid.

Judgment — collateral attack — execution.

4. No defense can be interposed, in an action to remove a fraudulent conveyance from the path of an execution, on the ground that the claim on which the judgment was entered and on which the execution was issued, was invalid, or inequitable. The matter is precluded by the prior judgment; and, when no appeal was taken, it must be assumed that all of the defenses, both legal and equitable, which the defendants had or deemed themselves entitled to, were interposed on the former trial.

(Robinson, J., and Fisk, District Judge, dissent.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Renville County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ryerson & Rodsater for appellants.

Messrs. J. E. Bryans and E. R. Sinkler for respondents.

This action comes before us for a trial de novo, and is brought to set aside a fraudulent conveyance. On the 3d day of May the plaintiffs recovered a judgment against the McCormicks for the sum of $1,140.25.

The indebtedness on which the judgment was founded grew out of the sale of an abstract business by the plaintiffs to the defendants on September 8, 1911, for $4,100, payable in monthly instalments of $50, and the action was brought on the instalments then due and unpaid. The transfer, which is sought to be set aside, was made by the McCormicks to the defendant W. A. Overing, the father of Mrs. McCormick, on the 10th day of April, 1914, and on the day of the commencement of the action on which the judgment was obtained. The trial court found the issues for the plaintiffs, and "that the said deeds were executed and the land transferred wholly and voluntarily without consideration, and with the sole intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiffs in the collection of their claim, and to hinder, delay, and defraud all of their creditors, and that the said W. A. Overing, defendant, accepted and received such debts, and the transfer of such land, with full knowledge of all of such fraudulent intent, and with the full and sole intent on his part to assist the said L. J. McCormick and Luina M. McCormick in their fraudulent purpose." After a full argument and a thorough examination of the record, we are constrained to affirm this finding, and nothing would be gained by relating the testimony at length. The matter, indeed, is one largely of probability and of the credibility of the witnesses, and on the latter point the trial judge had the opportunity of personal observation which is not presented to us.

There can be no question that there was in the minds of the defendants the desire to prevent the plaintiffs from collecting their claim, and, as far as the consideration for the deeds is concerned, all that is presented is a claim for money alleged to have been advanced by the defendant Overing to the daughter some fourteen years before, and before her marriage, but, which not only was long since outlawed, if, in fact, it ever existed, but on and for which, according to her own statements, no interest had ever been paid, no note given, and no payment even demanded, and the only evidence of which was a memorandum contained in a notebook owned by the defendant, Luina McCormick. It is true that the defendant Overing paid the past-due taxes and the interest on a prior mortgage just prior to the transfer, but the evidence clearly shows that he did this because he was led to believe that the deeds could not be recorded without these payments.

The case, indeed, in our minds, is not one where a debtor has honestly preferred a creditor, but one which clearly comes within the general condemnation of the authorities, which seem to hold that the law will treat "as null and void all fraudulent contrivances to screen the property of a debtor from his creditors; it is fraudulent to defeat them by reservations of benefits to himself; it is equally fraudulent to defeat them by benefactions conferred upon others. It is not the consideration, but the intent with which a conveyance is made, that makes it good or bad as against creditors. However valuable the consideration, if the conveyance be designed to delay, hinder, or defeat creditors, it is void." Note to Hagerman v. Buchanan, 14 Am. St. Rep. 732; Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward, 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271; Fluegel v. Henschel, 7 N. D. 276, 66 Am. St. Rep. 642, 74 N. W. 996; Paulson v. Ward, 4 N. D. 100, 58 N. W. 792.

The case also clearly comes within the provisions of § 7220 of the Compiled Laws of 1913, which provides that "every transfer of property or charge thereon made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors in interest and against any persons upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor."

There is, too, no doubt of the knowledge of the grantee, Overing, of the fraudulent intent, nor of the applicability of the rule of law announced by us in the case of Fluegel v. Henschel, 7 N. D. 276, 66 Am. St. Rep. 642, 74 N. W. 996, and wherein we said: "Where a conveyance of real estate is made by a grantor with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and the grantee, not being a creditor of the grantor, has knowledge of such fact, the consummation of the transfer is such a participation in the fraud by the grantee as will invalidate the transfer, even where full consideration is paid."

There is, of course, no merit in the contention that the abstract business was not worth what the defendants agreed to pay for it, and that therefore the plaintiffs do not come into a court of equity with clean hands. The matter is precluded by the judgment on which the collateral attack—execution.

We must assume that in that case the defendants interposed all of the defenses, both legal and equitable, which they had, or deemed themselves entitled to, and no appeal was taken from that judgment.

Nor do we believe that the defendant Overing is entitled to a lien for the taxes and interest paid by him.

Our conclusion from the record is that he knew of and was a party to the fraud which was sought to be consummated, and it is well established that "where, at the time of the execution of the conveyance of real estate made and received for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the grantors, the grantee, as a part of the same transaction, agrees with the grantors to pay off certain existing valid encumbrances upon the real estate so fraudulently conveyed, and subsequently, and in pursuance of such agreement, the grantee pays such encumbrances, he cannot, when such conveyances are declared fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the grantors, hold such conveyances as security for the amounts so paid." Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward, 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271.

The judgment of the District Court, however, goes too far, as it holds that the conveyance is void as between the McCormicks and Overing. As far as this action is concerned, it is void only as to the lien of the plaintiff's judgment and attachment. It is modified to this extent, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

Grace, J., being disqualified, the Honorable Frank Fisk, Judge of the Eleventh Judicial District, sat in his place.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

The purpose of this suit is to subject the half section of land in Renville county to the lien of the plaintiffs' judgment, which is \$1,140.25. In an action by the plaintiffs against the McCormick defendants on May 18, 1914, the plaintiffs caused a writ of attachment to be issued and levied on the lands in question. On May 13, 1915, a judgment in said action was obtained and docketed, and an execution was issued against the defendants, and the next day it was returned unsatisfied. Pending said action the McCormicks conveyed to W. A. Overing, father of Mrs. Luina M. McCormick, the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 27-161-84, and the E.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the same section. The deeds were made and recorded April 10, 1914. The first tract was owned by L. J. McCormick and the second by his wife. Both tracts were worth about \$10,000, and were subject to mortgages amounting to over \$7,000. At and prior to the transfer the past-due interest on the mortgages and the taxes amounted to \$840; and the McCormicks were unable to pay the same. The mortgages were pressing the mand insisting on immediate payment and threatening a foreclosure. Under such pressure the daughter naturally requested her father, whose note was good at the bank, to loan them money to pay the interest and taxes. Having previously advanced the daughter several sums which, with interest, amounted to about \$2,000, and which was then outlawed, the father refused to loan the money, and the land was conveyed to him for the amount due on the same and the money which he had loaned his daughter. Thus the McCormicks counted on paying their debts and shifting the burden onto the old man. However, it is quite clear the deeds were made, not only because of immediate pressure and to prevent a ruinous foreclosure, but also to hinder and delay the plaintiffs whose attorney was pressing them for a mortgage on the land. Defendant Overing knew, or should have known, of such intent.

However, under the statute the transfer should be held void only in so far as it might prevent the plaintiffs from collecting the judgment by the sale of the land; and, though the general rule is that a fraudulent grantee of land cannot hold the same as security for the payment of prior liens and taxes, yet there are reasons why that rule should not govern this case. Defendant Overing may well be considered a ward of the court. He was an old man in poor health, and his mind was sadly impaired, and his payment of the interest and taxes was no damage to any party. The chances are that in buying the land his motive was to prevent a foreclosure and to get something for the money advanced to his daughter. However it may be, it is quite certain the equity of Overing compares well with those of the plaintiffs. Their judgment was obtained on a deal which was rather sharp and unconscionable. It was given on notes for an abstract outfit sold to the McCormicks for $4,100, and taken back on a chattel mortgage and sold to the plaintiff for $500. The courts might well refuse to aid in the collection of such a judgment, or any judgment not based on a fair and honest consideration. Thus, in suits for specific performance, a court refuses to aid an unconscionable deed when the deeds were made as part of the consideration for the same. Overing paid the taxes and the past-due interest on the mortgages, amounting to $840, and since then he has paid a considerable amount of taxes and interest as the same became due, and for all such payments Overing has an equity superior to the plaintiffs, and he should have and retain full title to the land unless reimbursed for such payments.

It is clear the judgment in this case must be reversed for the reason it goes too far. It declares the deed to Overing to be null and void, whereas, in any event, such deeds may be adjudged void only so far as they hinder the collection of plaintiffs' judgment. It is only to the extent of the judgment that the plaintiffs may question the right of the McCormicks to give away their land.

As the record does not clearly show the several amounts paid by Overing for taxes and interest, on return of the remittitur the district court should forthwith take such additional testimony as may be necessary to ascertain such payments, and the amount of the same, with interest, and then to give judgment to the effect that for such amount Overing's claim of title to the land is and shall be superior to the plaintiffs' judgment, and that within thirty days the plaintiffs may repay the amount of such taxes and interest, and for the same that they be subrogated to a lien on the land, and that on such payment by the plaintiffs that the deeds to Overing be adjudged void in so far as they hinder the collection of the plaintiffs' said judgment.

Fisk, District Judge, dissenting:

I agree with the conclusion reached by Judge Robinson, but not in all that he says in his opinion.

There is little doubt but that the transfer of the land was fraudulent and made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defeating, if possible, the collection of the plaintiffs' judgment. I do not, believe, however, that the defendant Overing was such an active participant in the scheme as to say that he should be punished by giving the plaintiffs' judgment priority over the amount Overing paid in taxes and interest which were prior liens. Overing was an old man and I believe he was used by his daughter and son-in-law to further their fraudulent scheme without any particular knowledge on his part of everything that was going on. Under such circumstances I do not believe the rules of law as announced by the majority opinion apply. I am in full accord with all of the rules therein announced, but I believe the rule that "where the fraud is constructive only, the grantee comes into court with comparatively clean hands, and the courts treat him with leniency. In such cases the fraudulent conveyance has been allowed to stand as security for the purchase price, or for the amount of prior liens or debts of the grantor paid by the grantee, or for taxes paid" (Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward, 6 N. D. 324, 70 N. W. 271), comes nearer fitting the facts in this case than the rules announced in the majority opinion.

Petition for rehearing denied June 1, 1918.

ANNOTATION.

Right of grantee or transferee to be reimbursed for expenditures in payment of taxes or encumbrances on property where conveyance or transfer is in fraud of creditors.

V. Conclusions, 543.

I. Scope and introduction.

The present annotation is intended to cover only those cases in which reimbursement was sought, on the setting aside of the conveyance or transfer, for taxes or encumbrances discharged by the fraudulent grantee, and not those cases involving reimbursement for expenditures for improvements, repairs, the purchase price, or to discharge unsecured indebtedness of the grantor; although attention is called to some cases not on the facts within the scope of the title of the annotation, which lay down the rule broadly enough to cover the class of cases herein considered.

There appears to be more reason for allowing claims of priority over rights of creditors of the fraudulent grantor in the case of sums paid by the grantee to discharge taxes or encumbrances on the property than in the case of payments to the grantor as a part of the purchase price. This is recognized in Leq Ve v. Stoppel (1896) 64 Minn. 74, 66 N. W. 208, where, in holding that the grantee should be entitled on the sale of the property to reimbursement for sums expended to discharge a prior mortgage, the evidence not being conclusive that there was actual fraud, although showing a state of facts so suspicious that the court did not feel warranted in allowing the conveyance to stand, the court stated: "This is not a case where reimbursement is sought for money paid to the grantor, which he may have used up, or placed beyond the reach of his creditors. That would present a very different case. Here the money went to the benefit of the property, and, if the mortgage had not been paid, the creditors, or those who purchased at a creditors' sale, would have to pay it, in order to save the property."

And distinction as to the right of a fraudulent grantee to reimbursement for money paid to the grantor as a part of the purchase price, and his right to reimbursement for sums expended to discharge valid prior mortgages on the property, on the setting aside of the conveyance at the instance of creditors of the grantor, is stated in Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Halsted (1892) 134 N. Y. 520, 30 Am. St. Rep. 693, 31 N. E. 900, as follows: "If A convey to B his farm, worth $5,000, with intent to defraud his creditors, B paying him $1,000 at the time of the delivery of the deed, the court, in the decree setting aside the conveyance, will refuse to grant him relief, not as a proper punishment for the offense, but because the creditors have an equity equal to the value of the property granted, which should be fully protected as against him who fraudulently sought to despoil it. But for the conveyance the entire property would have been applicable to the payment of the creditors. By the fraud it was put beyond the reach of an execution. Because of it a court of equity declares the deed void. And to the request of B, that he be allowed the $1,000 paid to his fraudulent grantor, a court of equity refuses to listen because the equity of the creditors embraces the whole of the property, including necessarily the interest represented by the $1,000 paid to A, and it cannot be cut down or interfered with by any payment constituting a part of the fraudulent transaction. But for the misconduct of B, the creditors presumably could have reached the entire interest; therefore, the result of it must be borne by him, and not by the innocent party. Should A convey his farm to B, subject to a valid pre-existing mortgage of $5,000 held by a third party, and B subsequently dispose of it for a larger sum, out of the proceeds of which he pays the mortgage, he cannot be required to pay to the creditors the full value of the farm without deducting the amount due on the mortgage, for as to that sum the creditors have no equity. If the fraud had not been consummated, only the value of the property in excess of the mortgage could have been made available in payment of the claims of the creditors. As to that interest secured by the mortgage no wrong was done them. Having no right to such interest, no principle of equity exists on which to found a claim for an appropriation of any benefit, on account of it, from a fraudulent grantee of the equity of redemption. Or, if before B sells the property, the conveyance is set aside on the ground of fraud, in an accounting for the rents and profits, he will be allowed for interest paid on the mortgage, and for the reason that, the mortgage being valid, the property was chargeable with the payment of the interest, as well as the principal, and the creditors were not, therefore, harmed by it."

So, although holding that, on the setting aside of the conveyance at the instance of creditors, the grantee, who was guilty of actual fraud, was entitled to a credit, in an accounting for rents and profits, for taxes paid on the property, the court in How v. Camp (1844) Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 427, held that he was not entitled to a credit for advances to the grantor, unless they were used by the latter before the creditors filed their bill, to pay debts owing from the grantor to the creditors at the time of the conveyance. It was said that, so far as payments were concerned which the grantor had so used, the conveyance had not operated as a fraud on the creditors, but that no other advances of money should be allowed, since to the extent of such allowances, the court would be giving effect to the fraud, and would remove the chief obstacle to third persons, assisting debtors in defrauding creditors by indemnifying them against pecuniary loss in case of detection.

A distinction should be noted between cases where, as in Wells v. White (1886) 142 Mass. 518, 8 N. E. 442, the grantee or transferee obtains an assignment to himself of a mortgage on the property, and does not simply discharge it by payment, and cases where there is no assignment, but the encumbrance is discharged. In the former class of cases, if, as is implied in the case referred to, he is held accountable to the creditors only for the surplus or equity over the amount of the mortgage, this would result apparently from the fact that, independently of the fraudulent contract, he could rely on his mortgage; and it would not necessarily follow that, if he had discharged the mortgage without procuring such assignment, he would be entitled to reimbursement, as against creditors of the vendor, on the setting aside of the conveyance or transfer. For other cases where the mortgage or other liens were assigned to the grantee, see the following cases cited under II. a, infra; Smith v. Grimes (1876) 43 Iowa, 356; Fordyce v. Hicks (1888) 76 Iowa, 41, 40 N. W. 79; and Boggs v. Douglass (1896) 100 Iowa, 385, 69 N. W. 689; also Adams v. Young (1909) 200 Mass. 588, 86 N. E. 942, cited under II. b, infra. See, however, Greigg v. Rice (1903) 66 S. C. 171, 44 S. E. 729, cited under II. a, infra, holding that a fraudulent grantee was not entitled to subrogation to the rights of holders of prior mortgage and judgment liens, although apparently these had been assigned to him.

II. Statement of rules in general.

a. Actual fraud.

As to whether a grantee who is guilty of actual fraud is entitled to reimbursement for taxes and prior encumbrances on the property, discharged by him, the authorities are conflicting. The majority of the cases passing on the question hold that a grantee who is clearly shown to be guilty of actual fraud is not entitled, as against creditors of the grantor, on the setting aside of the conveyance, to reimbursement for sums paid by him to discharge taxes and prior encumbrances on the property, and cannot be subrogated to the rights of the holders of such prior liens.

The above doctrine is supported also by statements in various cases, where, however, the reimbursement sought was for sums expended for other purposes than to discharge encumbrances and taxes.

Thus, in Baldwin v. Short (1891) 125 N. Y. 554, 26 N. E. 928, the court stated that the contention that the conveyance might be sustained to the extent of the consideration paid was fully answered by the authorities which held that where the deed is fraudulent against creditors, it is wholly void, and cannot stand to any extent as security or indemnity; and that a different rule would put a premium upon fraud.

And in Sands v. Codwise (1808) 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 536, 4 Am. Dec. 305, Kent, Ch. J., in holding that where a conveyance is set aside for actual fraud on the part of both the parties, at the instance of creditors of the grantor, the conveyance cannot stand as security for advances for the purchase price by the grantee, said that "on the ground of absolute fraud, the deeds were void to all intents and purposes. It is the same thing as if no such deeds had ever been executed. A fraudulent conveyance is no conveyance, as against the interest intended to be defrauded. This is the plain language and intelligent sense of the rule of the common law. . . . It is impossible that those deeds can be permitted to stand as a security, if they are to be adjudged void ab initio. If they have no lawful existence, it would be inconsistent and absurd to recognize them for any lawful purpose. I presume there is no instance to be met with of any reimbursement or indemnity afforded by a court of chancery to a particeps criminis, in a case of positive fraud. . . . It is fit and proper that this result should take place, as a contrary course might afford countenance to fraud by giving it a partial effect. It would not become a court of equity to take a single step to save harmless a party detected in a fraudulent combination to cheat. No right can be deduced from an act founded in actual fraud."

Also in Boyd v. Dunlap (1815) 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 478, where the question involved was the right of the grantee to indemnity for sums paid the grantor, the court stated that a deed fraudulent in fact is absolutely void, and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity.

And the doctrine that a deed fraudulent in fact is absolutely void as against creditors, and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity, is approved in Lodstein v. Lehn (1887) 120 Ill. 549, 12 N. E. 68, although in this case it was held that the conveyance was only constructively fraudulent, and it therefore should be allowed to stand as security for money paid by the grantee to discharge taxes and encumbrances on the property.

On facts not within the scope of the note, the court in Henderson v. Hunton (1875) 26 Gratt. (Va.) 926, said: "When there is actual fraud, both parties participating, the deed is utterly void ab initio, and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose. The fraud infects the whole transaction. . . . In no instance will the court afford any indemnity to a particeps criminis in case of actual fraud."

See also the following cases, not on the facts within the scope of the annotation, as approving the broad rule that where there is actual fraud on the part of the grantee, the conveyance is void ab initio and should not be permitted to stand as security to him for any purpose: First Nat. Bank v. Kennedy (1890) 91 Ala. 470, 8 So. 652; Parr v. Saunders (1880) 1 Va. Dec. 724, 11 S. E. 979; Alley v. Connell (1859) 3 Head (Tenn.) 577; Bean v. Smith (1821) 2 Mason, 252, Fed. Cas. No. 1,174.

Where there is actual fraud on the part of both the grantor and grantee, the conveyance is considered as void ab initio, is set aside entirely, and cannot stand as security to the fraudulent grantee; the situation is the same as though no deed had been executed. Thompson v. Bickford (1872) 19 Minn. 17, Gil. 1, supra. And the court further approved the doctrine that "it would not become a court of equity to take a single step to save harmless a party detected in a fraudulent combination to cheat," and that "no right can be deduced from an act founded in actual fraud."

The rule was laid down in Burt v. C. Gotzian & Co. (1900) 43 C. C. A. 59, 102 Fed. 937, supra, that "one who knowingly takes a conveyance or assignment to aid and abet a scheme to defraud creditors cannot hold the fraudulent instrument, or any interest under it, as against the creditors, to secure the amount paid for it, or for the satisfaction of taxes or encumbrances he has paid upon the property it affects."

If the grantee has been a conscious participant in the fraud, he is not, as against creditors of the grantor, entitled to reimbursement for expenditures for taxes or the discharge of encumbrances on the property, since public policy forbids the reimbursement of a particeps criminis, and otherwise one would hazard nothing by active participation in the fraud. Lynch v. Burt (1904) 67 C. C. A. 305, 132 Fed. 417.

And it is said in Cooper v. Friedman (1900) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 585, 57 S. W. 581, that if the grantee fraudulently purchased the property, he could not recover from the creditors of the grantor, or make the taxes and interest on the mortgage paid by him a charge on the property; that such purchase would be as to the creditors, under the statute, void; and that the grantee, in relation to the creditors, would occupy the position of a stranger.

Where, for the purpose of getting a debtor's property out of the state and evading claims of creditors, the grantee advanced, on a sale of the property to him, a sum out of which the debtor discharged a mortgage on the property, it was held in Smith v. Pettus (1851) 25 S. C. Eq. (4 Rich.) 197, supra, that, on the setting aside of the sale at the instance of creditors, the vendee should not be allowed a lien on the property for the amount expended in the discharge of the mortgage.

The payment of taxes by the fraudulent grantee, the court held in Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward (1897) 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271, must be regarded as a voluntary payment in aid of the original fraud, for which the grantee, who was a party to the fraud, was not entitled to reimbursement on the setting aside of the conveyance at the instance of creditors of the grantor.

Although the facts did not bring the case within the scope of the annotation, the grantee in the fraudulent conveyance, who was guilty of actual fraud, having paid as a part of the purchase price a judgment against the grantor and a note owed by the latter, attention is called to the case of Seivers v. Dickover (1884) 101 Ind. 495, which states the reasons for refusal to allow a fraudulent grantee amounts expended by him as follows: "The loss of the amount paid by a fraudulent grantee is the penalty that the law inflicts for the fraudulent transaction. To refund to such a grantee the amount he has paid would be to destroy the penalty. Such a holding would destroy the salutary restraints which the law has built up against such transactions, by removing all danger of loss. When once a party has been convicted of fraud, the law refuses its aid to him in any manner or form, and leaves him, as to that transaction, just where it finds him."

In Greig v. Rice (1903) 66 S. C. 171, 44 S. E. 729, it was held that a grantee in a conveyance fraudulent as to creditors, who participated in the fraud, was not entitled to subrogation to the rights of holders of prior mortgage and judgment liens which had apparently been assigned to him. The point is not discussed. The court merely stated that it could not permit subrogation, and that the grantee should take the usual portion of the person dealing in fraud.

In some cases, the fact that the payment by the grantee of an encumbrance on the property was made pursuant to the terms of the original fraudulent contract of conveyance, as where the grantee expressly assumes the mortgage or discharges it at the time of the conveyance, has seemingly inclined the courts more strongly against the allowance to the grantee of reimbursement, on the ground that, the contract of sale being fraudulent, and the payment made pursuant thereto constituting, in effect, a part of the purchase price, to permit reimbursement would be to give relief on the fraudulent contract to a party to the fraud.

See, in this connection, the statement of the rule in SHERIDAN v. MC-CORMICK (reported herewith) ante, 523, and Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward (1897) 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271, from which the court quotes in the former case.

The position was taken in Morley Bros. v. Stringer (1903) 133 Mich. 690, 95 N. W. 978, that prior liens on the property, paid pursuant to the fraudulent agreement between the grantor and the grantee to defraud creditors, stand upon the same basis as actual payments on the purchase price, and fall within the rule by which courts refuse to permit the grantee to have reimbursement for the consideration paid, as distinguished from the right of the fraudulent grantee to reimbursement for taxes paid and improvements made on the property after the conveyance.

In Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Halsted (1890) 56 Hun, 580, 9 N. Y. Supp. 852, modified on another point in (1892) 134 N. Y. 520, 30 Am. St. Rep. 693, 31 N. E. 900, it is stated that, while courts will extend no aid to a fraudulent grantee, it does not follow from this principle that he is not entitled to be credited with what may have been paid by him to relieve the property from encumbrances previously, in good faith, made upon it, such encumbrances not being tainted in any respect with the fraudulent designs of the vendor and purchaser; but that so far as the transactions are included within the terms of the fraudulent disposition of the property, the courts have ordinarily denied relief by way of indemnity to the purchaser.

The case of Davis v. Leopold (1881) 87 N. Y. 620, in which the court stated that the fraudulent grantee was "a guilty participant in the fraud, and not to be cared for," and approved the rule that "a deed fraudulent in fact is absolutely void, and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity," was distinguished in Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Halsted (N. Y.) supra, on the ground that in the Leopold Case the assumption of the existing encumbrance on the property formed a part of the fraudulent transaction, and the court would not attempt to shield the fraudulent grantee from a burden assumed in his own wrong; and also on the ground that it did not appear from the report of the case that the grantee had paid the mortgage, or that it was not still a lien on the property.

Where a purchaser at a sale of property under a trust deed paid only the amount due on the trust deed, and had actual knowledge that the sale was in fraud of creditors, it was held in McLean v. Letchford (1882) 60 Miss. 169, that he was not entitled, on the setting aside of the conveyance at the instance of creditors of the grantor, to reimbursement for the amount paid, although the court did not decide whether he might be entitled to reimbursement for mortgages subsequently discharged. It was said that manifestly the fraudulent grantee could recover nothing paid on the trust deed, that this was the "vehicle of his fraudulently obtained possession. It was that which made the fraud possible. The money paid on it was the price which the fraud cost him. To allow him the money back would be to repay him that which he expended in accomplishing the very thing which the law prohibits and condemns. If it was wrong in him to obtain the title and the possession for a fraudulent purpose, it must be wrong to repay him the price paid therefor. He can base no right upon the fact that his payment extinguished a paramount lien which was superior to the rights of the complainants, because the mortgage was distinguished in and by the fraudulent acquisition of the property, and to revive it for his benefit would be both to contravene his own act and to cause a repayment of money expended in the act and for the purpose of perpetrating the fraud."

And where the only consideration for the conveyance was the assumption by the grantee of a mortgage on the property, and the grantee took the conveyance with an actual fraudulent intent to defeat creditors of the grantor, it was held in Lynch v. Murray (1912) 86 Vt. 1, 83 Atl. 746, that, on the setting aside of the conveyance, the grantee was not entitled to reimbursement for taxes paid on the property and for interest paid on the mortgage, the court stating as a reason for its decision that "it was necessary for him to make those disbursements to give color of good faith to a transfer which was in fact fraudulent, and equity will not aid him in securing reimbursement for his expenses incurred for the purpose of defeating justice and concealing a fraud."

In Tissier v. Wailes (1905) — Ala. —, 32 So. 924, it was held that the fraudulent grantee, who was guilty of actual fraud, was not entitled to reimbursement, on the setting aside of the conveyance at the instance of a creditor, on account of the assumption of payment of a balance due on a mortgage on the property. It does not appear that the grantee had discharged the mortgage. And the court bases its decision apparently on the ground that the grantee who is guilty of actual fraud is not entitled to reimbursement for the consideration given to the grantor for the conveyance.

And in Liddle v. Allen (1894) 90 Iowa, 738, 57 N. W. 608, the court said that a fraudulent grantee is not protected even to the amount which he paid for the property; and it was held, therefore, that he could not raise the question of the court's power to determine the validity of a mortgage on the property, which he had paid as a part of the purchase price, without making the mortgagee a party to the action.

On the other hand, the doctrine that the grantee, though he is guilty of actual fraud, is entitled to reimbursement, on the setting aside of the conveyance, for sums expended to discharge prior liens for taxes and encumbrances, is supported by a few decisions: Hutchinson v. Park (1904) 72 Ark. 509, 82 S. W. 843 (taxes); Ackerman v. Merle (1902) 137 Cal. 169, 69 Pac. 983 (mortgage); Garner v. Philips (1872) 35 Iowa, 597 (mortgage); Smith v. Grimes (1876) 43 Iowa, 356 (assignment of liens to grantee). See also Fordyce v. Hicks (1888) 76 Iowa, 41, 40 N. W. 79, and Boggs v. Douglass (1896) 100 Iowa, 385, 69 N. W. 689 (cases in which the grantees became the assignees of judgments against the grantor); Bogard v. Buckner (1884) 5 Ky. L. Rep. 856 (abstract) (mortgage). See also Smisser v. Stevens (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 501, 45 S. W. 957; Lamb v. McIntire (1903) 183 Mass. 367, 67 N. E. 320 (taxes); Rhead v. Huonson (1881) 46 Mich. 243, 9 N. W. 267. See Kimble v. Wotring (1900) 48 W. Va. 412, 37 S. E. 606 (where grantee discharged vendor's lien).

The decision in Lamb v. McIntire (1903) 183 Mass. 367, 67 N. E. 320, supra, is based partly, perhaps, on the inconclusive nature of the evidence to show fraud, the court saying that the master had found that the defendant, whose mortgage was attacked by creditors of the mortgagor, participated in the fraud. But there is also a finding that he was at least put on inquiry.

It is said in the abstract reported in Bogard v. Buckner (1884) 5 Ky. L. Rep. 856 (abstract) supra, that, the deed being set aside on the ground of actual fraud, the court properly refused to direct the repayment of the purchase money except that which had been paid in discharge of a valid mortgage lien.

Where a debtor conveyed mortgaged land to his son, who discharged the mortgage, the court in Rhead v. Huonson (1881) 46 Mich. 243, 9 N. W. 267, supra, although stating that both the grantor and grantee participated in the design to defeat a creditor of the grantor, held that on a bill by the creditor in aid of execution, such a part of the land should be set off as constituted the value of the mortgage, and the remaining land only subjected to sale. The court said that the expenditure by the grantee in paying the mortgage relieved the property from the burden and practically increased the interest in the land to the amount paid; and that it seemed right to regard this as raising an equity in favor of the grantee.

Although holding that the circumstances were so exceptional as to warrant the court, at the instance of the grantors, in ordering a reconveyance on the ground that the parties to the fraudulent conveyance were not in pari delicto, the grantors being ignorant negroes who conveyed the property to a merchant, in whom they had confidence, at his solicitation and advice that it was necessary to protect them against a threatened suit, the court, in Hutchinson v. Park (1904) 72 Ark. 509, 82 S. W. 843, held that the grantee was entitled, as a condition to such reconveyance, to reimbursement for taxes paid by him on the property. It will be observed that the questions in issue in this case were between the parties to the fraud, the action being by the grantors, and not by their creditors, to set aside the conveyance.

In Ackerman v. Merle (1902) 137 Cal. 169, 69 Pac. 983, although the grantee in the fraudulent conveyance was a party to the fraud, and received the conveyance without any consideration therefore, for the purpose of assisting the grantor to avoid her debts, it was held, in an action by the administrator of the latter, to set aside the conveyance, that the grantee, who had discharged a mortgage on the property, was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee. The court said that the creditors were entitled to subject to the payment of their claims only the property fraudulently conveyed; that this property consisted of the grantor's interest in the land, which was that of a mortgagor with a right to redeem from the mortgage; that by the fraudulent deed the grantee did not acquire the interest of the mortgagee in the land, but acquired that interest by paying off the mortgage debt,—an independent transaction, in no way tainted with fraud nor accompanied with an intention to avoid creditors; that in equity the creditors could not complain that the grantee was subrogated to the rights of the original mortgagee, their rights in the property not being enlarged nor extended by the fraudulent transfer; and that they could obtain nothing for the mere sake of punishing fraudulent grantee, but were entitled in equity to have only such interest in the property applied to the satisfaction of their claims as had been fraudulently conveyed.

And in Garner v. Philips (1872) 35 Iowa, 597, although, so far as appears, the grantee in a fraudulent conveyance was a party to the fraud, the court stating that the evidence established the fact that the conveyances were made by the parties thereto for the purpose of placing the property beyond the reach of creditors, it was held that, as the grantee, subsequent to the conveyance, had paid a mortgage which was a prior lien on the property, and there was no fraud in this transaction, he should be subrogated to the rights of the original mortgagee, as against creditors of the grantor whose judgments were subject to the lien of the mortgage.

In Smith v. Grimes (1876) 43 Iowa, 356, although it appears that the grantee in the fraudulent conveyance was a party to the fraud, with actual knowledge thereof, it was held that, as against judgment creditors of the grantor, he was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the holders of prior mortgage and judgment liens on the property which he had paid and which had been assigned to him; in other words, that the mortgage and judgments paid by the grantee and assigned to him were in his hands liens on the land prior to the claims of the subsequent judgment creditors of the grantor. The court said that the fact that the deed to the grantee could not be supported against the grantor's creditors did not affect the grantee's right to the liens, the assignment of which must be regarded as valid; that it was true the deed was fraudulent as to creditors, but the court was not required to punish the fraud by setting aside the assignment and holding the liens to have been paid; that it was required to determine the rights of the parties, and not to administer punitive justice.

Where the mortgagee, who had accepted payment of the mortgage from the grantee, brought suit, as a judgment creditor of the grantor, to set aside the conveyance as fraudulent, it was held that while the acceptance of payment did not estop him from maintaining the action, yet the grantee was entitled to subrogation to the plaintiff's right as mortgagee although he had actual knowledge of the grantor's fraudulent intent before payment of the consideration. Arnold v. Hescholdt (1897) 69 Minn. 101, 71 N. W. 829.

In Smiser v. Stevens (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 501, 45 S. W. 357, where, in a conveyance from a husband to the wife, she assumed payment of a mortgage on the property, the court, although stating that it did not sufficiently appear that she was in fault, or that she accepted the conveyance with the intent of defrauding or hindering the creditors of the grantor, said that even if she had knowledge of such intent on the part of the latter, it would be inequitable to leave her bound for the payment of the mortgage, and that it was error to render judgment for a sale of the land without determination of the validity of the mortgage; that if in fact there was a mortgage on the land, it should have been enforced and adjudged prior to any claim of the creditors.

Without deciding whether, under any circumstances, a grantee who is guilty of actual fraud is entitled, on the setting aside of the conveyance at the instance of creditors of the grantor, to reimbursement for sums expended to purchase prior mortgages on the property, the court in McLean v. Letchford (1882) 60 Miss. 169, held that the grantee was not entitled to reimbursement where he had not sustained the burden of showing that the mortgages were purchased with his own means, and not from the proceeds of the property itself.

b. Constructive fraud.

In case of claimant under or representative of grantee, see infra, II. c.

Where the grantee in a fraudulent conveyance is not guilty of actual fraud, but is chargeable with knowledge of such facts that the law holds him guilty of constructive fraud, the authorities are apparently agreed that, on the setting aside of the conveyance, he is equitably entitled to reimbursement for sums expended by him in good faith to discharge taxes or prior mortgages on the property.

It was held in Hicks v. Beals (1917) 83 Or. 82, L.R.A.1917D, 1067, 163 Pac. 83, supra, that one who, in good faith, without knowledge of the Bulk Sales Law or claim against the property, purchased stock of merchandise for full value, without complying with the provisions of such law, paying off, as part of the consideration, a chattel mortgage on the property, which was satisfied, was entitled to subrogation to the lien of the mortgage when the property was attached by creditors of the vendor because of the noncompliance with the statute.

And in La Salle Opera House Co. v. La Salle Amusement Co. (1919) 289 Ill. 194, 124 N. E. 454, supra, where a sale was fraudulent as against creditors under the Bulk Sales Act, and the vendor, out of the purchase money, paid liens to which the property sold was subject, the vendee was held entitled to the benefit of the equitable principle that when a conveyance of property has been avoided by creditors of a grantor, it may be upheld in favor of a grantee who is free from actual fraud to the extent of the actual consideration, and he may be subrogated to the rights of the holder of liens whose encumbrances he has paid.

So, where a sale of a stock of goods was fraudulent as to creditors because not in compliance with the Bulk Sales Law, but the seller and purchaser acted in good faith, it was held in Adams v. Young (1909) 200 Mass. 568, 86 N. E. 942, supra, that the purchaser, who had taken an assignment of a mortgage on the property, was entitled to rely on the mortgage on the setting aside of the transfer. The court recognized also the rule that the vendee, guilty only of constructive fraud, is entitled, without an assignment, to subrogation to the rights of a mortgagee, where he has discharged a mortgage on the property.

Where the grantee paid a mortgage on the property assumed as part of the consideration for the conveyance, which was set aside at the instance of creditors of the grantor, not because actual fraud was shown, but because of the legal inference of fraud, it was held that the conveyance should stand as security for the sum so paid by the grantee. Anderson v. Fuller (1840) 16 S. C. Eq. (1 M'Mull.) 27, 36 Am. Dec. 290.

And where a conveyance was made by a husband to his wife for the purpose of defrauding creditors, but the wife accepted the deed without the intention to defraud creditors, and without full knowledge of the insolvency of the husband, and thereafter paid with her separate property valid prior mortgage and tax liens on the property, it was held that, as against creditors of the husband, she was entitled to a lien on the property for the amount so expended. Printz v. Brown (1918) 31 Idaho, 443, 174 Pac. 1012.

The law will not visit a punishment or penalty on a grantee in a fraudulent conveyance who is guilty only of constructive fraud by refusing to allow him a lien on the property for taxes and encumbrances thereon which were a valid lien, and which he has discharged. Ibid.

Where a conveyance by a husband to his wife of an equity of redemption was voluntary, and therefore voidable as to antecedent creditors, without respect to the intention of the parties in making the conveyance, it was held in Costello v. Prospect Brewing Co. (1894) 52 N. J. Eq. 557, 30 Atl. 682, that the wife, who, after the conveyance, had paid a part of the mortgage debt, was entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee for the amount paid, on the setting aside of the conveyance in a suit by creditors of the husband.

On the principle that where a grantee, guilty only of constructive fraud, has discharged a valid prior encumbrance on the property, on the setting aside of a conveyance at the instance of creditors of the grantor, the conveyance will be allowed to stand as security for the sum so paid, the court in Milholland v. Tiffany (1885) 64 Md. 455, 2 Atl. 831, held that a third person with constructive notice of the fraud, who discharges an encumbrance on the property at the request of both the grantor and grantee, taking at the time as security a mortgage on the property which proves defective, should be subrogated, on the setting aside of the conveyance, to the rights of the mortgagee, where there were no intervening creditors.

The distinction between actual and constructive fraud in allowing reimbursement for taxes and the discharge of encumbrances on the property conveyed (see supra, II. b) is not confined to the grantee himself, but is equally applicable to those who claim through him; so that, although the grantee may be precluded from such reimbursement by reason of actual fraud on his part, one claiming through such grantee, although constructively chargeable with knowledge of the fraud, may be entitled to reimbursement for sums expended in good faith to discharge prior liens on the property. Lynch v. Burt (1904) 67 C. C. A. 305, 132 Fed. 417.

A similar conclusion was reached in Tompkins v. Sprout (1880) 55 Cal. 31, and Tibbetts v. Terrill (1914) 26 Colo. App. 64, 140 Pac. 936. In the latter case, the court said: "The general rule seems to be that a fraudulent grantee who has actually and knowingly participated in the fraud, has no standing in a court of equity for any purpose, and will not be subrogated or otherwise protected from moneys paid in discharging liens existing at the time of the fraudulent purchase. We think, however, that a purchaser from such fraudulent grantee, who has only constructive knowledge of the fraud, and has no knowledge or information of the fraudulent intention of those perpetrating the same, and in no way participates therein, ought not to be denied relief in a court of equity, where such relief works no injury to others."

It was held in Bomberger v. Turner (1862) 13 Ohio St. 263, 82 Am. Dec. 438, that, on the setting aside of a conveyance at the instance of creditors of the grantor, on the ground of fraud, compensation should be allowed for taxes innocently paid on the property by the fraudulent grantee's heir, to whom the property had been assigned in partition.

Executors of the grantee, who died pending the action to set aside the conveyance, were held entitled to subrogation to the rights of a mortgagee whose mortgage they had discharged, when it became due pending an appeal from a decision that the grantee was not shown to have had knowledge of the fraud, and that the conveyance should not have been set aside, since they were not volunteers, although the conveyance was subsequently set aside in the court of appeals, and the executors had constructive notice at the time of the payment of another action begun by creditors to set aside the conveyance. Lilinthil v. Lesser (1905) 102 App. Div. 500, 92 N. Y. Supp. 619, affirmed without opinion in (1906) 185 N. Y. 557, 77 N. E. 1190.

In many of the cases cited in II. a, supra, it seems that the evidence of actual fraud on the part of the grantee was clear, and the court, having found such fraud so as to require a decree setting aside the conveyance as a fraud upon creditors, applied the rule of that subdivision and denied reimbursement without considering in that connection the conclusiveness or satisfactoriness of the evidence upon which the finding of actual fraud on the part of the grantee was predicated. In some cases, however, the courts, while regarding the evidence as to actual fraud on the part of the grantee as sufficiently convincing to warrant the setting aside of the conveyance, have thought that it was not sufficiently clear and conclusive to warrant the application of the rule which denies the grantee the right to reimbursement.

Where there are suspicious circumstances, but the evidence of fraud is not clear and conclusive, the conveyance may be permitted to stand for reimbursement to the fraudulent grantee of sums expended by him to discharge prior liens on the property. Parr v. Saunders (1880) 1 Va. Dec. 724, 11 S. E. 979 (vendor's lien discharged by grantee).

And where the proof of fraud on the part of the grantee in a fraudulent conveyance was not clear and conclusive, although the transaction, the court stated, might have involved actual fraud, in a legal sense, it was held in Leqve v. Stoppel (1896) 64 Minn. 74, 66 N. W. 208, that the conveyance should stand as security for reimbursement to the grantee of a sum paid by him to discharge a mortgage on the property, and on a sale of the property the grantee should be reimbursed out of the proceeds.

Referring to the doctrine that where a conveyance is tainted with actual fraud, it is absolutely void, although founded on a valuable consideration, and should not be allowed to stand for any purpose, either for reimbursement or indemnity of the grantee, the court in Leqve v. Stoppel (Minn.) supra, said: "An examination of the authorities satisfies us that this is too broad a statement of the law. We admit that where the grantor and grantee have conspired together to commit a meditated, positive fraud, and the evidence of that fact is clear, no court ever has allowed or should allow the conveyance to stand for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity to the grantee, who was particeps criminis. Any other rule would be to offer protection to positive fraud. But it is a matter of common knowledge with courts and lawyers that there are frequently cases where conveyances are set aside on the ground of what, in the legal sense, constitutes an actual fraud, which nevertheless involves no moral turpitude, and where the parties did not actually intend to commit, or suppose that they were committing, a fraud. There are also frequently cases where the circumstances are so suspicious that the court does not feel warranted in allowing the conveyance to stand, but the evidence of fraud is by no means clear or conclusive. To meet the requirements of justice in all these classes of cases, a more elastic rule should obtain than the mere presence or absence of actual fraud, in its broadest legal sense. And an examination of the adjudged cases shows that the courts have never been inclined to tie themselves down to any such hard-and-fast rule. The English courts seem to feel themselves at liberty, after looking at all the facts, and giving to each its due weight, to deal with each case according to their own ideas of right and justice. Numerous English cases can be found where the court, while setting aside the conveyance, has decreed that it stand as security for money actually paid by the grantee, even where he appeared to have been a partaker of the fraud, but the proof was not entirely clear. . . . The best American authorities have frequently announced a similar flexible rule, which left them at liberty to do equity in each particular case according as the facts appeared."

Of facts not within the scope of the annotation, it was said in Bean v. Smith (1821) 2 Mason, 252, Fed. Cas. No. 1,174, that while a conveyance which is fraudulent in fact is absolutely void and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity, it is otherwise with a deed obtained under suspicious or inequitable circumstances. To the same effect is Alley v. Connell (1859) 3 Head (Tenn.) 578.

The rule that a conveyance under suspicious circumstances may be permitted to stand as security for claims by the grantee against the grantor is approved also in Boyd v. Dunlap (1815) 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 478.

The court in Anderson v. Fuller (1840) 16 S. C. Eq. (1 M'Mull.) 27, 36 Am. Dec. 290, stated that in general, when a conveyance is set aside for fraud, it is within the discretion of the court to decree the conveyance to stand as a security for the money actually paid; and that this is commonly done where there is no imputation of moral fraud, or the proof of actual fraud is in any degree doubtful.

And the doctrine that in equity a fraudulent grantee or vendee may or may not be allowed reimbursement for sums expended by him, on the setting aside of the sale, is stated, on facts not within the scope of the annotation, in Clements v. Nicholson (1867) 6 Wall. (U. S.) 299, 18 L. ed. 786, as follows: "A sale may be void for bad faith though the buyer pays the full value of the property bought. This is the consequence where his purpose is to aid the seller in perpetrating a fraud upon his creditors, and where he buys recklessly, with guilty knowledge. Where the fact of fraud is established in a suit at law, the buyer loses the property without reference to the amount or application of what he has paid, and he can have no relief either at law or in equity. When the proceeding is in chancery, the jurisdiction exercised is more flexible and tolerant. The equity appealed to—while it scans the transaction with the severest scrutiny—looks at all the facts, and, giving to each one its due weight, deals with the subject before it according to its own ideas of right and justice. In some instances it visits the buyer with the same consequences which would have followed in an action at law. In others, it allows a security to stand for the amount advanced upon it. In others, it compels the buyer to account only for the difference between the under price which he paid and the value of the property. In others, although he may have paid the full value and the property may have passed beyond the reach of the process of the court, it regards him as a trustee, and charges him accordingly. Where he has honestly applied the property to the liabilities of the seller, it may hold him excused from further responsibility. The cardinal principle in all such cases is, that the property of the debtor shall not be diverted from the payment of his debts to the injury of his creditors, by means of the fraud."

See Lamb v. McIntire (1903) 183 Mass. 367, 67 N. E. 320, cited under II. a, supra, where the holding that a fraudulent mortgagee, on the setting aside of the mortgage, should be reimbursed for taxes paid on the property, is based partly, perhaps, on the inconclusive nature of the evidence to show that the mortgagee participated in the fraud.

III. Accounting for rents and profits or proceeds of property.

The authorities are more agreed as to the rights of the fraudulent grantee to an allowance, on an accounting for rents and profits or the proceeds of the property, for expenditures for the discharge of taxes and encumbrances, than in an action merely to set aside the conveyance, where no accounting is sought. In the former case, where the fraud on the part of the grantee is constructive only, there is apparently no question but that an allowance should be made to the grantee, on an accounting for rents and profits or for the proceeds of the property, for expenditures made in good faith by him for taxes or to discharge encumbrances on the property which were prior to the rights of creditors of the grantor. Potter v. Gracie (1877) 58 Ala. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 748 (mortgage and taxes); Gordon v. Tweedy (1883) 74 Ala. 232, 49 Am. Rep. 813 (taxes); Bartram v. Burns (1897) 19 Ky. L.

Rep. 1295, 43 S. W. 248, 686 (taxes); Brown v. Townsend (1889) 8 N. Y. Supp. 61, reversed on other grounds in (1892) 135 N. Y. 174, 31 N. E. 1030 (taxes and interest on encumbrances).

A grantee in a conveyance which is constructively fraudulent as against creditors is entitled, on an accounting for use and occupation of the premises, to an allowance for taxes paid during his occupancy thereof, whether before or after the filing of the bill by creditors to set aside the conveyance. Gordon v. Tweedy (1883) 74 Ala. 232, 49 Am. Rep. 813, supra.

And a similar result has generally been reached even where the grantee was guilty of actual fraud. Young v. Walsh (1885) 115 Ill. 264, 3 N. E. 512; How v. Camp (1844) Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 427; King v. Wilcox (1845) 11 Paige (N. Y.) 589; Loos v. Wilkinson (1889) 113 N. Y. 485, 4 L.R.A. 353, 10 Am. St. Rep. 495, 21 N. E. 892; Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Halsted (1892) 134 N. Y. 520, 30 Am. St. Rep. 693, 31 N. E. 900.

Thus, in Loos v. Wilkinson (1889) 113 N. Y. 485, 4 L.R.A. 353, 10 Am. St. Rep. 495, 21 N. E. 392, supra, it was held that a grantee, on an accounting for rent after the conveyance had been set aside in a suit by the grantor's creditors because of fraud to which the grantee was a party, was entitled to be credited with the amount paid by him for taxes, and interest on mortgages which were valid liens on the property so far as the same was within the rate which could have been enforced by the mortgagee. The court said: "It is true that a fraudulent grant to a grantee who is a guilty participant in the fraud must, as to the creditors of the grantor, be treated as void ab initio. But the only way the creditors can reach the rent and profits received by the grantee is by an accounting in equity. And what does such an accounting mean. Does it mean that he shall pay for more rent than he has received, or could have received, for more profit than he has made, or could have made? Shall he account to the creditors for more rents than they could have received if they had had possession of the real estate?

. . . To answer these queries in the affirmative would, even in a court of equity, be a wide departure from the rule of compensation. It would be spoliation, not justice or equity. A court of equity does not sit for the punishment of criminals . . . when the creditors of the grantor come into a court of equity seeking to compel him to account for rents and profits, the accounting must be upon equitable principles; and when he has been compelled to surrender the property conveyed to him, and to account for all the profits he has made, or could have made, or ought to have made therefrom the ends of justice have been completely and exactly attained."

And where the grantee was guilty of actual fraud, the court in How v. Camp (1844) Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 427, supra, held that on an accounting for rents and profits, where the conveyance was set aside at the instance of creditors, the grantee should be allowed credit for taxes paid on the property.

In Young v. Walsh (Ill.) supra, it was held that, on an accounting for rents and profits, the grantees should be subrogated to the rights of mortgagees, if they had discharged the encumbrances, although the court stated that there was almost irresistible evidence that they must have known that the grantors were deliberately trying to defraud their creditors.

A distinction as to the rights of the grantee guilty of actual fraud, to reimbursement for sums paid to discharge taxes and prior encumbrances on the property, between cases where the suit is merely to set aside the fraudulent conveyance and cases where an accounting is sought by creditors of the grantor, is made in Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward (1897) 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271, the court refusing to allow reimbursement where the suit was merely to set aside the conveyance, although intimating that where the grantee is asked to account for rents and profits, or for the value of the property, he may be allowed reimbursements for sums paid to discharge prior liens on the property.

pose of punishing the fraudulent grantee or transferee, will not compel him to account, on the setting aside of the conveyance or transfer, for a larger sum than could have been realized thereon by creditors had the conveyance or transfer not occurred. Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Halsted (1892) 134 N. Y. 520, 30 Am. St. Rep. 693, 31 N. E. 900, supra. In this case it was held that an assignee of securities, which, to secure a loan, had been pledged before the assignment, and after the assignment had been sold for a larger sum than the amount of the loan, was accountable to creditors of the assignor only for the surplus received by him. It appears that the assignee was a party to the fraud. It was contended that the assignee should be held accountable to the creditors of the assignor for the entire value of the securities, and that a court of equity would hold him liable to this extent by way of punishment for his participation in the fraud. In reply to this contention, the court said: "While it is true that cases abound where the courts, in an action to set aside a deed or transfer of personal property on the ground of fraud, have refused to allow the fraudulent grantee or transferee to be reimbursed the money actually paid as a consideration for the conveyance or transfer, and in the course of discussion have treated the refusal of the court to allow any reimbursement whatever as a proper punishment for the fraud, it has never been assumed, so far as we have observed, that the refusal to allow reimbursement for moneys paid was based on the right of a court of equity to punish the party because of his wrongdoing. The effect of the decisions may have been to punish quite severely the fraudulent grantee or transferee, but the courts did not have the power to deprive him of one dollar because they deemed him deserving punishment. If a fraudulent transferee sell the property before the commencement of the action to set aside the transfer, a judgment for the value of the interests transferred to him may be recovered; but, however scandalous the fraud may be, the court is powerless to award judgment against him for a sum exceeding such value. Other tribunals than courts of equity administer the law which has for its object the punishment of the guilty."

The right of the fraudulent grantee in an accounting for rent and profits, on the setting aside of the conveyance, to an allowance for interest paid on a mortgage on the property which is a prior lien to the claims of creditors of the grantor, is recognized also in Hamilton Nat. Bank v. Halsted (N. Y.) supra, although the point was not necessary to the decision.

However, the Maryland court in Strike's Case (1826) 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 57, affirmed in (1828) 2 Harr. & G. 191, rejected the claim of the fraudulent grantee, who was a party to the fraud, to an allowance, on an accounting for rents and profits, for sums paid for taxes, street assessments, and ground rent, to which the property was subject. It was said that the grantee, as against the creditors of the grantor, was an "uninvited officious mala fide meddler with property which he knew did not belong to him, and which he was apprised ought to be liable to the claims of [the grantor's] creditors. He made these advances to serve himself, not for the benefit of these complainants; and if he had an intention that these advances should inure to the personal benefit of anyone, it must have been to [the grantor]; because it was from him he took the estate; and if the conveyances were to be annulled, it was only against him he could seek reimbursement. . . . [The grantee], therefore, cannot have, against these complainants, any shadow of counter-vailing equity on which to rest his claim for these advances, out of the proceeds directed to be brought into court."

Strike's Case (Md.) supra, was considered in Loos v. Wilkinson (1889) 113 N. Y. 485, 4 L.R.A. 353, 10 Am. St. Rep. 495, 21 N. E. 392, supra, but the New York court in the latter case reached an opposite conclusion, stating that, so far as the Maryland court decided that "the fraudulent grantee should be made to account for rents and profits without any allowance for taxes, assessments, and ground rents paid by him, it is, we believe, unsupported by any authority, and stands without a fellow in this country or in England."

Thompson v. Bickford (1872) 19 Minn. 17, Gil. 1, also, supports the proposition that if the grantee in a fraudulent conveyance is guilty of actual fraud, he is not entitled, on an accounting for rents and profits, to an allowance for sums paid by him for taxes and to extinguish liens or encumbrances on the property.

In determining the amount due from the wife to a creditor of the husband, where the latter had made a fraudulent transfer of personal property to the wife, who had disposed of the same, the court, in Jewell v. Kelley (1914) 180 Mich. 61, 146 N. W. 402, approved an allowance to the wife for payment by her of a chattel mortgage on the property at the time of the sale. Whether the transferee was regarded as guilty of actual or only constructive fraud does not clearly appear. In an earlier appeal, reported in (1909) 155 Mich. 301, 118 N. W. 987, the court said that it was far from being convinced that the bill of sale was not given and received with an intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors.

IV. As to affirmative relief of grantee.

Where the grantee in a conveyance in fraud of creditors participates in the fraud, his only rights, if any, according to the weight of authority, are by way of reducing the recovery against him on an accounting, and he cannot set up any claim in equity to affirmative relief on account of taxes or encumbrances discharged by him. This is the effect of the majority of the decisions already cited. And the point has been expressly made in a few cases.

Where a grantee, guilty of actual fraud, is merely on the defensive, as in an accounting for the rents and profits while he occupied the premises, the case is very different as to his right to a deduction for taxes and interest on mortgages, than if he were obliged to come into a court of equity asking for affirmative relief and for the enforcement of these claims against the property; in the latter case, the court might leave him where his fraud had placed him, while on an accounting for rents and profits he should be compelled to account only for such rents and profits as he actually received or could have received. Loos v. Wilkinson (1889) 113 N. Y. 485, 4 L.R.A. 353, 10 Am. St. Rep. 495, 21 N. E. 892.

The same distinction is brought out in Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward (1897) 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271. The court admitted that so far as the creditors of the grantor were concerned, where the fraudulent conveyance was set aside, their equities would not entitle them to more, as against the grantee, than they could have realized had there been no conveyance, and that the grantee might be entitled to reimbursement for taxes or encumbrances which were prior liens to the claims of the creditors. But it was held that where an accounting was not sought against the grantee for rents and profits, but the conveyance was merely set aside for fraud, in which he had participated, his fraud prevented him from invoking the aid of a court of equity for relief by way of reimbursement for taxes and encumbrances discharged by him, the court apparently taking the view that even though the grantee was merely a defendant against whom the creditors were seeking to set aside the conveyance, he was in effect asserting a right to affirmative relief so far as he claimed the right to such reimbursement, where the suit was not for an accounting, but merely to set aside the conveyance.

Second-mortgage bondholders of a railroad who fraudulently obtained a conveyance of the property to them on failure of the company to pay the interest coupons, and who discharged the first-mortgage bonds were held in Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Soutter (1872) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 517, 20 L. ed. 543, not entitled to sue the first-mortgage bondholders and recover the amount so paid to them, as paid under a mistake of fact, when the conveyance was set aside at the instance of creditors. The court said: "Who are the complainants? Are they not the very bondholders, self-incorporated into a body politic, who, through their trustee and agent, affected the sale which was declared fraudulent and void, as against creditors, and made the purchase which has been set aside for that cause? Was it ever known that a fraudulent purchaser of property, when deprived of its possession, could recover for his repairs or improvements, or for encumbrances lifted by him whilst in possession? If such a case can be found in the books, we have not been referred to it. Whatever a man does to benefit an estate, under such circumstances, he does in his own wrong. He cannot get relief by coming into a court of equity."

A different conclusion has been reached, however, where the grantee was guilty only of constructive fraud.

Thus, one who, in violation of the Bulk Sales Law, in good faith and without knowledge of the law or of claims against the property, purchased a stock of merchandise for full value, paying off, as part of the consideration, a chattel mortgage on the property, which was satisfied, was held in Hicks v. Beals (1917) 83 Or. 82, L.R.A.1917D, 1067, 163 Pac. 83, entitled to maintain a suit against the vendor and his creditors for the revival of the mortgage and for subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee, where the property has been attached by creditors because of noncompliance with the statute. The court said that it was contended on the part of the creditors that a merger could not be defeated by a plaintiff asking for affirmative relief in the same manner in which it could be resisted as a defense; that a sufficient answer to this contention was that the defendant was seeking to subject the property to the payment of its claims, and in defense the plaintiff was compelled to institute the suit; and that the form of the action or situation of the parties, whether plaintiff or defendant, was not a controlling feature.

Without deciding whether, under any circumstances, a grantee in a fraudulent conveyance who is guilty of constructive fraud may have relief on account of payment of a mortgage on the property, assumed as a part of the consideration for the conveyance, the court in Wiley v. Knight (1855) 27 Ala. 336, held that such relief would not be granted on a bill by the grantee to reform the conveyance, where to permit the setting up of the mortgage would take the defendant entirely by surprise and result in a decree predicated on a state of facts precisely the opposite of those charged in the bill.

V. Conclusions.

To indicate what appears to be the better rule, in view of the conflict of the cases on the present question, it may be said that the weight of authority and the better reasoning appear to support the view that the grantee who is guilty of actual fraud is not entitled to reimbursement, on the setting aside of the conveyance, for sums expended by him to discharge liens for taxes and encumbrances, not because a court of equity desires to punish him for his fraud, although this may be the result of the ruling, but because the conveyance is absolutely void as to creditors, and the grantee therefore pays as would a stranger to the property, and also because to permit the conveyance to stand as security for sums so expended would be to that extent to give affirmative relief to a party to a fraudulent contract. But, on the other hand, if the grantee is only guilty of constructive fraud he has an equity which entitles him to subrogation, on the setting aside of the conveyance, to the rights of holders of prior liens for taxes or encumbrances which he has discharged. If an accounting is sought for the rents and profits or the proceeds of a sale of the property, the grantee may reduce the recovery by the amount of taxes paid and prior encumbrances discharged by him, and this is true, according to the weight of authority, whether he is guilty of actual or only constructive fraud. So, also, subrogation may be allowed, in the discretion of the court, if the proof of fraud is not clear, but the circumstances are too suspicious for the court to permit the conveyance to stand. R. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Snohomish County (Pemberton, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the flooding of plaintiff's land, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Hathaway, Beebe, & Hathaway and J. Y. Kennedy for appellant.
Messrs. Coleman & Fogarty and W. P. Bell for respondent.

Bridges, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit for damages caused by overflow.

The respondent was engaged in the logging and lumbering business. To assist it in its operations, a number of years prior to March, 1916, it built a dam near its works for the purpose of creating a backwater pond. In order to do this it dug a ditch from Lake Hanson creek to Worthy creek, in Snohomish county, and dug another ditch from Worthy creek to its dam. The purpose of these ditches was to divert a part or all of the water of these two creeks to its dam for the purpose of creating the pond. The pond thus created covered from 5 to 15 acres of land and was from 3 to 6 feet in depth. The appellant owned a farm about  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a mile below the respondent's pond. The complaint alleged that during the month of March, 1916, through the carelessness and negligence of the respondent in constructing the dam, and in failing to properly maintain and keep the same in repair, and because it had become old and insufficient, the dam and the gates thereof gave way and released large quantities of water stored thereby, which waters flooded over the appellant's land, causing damage thereto for which he sought recovery. The case was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of respondent. Judgment was entered on this verdict, and the appeal is from that judgment.

At the trial the appellant offered evidence tending to prove that the flood waters caused by the breaking of the dam had deposited on the appellant's land sand and gravel. The trial court sustained objections to this testimony on the ground that it was not within the pleadings. The complaint very particularly mentioned the features of damage. It alleged that "the top soil of plaintiff's premises was eroded and washed out, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $960; a certain creek running through the plaintiff's premises was filled up with stumps and other debris for a distance of about 160 rods, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $350; two bridges were washed out, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $25; 10 rods of puncheon were washed out, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $25, together with about 100 feet of fence, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $20."

It will thus be seen that, although the complaint very specifically alleges the various items of damage, it wholly fails to refer to any deposit of sand or gravel on the land. A bill of particulars could not have more definitely given the various items for which recovery was sought, and where there is a bill of particulars proof will be restricted to the matters therein set out. Powers v. Washington Portland Cement Co. 79 Wash. 1, 139 Pac. 615. In the case of Eckhart v. Peterson, 94 Wash. 379, 162 Pac. 557, this court held that where the complaint sets out the specific items of damage the plaintiff will not be permitted, over objection, to prove other items. Horton v. Seattle, 53 Wash. 316, 101 Pac. 1091.

pleading.*

If the appellant had asked to have his complaint amended so as to include this item of damage, it would have been the duty of the court to have granted the permission, unless it appeared that the respondent would have been misled, taken by surprise, or injured thereby. But appellant did not ask the amendment. Clearly, the offered proof was not within the pleadings, and the court did not err in its ruling.

amendment to include additional items of injury.*

The appellant next complains of certain instructions given by the court to the jury on the duty of the respondent in the construction and maintenance of the dam. The instructions complained of, the wording of which we will presently notice, the appellant claims did not impose upon the respondent a proper or sufficiently high degree of care.

A few of the earlier cases seem to have held that one creating a pond of water by means of a dam does so at his own peril, and can defend against a claim for damages because of flooding only on the ground that the damage was caused by an act of God. Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, 12 Jur. N. S. 603, 14

Week. Rep. 799, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 235; Defiance Water Co. v. Olinger, 54 Ohio St. 532, 32 L.R.A. 736, 44 N. E. 238. But the more recent and unquestionably the greater weight of authority holds to a less strict and we believe a much more just rule of liability, and one which, while properly protecting the rights of others, encourages business development. The rule is that one who, by means of a dam, impounds the water of a stream, is required to exercise such reasonable care and caution in the construction, maintenance, and operation of the dam as a reasonably careful and prudent man, who was acquainted with the nature and habits of the stream, the features of the surrounding country, the snow and rain falls, and other conditions likely to cause freshets, would exercise under like circumstances. This rule would cover the stream not only in its ordinary and usual condition as to water, but also when in such unusual and extraordinary flood and freshet as such careful and prudent man would reasonably expect; but the dam owner would not be negligent in failing to provide against unprecedented floods or freshets or act of God. Maplewood Farm Co. v. Seattle, 88 Wash. 634, 153 Pac. 1061; Dahlgren v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 85 Wash. 395, 148 Pac. 567; Kuhnis v. Lewis River Boom & Logging Co. 51 Wash. 196, 98 Pac. 655; 40 Cyc. 683; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 688; 3 Farnham, Waters, p. 2798; Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Bridges, 86 Ala. 448, 11 Am. St. Rep. 58, 5 So. 864; Todd v. Cochell, 17 Cal. 97, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 655.

Let us see if the court's instructions, taken as a whole, will measure up to these requirements.

In its instruction No. 5, the court instructed the jury that "if the defendant used ordinary care in constructing and maintaining said dam, . . . it is not liable, and your verdict must be for the defendant. I further instruct you that ordinary care means such care as ordinarily prudent men would exercise under like conditions, when the risk is their own.

The trial court's instruction No. 6 was to the effect that the defendant would be required to use "ordinary care, that is, that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person would use under the same or similar circumstances, and under this rule the dam must be sufficient to withstand not only the usual and ordinary freshets, but must also be sufficient to withstand such extraordinary freshets as an ordinarily prudent person would reasonably expect to occur. If you find from the evidence that there was an unusually large fall of snow in January and February, 1916, and that snow melted away very rapidly in March and caused unusually high freshets, such that an ordinarily prudent person, in the construction and maintenance of the dam in question, would not reasonably have expected to occur, and caused the damage to plaintiff, if you find there was any damage, then in that event the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

It has been held time and again that one maintaining a dam of this character is bound to use only reasonable care and prudence. The case of Maplewood Farm Co. v. Seattle, supra, was very similar to the case at bar. The court said: "In the instruction defining negligence, the degree of care which the city was held to in building the superstructure was that of reasonable and ordinary care. The appellant requested an instruction which imposed upon the city a higher degree of care than that of ordinary care in the construction of the superstructure. The instructions given correctly state the law."

At page 388, vol. 13, Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed., it is said: "That rule in relation to the present subject [floods] requires that each proprietor in exercising his own rights in his own territory shall act with reasonable skill and care to avoid injury to others, and as an approximate rule for measuring that degree it is laid down to be such skill, care, and diligence as men of common and ordinary prudence in relation to similar subjects would exercise in the conduct of their own affairs." Wolf v. St. Louis Independent Water Co. 10 Cal. 541, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 541.

See also, to the same effect, the cases hereinabove cited.

We have no doubt that all of instruction No. 5 and all but the last paragraph of instruction No. 6 properly state the law. In the latter portion of instruction No. 6 the trial court was somewhat unfortunate in the selection of his words. He instructed the jury that if the melting snow "caused an unusually high freshet, such that an ordinarily prudent person, in the construction and maintenance of the dam in question, would not reasonably have expected to occur," then the plaintiff could not recover. As such reasonably prudent person must, of necessity, expect unusually high freshets, it is plain that the court meant and referred to unprecedentedly high or extraordinary freshets. In the earlier part of this instruction the court, in the same connection, spoke of "extraordinary" high freshets, and it is plain that in the latter portion of the instruction he used the expression "unusually high freshets" in the sense of "extraordinary high freshets." It may be said generally that there are three stages of freshets: The ordinary freshet, the extraordinary freshet, and the unprecedented freshet. Avery v. Vermont Electric Co. 75 Vt. 235, 59 L.R.A. 817, 98 Am. St. Rep. 818, 54 Atl. 179, and especially the note at pages 876 et seq., of 59 L.R.A. Such of any of these freshets or floods as from climatic and geographical conditions may reasonably be expected, whether of frequent or infrequent occurrence, must be taken into consideration in estimating hazards attending the obstructions of a watercourse. Gulf Red Cedar Co. v. Walker, 132 Ala. 553, 31 So. 374, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 179; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Ramey, 139 Ill. 9, 32 Am. St. Rep. 176, 28 N. E. 1087; Van Duzer v. Elmira, C. & N. R. Co. 75 Hun, 487, 27 N. Y. Supp. 474; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Schaffer, 26 Ill. App. 280.

Taking these instructions as a whole, it is perfectly plain that the court instructed that respondent's dam must be sufficient to withstand all such freshets or floods as an ordinarily prudent person, having knowledge of the conditions, would have expected to occur.

We think the court's instructions may be open to some criticism because they did not express more fully the idea that the reasonably prudent person therein mentioned should be a person who knew the surrounding country, the nature and habits of the stream, the likelihood of snow and rain fall, etc. But the court in instruction 5 told the jury that ordinary care meant such care as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise "under like conditions," and in instruction No. 6 the court spoke of ordinary care as meaning such care as an ordinarily prudent person would use under "the same or similar circumstances." The court unquestionably meant, and the jury must have understood, by the expression "like conditions" and "same or similar circumstances," the same thing as though the court had expressly required of such prudent person knowledge of the nature and habits of the stream, the snow and rain fall, and other surrounding circumstances and conditions. If the appellant had requested the court to amplify these instructions in this regard, it would doubtless have so done. But, taken as they were given by the court, we cannot conceive that the jury was misled. It would be absurd and against all rules of common sense for this court to reverse on broke, and the water so confined flowed over the plaintiff's lands; and this action was brought to recover alleged damages caused thereby. From a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, this appeal is taken. For more of the facts involved reference is made to the former opinion.

Generally speaking, there are two chief questions involved in a case of this character. The first is whether the dam owner must construct and maintain his dam entirely at his own peril, and as an insurer against damage, or whether he will be excused from damages caused by floods which he could not reasonably have anticipated, and, if the latter be the correct doctrine, then the care required of such dam owner to anticipate freshets and flood waters; and, secondly, whether, as to all floods and conditions which he is required to anticipate, he must maintain his dam at his peril and as an insurer, or will reasonable care be the measure of his duty? In our former opinion we meant to deal only with the first proposition mentioned. It was not necessary to a decision of the case that we should deal with the second proposition above mentioned, because the trial court had instructed the jury that defendant was bound to maintain his dam so that the same would withstand "not only the usual and ordinary freshets, but must also be sufficient to withstand such extraordinary freshets as an ordinarily prudent person would reasonably expect to occur." In other words, the trial court instructed the jury on the theory that the dam owner would be liable, regardless of the question of care or negligence, for damage resulting from the breaking of his dam, as the result of such floods as a reasonably prudent man would be required to anticipate.

This instruction was certainly as favorable to the appellant as he could have asked because it eliminated from the case the question of the negligence or lack of negligence of the defendant, and imposed upon it the duties of an insurer. We wish to say, however, that in the departmental opinion we did not mean to, nor do we now, either approve or condemn the instruction given by the trial court; we only hold that it was as favorable to the appellant as any view of the law would justify, and therefore he is not in position to complain.

On the first above-mentioned question we intended to hold, and we now hold, that the dam builder and owner does not build and maintain the dam at his absolute peril and is not an insurer, but that, on the contrary, he will be excused by acts of God, or floods which he could not have anticipated, and that he would be required to anticipate only such floods as a reasonably prudent man, acquainted with all of the surrounding circumstances, would anticipate. But it is said that this holding is in accordance with the doctrine of the cases of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, 12 Jur. N. S. 603, 14 Week. Rep. 799, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 235, and Defiance Water Co. v. Olinger, 54 Ohio St. 532, 32 L.R.A. 736, 44 N. E. 238, which cases this court in its first opinion seemed to criticize.

owner for injury caused by bursting.

We deem it unnecessary at this time to determine what those cases actually hold. It is sufficient to say that, if our holding is in accordance with the view of those cases, then we follow them; otherwise we do not.

I. General rule.

The purpose of a bill of particulars is, as was said in Saunders v. Osgood (1865) 46 N. H. 21, "to apprise the opposite party of the claims made upon him so fully as to guide him in his preparations for trial." Accordingly, as was said in the same case: "To allow the party furnishing such specification, to go beyond it, would be a surprise upon the other party." The effect of a bill of particulars is, therefore, to restrict the proof to the matters set forth therein.

Canada.—Young v. Erie & H. R. Co. (1895) 17 Ont. Pr. Rep. 4.

In Bowman v. Earle (1854) 3 Duer, (N. Y.) 691, the court said: "A bill of particulars has the effect to restrict the proofs and limit the recovery to the matters set forth in it."

In Morrisette v. Wood (1900) 128 Ala. 505, 30 So. 630, wherein the plaintiff had set forth the dates and number of his visits in his bill of particulars, it was held that he must be limited thereto.

And where the plaintiff has furnished a bill of particulars, stating his claim to be founded on a note, he cannot give evidence of the original consideration. Bank of United States v. Lyman (1848) 1 Blatchf. 297, Fed. Cas. No. 924; Wade v. Beasley (1801) 4 Esp. (Eng.) 7.

In Saunders v. Osgood (1865) 46 N. H. 21, it was pointed out that as regards giving evidence of matters outside the bill of particulars, the same principle applied to items of credit as to items of debit.

II. Application of rule.

a. Action on contract.

In Bank of U. S. v. Lyman (1848) 1 Blatchf. 297, Fed. Cas. No. 924, an action to recover for money had and received and on an account stated, it appeared that the defendant had agreed to purchase the property of a bank, and to give four notes in payment therefor. A bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiffs, stating their claim to be on two promissory notes. It was held that they were confined in their evidence to the bill of particulars, and could not give evidence of the original consideration.

In Hanson v. Smith (1899) 33 C. C. A. 581, 94 Fed. 960, an action to recover damages for breach of an option to sell certain mining property, the plaintiff's bill of particulars alleged a contract for the sale of the property to one Pennington. It was held that proof of a contract of sale to one Schlesinger was properly excluded.

In Morrisette v. Wood (1900) 128 Ala. 505, 30 So. 630, an action by a physician to recover for services rendered to the defendant's testator, plaintiff on demand furnished a bill of particulars, which contained the dates and number of visits made by him, and the charge for them. Witnesses could not testify to the correctness of the items, but stated that plaintiff's visits to defendant's testator had been frequent during a certain period of time. It was held that when a bill of particulars is furnished its effect is "to limit the proof to the particulars specified therein," and that the court had erred in not limiting the plaintiff's proof to the particular items stated.

But in Pollack v. Gunter & Gunter (1909) 162 Ala. 317, 50 So. 155, an action brought for services rendered, a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiffs, setting forth the items of service, but failing to give a date for all of them. Construing the statute, the court held that the plaintiffs were not precluded by their bill of particulars from offering proof that certain services had been rendered on a date different from that set forth, only a list of the items demanded being required.

In Columbus v. Sheehy (1915) 43 App. D. C. 462, wherein an attorney sought to recover a share of a contingent fee paid to his colleague by their client [in an action for money received for the use of the plaintiff] plaintiff set forth in his particulars of demand their contract with the client. It was held that the particulars of demand setting forth the contract with the client "restricted the proof to the subject-matter therein specified."

Decker v. Lightfoot (1915) 44 App. D. C. 45, was an action to recover commissions for the alleged sale of defendant's real estate; the particulars of demand specified 3 per cent commissions for the sale of the "Bassett Building." The plaintiff had given evidence of negotiations for an exchange of farm property for the real estate of the defendant. It was held that the plaintiff was limited in his proof to the sale of the "Bassett Building."

In Roberts v. Harris (1861) 32 Ga. 542, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover for one year's rent of an office, a bill of particulars was annexed to his petition, setting forth the amount of the rent due quarterly on certain days. Evidence was offered to show the special contract. It was held that this evidence was admissible, since it had been set out in the bill of particulars.

In Colwell v. Brown (1902) 103 Ill. App. 22, an action of assumpsit on a building contract, the plaintiff sought damages for "failure to construct a building according to contract," filing a bill of particulars of the damages claimed. Proof was admitted of the failure to build a partition wall and to relath the house, neither of which items was included in the bill of particulars. It was held that proof of damages should have been restricted to the items set forth in the bill of particulars, and that it was error to admit other items, except those involved in the plea of set-off.

In Harding v. Griffin (1845) 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 462, an action of assumpsit, the defendant furnished with his notice of set-off a bill of particulars containing an item of "cash $100," and the date thereof. The defendant offered as evidence a receipt of the same date, signed by the plaintiff, and given to defendant as executor for part of a legacy left the plaintiff. It was held that since the bill of particulars showed an account between the parties individually, the evidence offered showing payment by the defendant as executor had been properly rejected. The general charge in the bill of particulars did not notify the plaintiff of the defendant's design.

In Vannoy v. Klein (1889) 122 Ind. 416, 23 N. E. 526, an action to recover for goods sold and delivered, a bill of particulars was filed with the complaint, which in its caption was addressed to Mr. R. W. Matthews, whereas the action was brought against Matthews and Vannoy. It was held that nevertheless it might be shown that Vannoy was liable, since his indebtedness was alleged in the complaint; that while a bill of particulars identified the goods sold, and limited the proof to the items mentioned, its purpose was not to specify the parties charged.

In De Sobry v. De Laistre (1804) 2 Harr. & J. (Md.) 223, 3 Am. Dec. 535, an action of assumpsit wherein the plaintiff filed an account specifying his claims against the defendant as executor, it was held that the plaintiff might not bring in evidence to establish his claim in a manner different from that set forth in his account,

In Hall v. Sewell (1850) 9 Gill (Md.) 146, an action of assumpsit, the plaintiff furnished a bill of particulars containing certain charges, and later requested the defendant to answer a series of interrogations. It was held that the plaintiff was bound to confine himself in his proof to the bill of particulars furnished, and that he could not propose questions not relating to the matters in issue.

In Jones v. Ilsley (1861) 1 Allen (Mass.) 273, the defendant, by way of set-off, filed a declaration containing an item as follows: "To goods sold, materials found, and work done, $100." It was held that under this item "the defendant should have been limited to the proof of a single article."

In Blake v. Everett (1861) 1 Allen (Mass.) 248, an action on a covenant against encumbrance, a specification was filed by the plaintiff, stating that the encumbrance in question was a right of way held by several named persons, including "one Hastings." Evidence given by Justus P. Hastings, called by the plaintiff, was held to have been properly admitted over an objection of the defendant that the witness had been specified merely as "one Hastings."

In Hayes v. Wilson (1870) 105 Mass. 21, an action on an account annexed for work done for the plaintiff, one item was for "sixty-one days' work on house, etc., $122." It was held that under this item the plaintiff might prove work done in grading about the house, in addition to that done on the house, since the defendant had not "moved for a more definite specification."

In Waterman v. Waterman (1876) 34 Mich. 490, an action of assumpsit by a son against his father for money loaned to him, etc., the plaintiff offered evidence that he had loaned to the defendant a United States bond. It was held that this evidence was not admissible under an item in a bill of particulars setting forth the loan of money.

In Ritter v. Daniels (1882) 47 Mich. 617, 11 N. W. 409, an action of assumpsit to recover for work and labor performed, defendant gave notice of set-off, and filed a bill of particulars therewith. Evidence of damage and injury resulting from the act of plaintiff in leaving defendant's service, was held to have been properly rejected, since no reference had been made thereto in the bill of particulars.

In Wright v. Dickinson (1887) 67 Mich. 580, 11 Am. St. Rep. 602, 35 N. W. 164, an action of assumpsit to recover money paid on land contracts, the plaintiff in his bill of particulars specified that his money had been paid without consideration, since the defendants had no title to the land which they had agreed to convey. It was held that since the bill of particulars showed that the action was for the recovery of money paid without consideration, it might be shown that the contract was invalid under the Statute of Frauds.

In Duplanty v. Stokes (1895) 103 Mich. 680, 61 N. W. 1015, an action of assumpsit, it was set forth that a certain amount of timber was to be delivered astern of a vessel. It was held that the bill of particulars admitted of proof to show that a raft of timber was delivered at a shipyard instead of astern of the vessel.

In Grady v. Sullivan (1897) 112 Mich. 458, 70 N. W. 1040, an action to recover for the sale of gravel under a contract, the plaintiff alleged a contract for the sale of gravel from certain lots, with an agreement to grade the lots to the street level. The bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff set forth a claim for damage done to lots in lowering them below the street level, etc., but made no mention of the specific lots. It was held that the bill of particulars was sufficiently specific to permit of recovery of damage to the lots in question.

In Stoner v. Riggs (1901) 128 Mich. 129, 87 N. W. 109, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover from his father-in-law for services performed and moneys expended, the defendant filed a bill of particulars of set-off to show alleged payments of money to the plaintiff at different times. A number of checks were offered in evidence to show business transactions undertaken by the plaintiff while in charge of the defendant's affairs. It was held that since such items had not been included in the bill of particulars, the defendant could not claim injury because of its exclusion.

In Goforth v. Stingley (1901) 79 Miss. 398, 80 So. 690, an action of ejectment, the plaintiffs having filed a bill of particulars showing their title to have been derived in a certain fashion, it was held that they were bound thereby, and could not "show title by facts outside their bill of particulars."

In McQuesten v. Young (1848) 19 N. H. 307, an action of assumpsit wherein the plaintiff filed an account, it was held that an objection was properly taken to the offer of evidence of items of goods sold and items of cash, which did not appear to be the same as those set forth in the account.

In Saunders v. Osgood (1865) 46 N. H. 21, an action of assumpsit wherein the plaintiff had filed a bill of particulars setting forth a number of debits and credits, it was held to be improper to allow him to show that an item of credit so stated was erroneous, since the defendant would be misled thereby.

Quin v. Astor (1829) 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 577, was an action of assumpsit wherein the plaintiff had filed a bill of particulars containing various charges under date of April, 1821. It was held that no evidence could be given of services rendered prior to 1821, since time was material in a bill of particulars.

In Standish v. Chandler (1840) 28 Wend. (N. Y.) 511, an action of assumpsit, the defendant gave notice of set-off and filed a bill of particulars, setting forth therein a note, with specifications of the date, amount, etc., thereof, stating that it was made by one Samuel Standish, Jr. The note was rejected as evidence on the ground that there was another maker thereof in addition to Standish. It was decided that since the note was, in legal effect, a several contract, it was sufficiently set forth in the bill of particulars to make it admissible.

Bowman v. Earle (1854) 3 Duer (N. Y.) 691, was an action to recover for services rendered as an attorney, wherein a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiff. It was held that the referee's order allowing certain items not included in the bill of particulars was improper, since the referee could not take proof of such items.

In Matthews v. Hubbard (1872) 47 N. Y. 428, wherein the plaintiff's bill of particulars set forth the dates, amounts, and descriptions of various sums alleged by him to have been remitted at the request of the defendant, it was held that the plaintiff was restricted to proof of remittances at defendant's request, and that consequently the items were sufficiently specific.

In Lester v. Clarke (1908) 40 Misc. 688, 88 N. Y. Supp. 168, an action to recover on a contract, plaintiffs filed a bill of particulars setting forth certain letters as evidencing the contract. On the trial they sought to introduce another letter which had not been mentioned in the bill of particulars. It was held that the effect of a bill of particulars is to restrict the proofs to the matters set forth therein, and that consequently it was improper to admit the letter in question.

In Franco v. Caruso (1916) 158 N. Y. Supp. 751, an action brought for an alleged breach of a contract of employment, the plaintiff in his bill of particulars set forth an alleged oral contract of employment for a period of six months, beginning October 1st, 1915. It was held that the plaintiff was limited in his proof to such a contract.

In Peninsular Trading Agency v. Frazer (1919) 176 N. Y. Supp. 739, an action to recover for alleged failure to deliver under a contract, the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars setting forth three papers which, it was alleged, constituted the contract. It was held that the plaintiff was limited in its proof to the alleged contract as stated in the bill of particulars.

In Steinman v. Slaymaker (1875) 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) 182, an action of assumpsit, a "bill of particulars claimed for money advanced by plaintiff to defendant,' giving the dates and amounts." It was held that on this bill the plaintiff might be "restricted to proving a technical loan of money."

In Frost v. International Rubber Co. (1915) 37 R. L. 476, 93 Atl. 641, wherein the plaintiff brought an action for the accrued instalments on a contract for his services, and filed a bill of particulars thereof, it was held that he could not be permitted at the trial to offer testimony in support of additional claims, moving expenses, which had been eliminated by the bill of particulars.

In Rhode Island Malleable Iron Works v. O. K. Nut Lock Co. (1918) — R. L. —, 103 Atl. 1036, an action of assumpsit wherein the declaration made no complaint of the refusal to deliver patterns, it was held that no testimony could be given of the patterns, though the bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff contained a specification of damages for their retention.

Powers v. Washington Portland Cement Co. (1914) 79 Wash. 1, 139 Pac. 616, was an action to recover damages incurred in replacing work done by the plaintiff, and condemned. A bill of particulars was furnished by the plaintiff which, however, covered only a portion of the work in question. It was held that evidence could not be given of that portion of the work which was not specified in the bill of particulars.

In Cudworth v. Gaynor (1890) 76 Wis. 296, 44 N. W. 1103, an action to recover for services rendered as broker, the plaintiff demanded judgment for $575, while his bill of particulars set forth a claim of $435. It was held that the plaintiff would be restricted to proof of the items in the bill.

Young v. Erie & H. R. Co. (1895) 17 Ont. Pr. Rep. 4, was an action to compel the defendant to construct certain fences, and for damages resulting from the neglect of the defendant to build the fences. It was held that, having delivered particulars, the plaintiff would be restricted thereto in giving his evidence, and that no order of the court was necessary to enforce such restriction.

In Law v. Thompson (1846) 15 Mees.

& W. 541, 153 Eng. Reprint, 964, 4 Dowl. & L. 54, 15 L. J. Exch. N. S. 334, an action of assumpsit for work and labor, the plaintiff filed two sets of particulars in which he stated his claim for services at a certain amount for a certain period. It was held that under such particulars the plaintiff could not prove that commissions were due him on a different contract.

In Roberts v. Elsworth (1842) 10 Mees. & W. 653, 152 Eng. Reprint, 633, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 15, 6 Jur. 1092, 2 Dowl. N. S. 456, an action to recover £100, the particulars of demand furnished by the plaintiff set forth a claim founded on two promissory notes of £50 each. It was held that evidence of a conversation in which the defendant admitted a debt of £100, owing by him to the plaintiff, could not prove the plaintiff's case, which was restricted by his bill of particulars to proving an account stated with reference to the notes.

In Wade v. Beasley (1801) 4 Esp. (Eng.) 7, an action of assumpsit, the plaintiff having given a bill of particulars declaring that the action was on a promissory note, it appeared that the note had been given on an improper stamp, and the plaintiff gave evidence of a loan of money of the same amount as the note which was the consideration for it. It was held that such evidence was not admissible, since the plaintiff was bound by his particular.

In Holland v. Hopkins (1800) 2 Bos. & P. 243, 126 Eng. Reprint, 1260, 2 Esp. 168, an action of indebitatus assumpsit, the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars setting forth one claim for the prices of horses sold and delivered. It was held that under such a bill of particulars the plaintiff could not give evidence of a sale by the defendant as an agent for the plaintiff.

b. Action for tort.

In Hubbard v. New York R. Co. (1918) 183 App. Div. 470, 170 N. Y. Supp. 889, an action to recover for personal injuries, the bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff specified as an injury a "fracture of clavicle." It was held that under such a specification evidence might be admitted of the fracture of both clavicles.

McDonough v. Boston Elev. R. Co. (1911) 208 Mass. 436, 94 N. E. 809, was an action to recover for injuries suffered by the plaintiff while passenger on a car of the defendant. The plaintiff filed specifications, the last clause of which stated: "And the plaintiff further says that he is unable to further specify as to the negligence of the defendant." It was held that the plaintiff was not debarred from relying on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur by the filing of specifications.

In Eckhart v. Peterson (1917) 94 Wash. 379, 162 Pac. 557, an action for injuries alleged to be the result of an assault and rape, wherein the complaint set forth certain injuries resulting therefrom as in a bill of particulars, it was held to be improper to receive evidence of injuries not specified.

In Tourgee v. Rose (1896) 19 R. I. 432, 87 Atl. 9, wherein the plaintiff sought to hold the defendant liable for the seduction of his daughter, a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiff, on the order of the court, setting forth the particulars of the charge. It was held that no evidence could be given concerning acts not specified in the bill of particulars.

In Nechamkin v. Kennedy (1916) 95 Misc. 532, 159 N. Y. Supp. 682, an action to recover damages to an automobile, the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars stating only damages to the car. It was held that evidence offered of the cost to the plaintiff of hiring another automobile was erroneously admitted, since it was beyond the bill of particulars.

In Ransom v. Getty (1887) 37 Kan. 75, 14 Pac. 487, an action to recover for the death of the plaintiff's mare and colt, the plaintiff in his bill of particulars specified a contract on the part of the defendant to take good care of the mare and colt. Evidence was given, over objection, to show that the defendant was to give special and extra care to the mare and colt. It was held that this evidence "ought not to have been admitted under the pleadings."

In Com. v. Davis (1831) 11 Pick. (Mass.) 435, wherein the defendant was indicted as a common barrator, notice of particulars was given him before the trial, one specification stating that evidence would be given concerning complaints in behalf of the commonwealth, before M. Gill, etc. It was held that under such specification evidence might be given of complaints which had been made before another magistrate, where the warrant was returned to M. Gill for a hearing.

In Com. v. Giles (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 466, the defendant was indicted for the sale of liquor without a license. A bill of particulars was furnished, setting forth the names of the persons to whom the sales were made. At the trial evidence was admitted over objection, showing sales to persons not specified. It was held that the evidence was inadmissible.

In Com. v. Snelling (1854) 15 Pick. (Mass.) 321, wherein the defendant was indicted for libel, he furnished a bill of particulars of his justification, one of the specifications of which set forth "that in all the cases aforesaid, and divers others," one Whitman, an officer, had acted in an improper manner. The defendant was restricted in his evidence to the cases specified, and not allowed to go into the facts surrounding "the others" not specified. It was held that this was a proper restriction.

In O'Leary v. People (1899) 88 Ill. App. 60, wherein the defendant was indicted for keeping a gaming house, a bill of particulars specified that a gaming house had been kept in a building known as the Washington Park Club. Evidence was offered showing that betting had taken place on the grounds near the building. The court directed that if this were found to be the fact, a verdict of guilty should be given. It was held that, under the bill of particulars, the allegations must be proved as stated, and that consequently the instruction given by the court was improper.

In McDonald v. People (1888) 126 Ill. 150, 9 Am. St. Rep. 547, 18 N. E. 817, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 137, the defendant was indicted for conspiracy to obtain money under false pretenses. He was furnished with a bill of particulars, setting forth a number of bills together with their dates, all of which bills related to services and materials furnished at a normal school. Evidence was admitted to show fraudulent bills rendered in connection with a courthouse, an insane asylum, an infirmary, and a hospital. It was held that the evidence should have been confined to the bills for services and material on the normal school, and it was erroneous to allow other evidence to be given to the jury.

III. Limitations of rule.

a. Evidence slightly variant.

Where the proof offered substantially conforms to the charges set forth in the bill of particulars, evidence slightly variant, but not misleading to the other party, will not be excluded thereby. Ames v. Quimby (1882) 106 U. S. 342, 27 L. ed. 100, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 116; Moline Water Power & Mfg. Co. v. Nichols (1861) 26 Ill. 90; Bonney v. Seely (1829) 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 482; Dubois v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1834) 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 334, affirmed in (1834) 15 Wend. 87; Hoag v. Weston (1886) 10 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 92, 24 N. Y. Week. Dig. 91; John Reis Co. v. Post (1918) 183 App. Div. 696, 170 N. Y. Supp. 610; Harris v. Montgomery (1851) 11 C. B. 398, 138 Eng. Reprint, 525, 2 Lowndes, M. & P. 425, 20 L. J. C. P. N. S. 221, 15 Jur. 757.

Evidence is not to be excluded because it is not confined most precisely and directly to the items as set forth in the bill of particulars. American Secur. & T. Co. v. Kaveney (1912) 39 App. D. C. 223; Mason v. Fractional School Dist. (1876) 84 Mich. 228; Ware v. McQuillan (1877) 54 Miss. 708; Robinson v. Weil (1871) 45 N. Y. 810; Duncan v. Ray (1838) 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 530; Imhoff v. Fleurer (1856) 2 Phila. (Pa.) 35; Mercier v. Travelers Ins. Co. (1901) 24 Wash. 147, 64 Pac. 158.

Nor will evidence be excluded because of a variance from the bill of particulars which is immaterial, where the other party is not misled thereby.

Mason v. Fractional School Dist. (Mich.) supra; McNair v. Gilbert (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 344; Brown v. Williams (1830) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 368; Smith v. Hicks (1880) 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 48; Seaman v. Low (1859) 4 Bosw. (N. Y.) 337; Jackson v. Reich (1893) 3 Misc. 86, 22 N. Y. Supp. 366; Spokane & I. Lumber Co. v. Loy (1899) 21 Wash. 501, 58 Pac. 672, 60 Pac. 1119.

So, where the proof pertains to the charge specified in the bill of particulars, it will not be excluded because it may seem remote. Cohn-Goodman Co. v. People's Sav. Bank (1918) 203 Mich. 307, 168 N. W. 1042; Calhoun v. Akeley (1901) 82 Minn. 354, 85 N. W. 170.

Ames v. Quimby (1882) 106 U. S. 342, 27 L. ed. 100, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 116, was an action of assumpsit to recover the price of a number of shovel handles furnished the defendant by the plaintiff. The defendant contended that a charge should have been given that the plaintiff might recover for only the number of handles, at the price stated in the bill of particulars. The plaintiff claimed that a mistake as to the price had been made in the bill of particulars. The court charged that while plaintiff could not recover for more handles than were set forth in the bill of particulars, he could show the actual price thereof, regardless of the mistake. It was held that the charge was correct.

In American Secur. & T. Co. v. Kaveney (1912) 39 App. D. C. 223, a physician sought to recover from an executor for services rendered to the testator. A bill of particulars having been added to the declaration, it was held that, while the plaintiff was limited thereby to the subject-matters specified, "he is not limited to direct proof of each and every item on the particular date specified, but may prove as many of the specified matters as may be possible by the best evidence attainable."

In Moline Water Power & Mfg. Co. v. Nichols (1861) 26 Ill. 90, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover for one year's services, his bill of particulars specified a claim for one year's salary at $2,000. Evidence was offered of a year's service on the part of the plaintiff. It was held that there was substantially "no difference between a charge for a year's salary and a year's service, when found in the bill of particulars."

In Mason v. Fractional School Dist. (1876) 34 Mich. 228, it was sought to recover from the defendant a balance of money had and received by him as assessor. A bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff contained numerous items, resulting in the balance sued for. It was held that evidence might be given of items larger than any mentioned in the bill of particulars, if they did not alter the amount of the balance as shown therein, since the defendant could not claim to have been misled by such evidence.

Cohn-Goodman Co. v. People's Sav. Bank (Mich.) supra, was an action to recover money claimed to be due on a certificate of deposit issued by the defendant, the plaintiff, on request for a bill of particulars, specifying that the cause of action was the certificate of deposit and interest, etc. The plaintiff sought to show that the money belonged to him. It was held that since no effort had been made to change the terms of the certificate, the plaintiff was not to be considered as ignoring his bill of particulars because he proved things not mentioned therein.

Calhoun v. Akeley (1901) 82 Minn. 354, 85 N. W. 170, was an action to recover for legal services rendered. The plaintiffs having furnished a bill of particulars itemizing their account, giving the number of days involved, and the total sum of the statement, it was held that the bill of particulars did not preclude the admission of the testimony of practising attorneys as to the value of the services rendered; such testimony being simply one way of establishing the total value of the services, and being no departure from the bill of particulars.

In Ware v. McQuillan (1877) 54 Miss. 703, an action for goods sold and delivered, the plaintiff having filed a bill of particulars, it was held that, while he could not prove any other indebtedness than that specified in the bill of particulars, there was no discrepancy in showing that the account was owing by W. B. McQuillan, where the heading of the bill of particulars specified William B. McQuillan.

In Bonney v. Seely (1829) 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 482, an action of assumpsit, wherein the plaintiff gave a bill of particulars claiming for money which he had been compelled to pay for the defendants on a note, an agreement "to save the plaintiff from the payment" was produced. The plaintiff offered evidence of payment in land instead of money, to which the defendants objected as varying from the bill of particulars. It was held that the conveyance of land was to be considered the same as if the plaintiff had paid money.

In McNair v. Gilbert. (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 344, an action of assumpsit, wherein the plaintiff offered "to prove the new promise of the defendant to pay the note subsequent to the granting of an insolvent discharge," the defendant objected thereto on the ground that the plaintiff's bill of particulars described the notes as bearing interest, which was not supported by the proof. The objections were overruled. It was held that unless the variance between the evidence and the bill of particulars was material and misleading to the defendant it would not be regarded.

Brown v. Williams (1830) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 368, was an action of assumpsit, wherein the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars stating that the money had been received by the defendant from one Dubois, while the evidence offered tended to show that it had been paid otherwise. It was held that since the bill of particulars apprised the defendant that the money "which the plaintiff had paid was sought to be recovered back," there could have been no surprise, as the transaction amounted in law to a discharge of the sum, even though it were not paid by Dubois.

In Smith v. Hicks (1830) 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 48, an action of assumpsit for money had and received, etc., the plaintiff's bill of particulars specified the sum due at $605.63, whereas the evidence offered tended to show the amount as $644.45. It was held that since the bill of particulars apprised the other side of the evidence which was to be offered, so that there could be no mistake as to the preparation to be made to resist the claim, the party furnishing the bill of particulars should not be prejudiced by the error therein.

In Dubois v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1834) 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 234, affirmed in (1835) 15 Wend. 87, an action on a contract for an excavation, the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars as follows: "To 12,000 yards of hardpan excavation, $8,600." Evidence was offered and admitted to show that the work was in reality worth 75 cents per yard, which the defendants rebutted with other evidence of the value thereof. It was held that since the price of the excavation was the matter in question, and since no objection was made to the evidence at the time of its admission, it could not later be considered. The court intimated that an objection would have been of no avail, even if made at the time of the presentation of the evidence.

In Duncan v. Ray (1838) 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 530, was an action to recover the price of a mare sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The plaintiff filed a bill of particulars in which the sale was set forth as having taken place October 13, 1824, and the defendant objected to evidence showing the sale to have been made in October, 1825. It was held that "the objection of variance between the bill of particulars and the evidence of sale was properly disregarded."

In Seaman v. Low (1859) 4 Bosw. (N. Y.) 337, an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover money paid to the defendant for the purchase of stock in an association, a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiff, setting forth the payments, etc., as money received by the defendant for stock never delivered to the plaintiff, etc. Evidence was offered that the defendant had made false representations as to the valuation of his land which was to be sold to the association. It was held that this evidence was improperly excluded, the court saying that the de-

In Robinson v. Weil (1871) 45 N. Y. 810, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover for services rendered as a physician, the first item of his bill of particulars was as follows: "To professional services from December 23d, 1867, to February 19th, 1868, per agreement, $500." The court said: "We are of opinion that the plaintiff was not precluded, by the form of his bill of particulars, from proving and recovering the value of the services, though he should fail to prove an agreement for the payment of a specified sum therefor. The bill of particulars specifies the nature of the services and the dates between which they were rendered, and the amount claimed, and in those respects limited the plaintiff's proofs; but the addition of the words, 'by agreement,' did not restrict him to proof of a special agreement fixing the price."

In Jackson v. Reich (1893) 3 Misc. 86, 22 N. Y. Supp. 366, an action to recover for goods sold and delivered, the plaintiff set forth in a bill of particulars an itemized account of articles and labor, together with the dates and locations of work. Evidence was admitted to show work done at other times than those stated. It was held that the evidence was properly admitted, since the variance as to dates was immaterial and the defendant could not have been misled.

In John Reis Co. v. Post (1918) 183 App. Div. 696, 170 N. Y. Supp. 610, was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover commissions alleged to have been earned in a transaction undertaken for defendant's testator. The plaintiff filed a bill of particulars specifying that a certain conversation notifying the defendant's testator of the negotiations was held by one Ohnewald at a certain place. It was held that the testimony of two other witnesses to the conversation, not mentioned in the bill of particulars, had been properly admitted over the defendant's objection, since there had been "no order to preclude the plaintiff from such evidence."

(Pa.) 35, wherein the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars, it was objected that the evidence given of certain items differed in date from those charged in the bill. It was held that a discrepancy of a few days in date, where it did not appear that the defendant had been surprised, would not prohibit the matter from being given to the jury. And the fact that the defendant's name as stated in the bill of particulars was Fleurer was held not to exclude from evidence the plaintiff's book entries against "Mrs. Flory."

In Spokane & I. Lumber Co. v. Loy (1899) 21 Wash. 501, 58 Pac. 672, 60 Pac. 1119, an action on a bond, it appeared that the plaintiff had furnished lumber to a contractor for whom the defendants were sureties. The plaintiff filed a bill of particulars, and objection was made by the defendants to the admission of "evidence of sales of lumber prior to any of the times mentioned in the bill of particulars." It was held that while a bill of particulars restricts proof to matters set forth therein, such testimony would not be excluded where the opposite party was neither surprised nor misled.

In Mercier v. Travelers Ins. Co. (1901) 24 Wash. 147, 64 Pac. 158, an action to recover on an accident insurance policy, it was alleged in a bill of particulars that the insured died as the result of a fall, which injured his left side and induced fatty degeneration of the heart. It was held that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the admission of proof that the insured's death had been caused by the accident, but not by the disease specified in the bill of particulars.

In Harris v. Montgomery (1851) 15 Jur. 757, 11 C. B. 393, 138 Eng. Reprint, 525, 2 Lowndes, M. & P. 425, 20 L. J. C. P. N. S. 221, an action of assumpsit, the plaintiff's particulars of demand set forth a claim for salary due him for a certain year as damages for dismissal. It was held that the plaintiff might give evidence of work and labor done during the year, since the defendants could not be misled thereby.

Proof which applies to a count or statement in the declaration which is not covered by a bill of particulars is not restricted thereby. Vila v. Weston (1865) 33 Conn. 42; Gubbins v. Ashley (1906) 146 Mich. 453, 109 N. W. 841; Wait v. Borne (1890) 123 N. Y. 592, 25 N. E. 1053, reversing (1889) 52 Hun, 612, 5 N. Y. Supp. 168; Davis v. Hunt (1831) 18 S. C. L. (2 Bail.) 412; Day v. Davies (1832) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 340; Page v. Pavey (1839) 8 Car. & P. (Eng.) 769.

In Vila v. Weston (Conn.) supra, an action of assumpsit against a surviving partner, the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars setting forth an item of goods sold to the partnership. At the trial the plaintiff offered the note on which a special count in the declaration had been based. It was held that since the note was set forth in a special count as a cause of action, the defendant must have had knowledge thereof, and that the necessity of filing a bill of particulars, including the note, was superseded thereby.

Gubbins v. Ashley (1906) 146 Mich. 453, 109 N. W. 841, was an action of assumpsit for money obtained by fraud and deceit, for the purchase of an option on a company in which the defendants were officers. The declaration contained special and common counts, the special count alleging the fraud. The plaintiff filed a bill of particulars showing $1,000 paid to the defendants, with interest thereon, and later offered to show fraud and deceit. It was held that the bill of particulars did not limit the plaintiff to the common counts.

In Wait v. Borne (1890) 123 N. Y. 592, 25 N. E. 1053, reversing (1889) 52 Hun, 612, 5 N. Y. Supp. 168, an action for damages for alleged breach of warranty in the sale of oil to be used in the manufacture of carpets, the plaintiff filed a bill of particulars setting forth the sale of carpets at reduced prices, and subject to return, because of damage inflicted by the oil; there was also a statement that the carpets were "inferior, unsalable," etc. It was held that to prove this last charge the plaintiffs were not limited to the bill of particulars, but might give "evidence looking to general damage upon carpets."

In Davis v. Hunt (1831) 18 S. C. L. (2 Bail.) 412, an action of indebitatus assumpsit for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff, a bill of particulars was filed for money "received by the defendant as sheriff in the case of the plaintiff v. Philip and John Weaver." It was held that while evidence of demands not contained in a bill of particulars may not be given over objection, it is no valid objection to evidence which sustains the count "that it does not agree with that which is no part of the count."

Day v. Davies (1832) 5 Car. & P. (Eng.) 340, was an action of assumpsit. The first count set forth special damage arising from the failure of the defendant to indemnify the plaintiff in the acceptance of a bill of exchange. There were several other counts. The plaintiff's particulars of demand stated a claim on the indebitatus counts to recover the amount of a bill of exchange, paid by the plaintiff. The court said: "It did not follow that, because a particular had been given applying only to the indebitatus counts, therefore the plaintiff was precluded from going into evidence upon a special count to which the particular did not profess to apply."

In Page v. Pavey (1839) 8 Car. & P. (Eng.) 769, an action of assumpsit, the first count stated a sale of wheat with a warranty that it would grow, a breach in that it did not grow, and loss to the plaintiff thereby. There were also several other counts for money had and received, etc. The particulars of demand set forth a claim of £6, 19s, 6d., on the indebitatus counts. Evidence was offered to show the plaintiff's loss by reason of the failure of the seed to grow. It was held that the evidence was under the first count, and was not affected by the particulars, which applied only to the common counts.

A plaintiff in rebutting a claim made under a plea of set-off, or of an affirmative defense, is not restricted to the proof of items specified in his bill of particulars. Robertson v. Emerich (1899) 88 Ill. App. 522; Young v. Boyd (1908) 107 Md. 449, 69 Atl. 33; Brown v. Denison (1829) 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 593; Wilson v. Deacon (1880) 9 W. N. C. (Pa.) 47.

In Robertson v. Emerich (Ill.) supra, an action brought to recover on three promissory notes, a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiff, limiting the claim to the notes. Concerning the application of certain payments made by the defendant, who contended that they had been made on the notes, the plaintiff was permitted to give evidence of another transaction on which he claimed the payment had been applied. It was held that since this evidence was not to show a cause of action, but for the purpose of rebutting proof of payment, it did not go beyond the restrictions of the bill of particulars.

So, in Wilson v. Deacon (Pa.) supra, wherein the plaintiff had filed a bill of particulars of his claim, the defendant proved a payment of $50. The defendant objected to evidence offered by the plaintiff to show that this payment had been appropriated to a prior debt, on the ground that no item setting forth this debt appeared in the bill of particulars. The evidence was held to be admissible.

In Young v. Boyd (1908) 107 Md. 449, 69 Atl. 33, an action for money held by the defendant for the plaintiff, a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiff, setting forth certain items as received by the defendant for the plaintiff. The defendant filed a plea of set-off together with a bill of particulars containing certain items which the plaintiff disputed, alleging that the defendant was not entitled to credit on such items since they had been used for the defendant's benefit, testimony to this effect having been admitted. It was held that the motion to exclude this evidence was properly overruled, since the plaintiff was not attempting to recover anything not included in her bill of particulars.

Brown v. Denison (1829) 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 593, was an action brought to recover for flour deposited with the defendants. "The referees had refused to receive evidence showing that an item in the defendants' account, . . . for cash paid on the order of the plaintiff, had been refunded by the plaintiff, on the ground that it had not been contained in the bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff. It was held that since the evidence offered had been to rebut the defendants' evidence, it was improper to reject it.

Evidence of matters not within the bill of particulars, admitted without objection, is not subject to interference by the court thereafter. Paisley v. Western New York & P. Traction Co. (1918) 80 Misc. 258, 141 N. Y. Supp. 63; Phelps v. Conant (1858) 30 Vt. 277.

In Paisley v. Western New York & P. Traction Co. (N. Y.) supra, an action to recover for damages incurred by the sudden stopping of one of defendant's cars, the plaintiff's bill of particulars set forth a number of special injuries, and on the trial introduced without objection proof of an alleged injury not so specified. It was held that, since the proof of matters beyond the bill of particulars was received without objection from the defendant, the court would not interfere.

In Phelps v. Conant (Vt.) supra, an action of assumpsit wherein the plaintiff filed a specification setting forth two notes in favor of the plaintiffs, it was held that where the plaintiffs' testimony was at variance with the specification, the defendant, not objecting thereto at the time, could not later object where the claim was practically the same as described.

In Star Brewery v. Farnsworth (1898) 172 Ill. 247, 50 N. E. 228, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover the price of a building erected by him, it was claimed that the evidence of the plaintiff should have been stricken out, since he had proven the value of the building and the value of the labor in a single sum, while a bill of particulars had been filed with specific articles and items. It was held that a bill of particulars restricted the proof to the items and prices set forth therein, but that the question could not be raised because the bill of particulars had not been preserved in the bill of exceptions.

In McKinnie v. Lane (1907) 230 Ill. 544, 120 Am. St. Rep. 388, 82 N. E. 878, an action to recover the balance due on the purchase price of paintings, the bill of particulars stated that the balance of the amount due "was to be given in pictures at agreed price." Evidence was given that the defendant was to pay the balance in pictures or cash. It was held that the effect of a bill of particulars was to restrict the plaintiff to proof of the causes of action as set forth therein, but that the plaintiff could avail himself of the variance, because amendment of the bill of particulars had been improperly refused.

In Hall v. Wood (1857) 9 Gray (Mass.) 60, an action on contract for work and labor, it appeared from the plaintiff's bill of particulars that the Statute of Limitations would bar a recovery on the first two items therein. The court said: "In any aspect of the case the form of the declaration was a proper one, and, it being upon the common counts, the bill of particulars was properly filed, and its detailed statements did not estop the plaintiff from showing that all the items of services were performed under one contract."

In Com. v. Farrell (1870) 105 Mass. 189, wherein the plaintiff had been indicted for keeping a liquor nuisance, specifications were filed in the municipal court setting forth the date when the offense was committed. At the trial in the superior court the commonwealth was not restricted to the dates specified in their testimony to which the defendant took exception. It was held that specifications are ordered at the discretion of the court before which a cause is to be tried, and are not a part of the record, so that on appeal the court was not bound by the specifications filed in the lower court.

In Graham v. Whitely (1857) 26 N. J. L. 254, an action of ejectment wherein the plaintiffs had filed a bill of particulars which specified that certain documentary evidence of title would be used by them, including a copy of a will, it was held that the plaintiffs were not restricted to a claim by devise, but might show title by descent in their grantors.

In Hayden v. Astoria (1917) 84 Or. 205, 164 Pac. 729, an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover for work and materials on a quantum meruit, a bill of particulars was filed by the plaintiff in which he set forth in detail the various expenditures. It was held that while a bill of particulars furnished on the order of the court limits the party providing it to proof of the items set forth therein, where "an account is furnished on demand of the adverse party in a cause wherein the account is not demandable, the account so furnished cannot be used to shut out testimony otherwise competent, in the absence of a showing that the adverse party had been misled."

In Hurst v. Watkis (1807) 1 Campb. (Eng.) 68, 10 Revised Rep. 634, an action of assumpsit for money had and received and on an account stated, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant had been partners and had had other mutual transactions, the plaintiff's particular set forth the separate accounts. The defendant, in showing a balance in favor of himself on the separate account, disclosed on the opposite page a partnership balance in favor of the plaintiff. It was held that while a party is ordinarily restricted in his evidence to the contents of his particular, where a defendant, in an attempt to defeat the claim, offers evidence which incidentally aids the plaintiff, plaintiff is not precluded from taking advantage thereof. ## STATE OF NEBRASKA

v.

EDWARD K. MURRAY, Plff. in Err.

(— Neb. —, 175 N. W. 666.)

Constitutional law — Sunday labor — discrimination against barber.

1. Chapter 234, Laws 1917, is not discriminative class legislation by reason of the fact that it imposes upon barbers a more severe penalty for working at their trade on Sunday than that imposed by the General Sunday Act, namely, § 8802, Rev. Stat. 1913.

Sunday — labor — penalty.

2. Under the police power the legislature may impose such reasonable penalty for a violation of the Sunday Law as it may deem reasonably necessary to make the act effective.

— barber shop — work of necessity.

3. It is within the province of the legislature to provide by law that keeping barber shops open on Sunday is not a work of necessity.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1424.]

Headnotes by DEAN, J.

(Rose, J., dissents.)

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County (Sears, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of doing barber work on Sunday in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

and profits without any allowance for taxes, assessments, and ground rents paid by him, it is, we believe, unsupported by any authority, and stands without a fellow in this country or in England."

Thompson v. Bickford (1872) 19 Minn. 17, Gil. 1, also, supports the proposition that if the grantee in a fraudulent conveyance is guilty of actual fraud, he is not entitled, on an accounting for rents and profits, to an allowance for sums paid by him for taxes and to extinguish liens or encumbrances on the property.

In determining the amount due from the wife to a creditor of the husband, where the latter had made a fraudulent transfer of personal property to the wife, who had disposed of the same, the court, in Jewell v. Kelley (1914) 180 Mich. 61, 146 N. W. 402, approved an allowance to the wife for payment by her of a chattel mortgage on the property at the time of the sale. Whether the transferee was regarded as guilty of actual or only constructive fraud does not clearly appear. In an earlier appeal, reported in (1909) 155 Mich. 301, 118 N. W. 987, the court said that it was far from being convinced that the bill of sale was not given and received with an intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors.

IV. As to affirmative relief of grantee.

Where the grantee in a conveyance in fraud of creditors participates in the fraud, his only rights, if any, according to the weight of authority, are by way of reducing the recovery against him on an accounting, and he cannot set up any claim in equity to affirmative relief on account of taxes or encumbrances discharged by him. This is the effect of the majority of the decisions already cited. And the point has been expressly made in a few cases.

Where a grantee, guilty of actual fraud, is merely on the defensive, as in an accounting for the rents and profits while he occupied the premises, the case is very different as to his right to a deduction for taxes and interest on mortgages, than if he were obliged to come into a court of equity asking for affirmative relief and for the enforcement of these claims against the property; in the latter case, the court might leave him where his fraud had placed him, while on an accounting for rents and profits he should be compelled to account only for such rents and profits as he actually received or could have received. Loos v. Wilkinson (1889) 113 N. Y. 485, 4 L.R.A. 353, 10 Am. St. Rep. 495, 21 N. E. 392.

The same distinction is brought out in Daisy Roller Mills v. Ward (1897) 6 N. D. 317, 70 N. W. 271. The court admitted that so far as the creditors of the grantor were concerned, where the fraudulent conveyance was set aside, their equities would not entitle them to more, as against the grantee, than they could have realized had there been no conveyance, and that the grantee might be entitled to reimbursement for taxes or encumbrances which were prior liens to the claims of the creditors. But it was held that where an accounting was not sought against the grantee for rents and profits, but the conveyance was merely set aside for fraud, in which he had participated, his fraud prevented him from invoking the aid of a court of equity for relief by way of reimbursement for taxes and encumbrances discharged by him, the court apparently taking the view that even though the grantee was merely a defendant against whom the creditors were seeking to set aside the conveyance, he was in effect asserting a right to affirmative relief so far as he claimed the right to such reimbursement, where the suit was not for an accounting, but merely to set aside the conveyance.

Second-mortgage bondholders of a railroad who fraudulently obtained a conveyance of the property to them on failure of the company to pay the interest coupons, and who discharged the first-mortgage bonds were held in Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Soutter (1872) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 517, 20 L. ed. 543, not entitled to sue the first-mortgage bondholders and recover the amount so paid to them, as paid under a mistake of fact, when the conveyance was set aside at the instance of creditors. The court said: "Who are the complainants? Are they not the very bondholders, self-incorporated into a body politic, who, through their trustee and agent, affected the sale which was declared fraudulent and void, as against creditors, and made the purchase which has been set aside for that cause? Was it ever known that a fraudulent purchaser of property, when deprived of its possession, could recover for his repairs or improvements, or for encumbrances lifted by him whilst in possession? If such a case can be found in the books, we have not been referred to it. Whatever a man does to benefit an estate, under such circumstances, he does in his own wrong. He cannot get relief by coming into a court of equity."

A different conclusion has been reached, however, where the grantee was guilty only of constructive fraud.

Thus, one who, in violation of the Bulk Sales Law, in good faith and without knowledge of the law or of claims against the property, purchased a stock of merchandise for full value, paying off, as part of the consideration, a chattel mortgage on the property, which was satisfied, was held in Hicks v. Beals (1917) 83 Or. 82, L.R.A.1917D, 1067, 163 Pac. 83, entitled to maintain a suit against the vendor and his creditors for the revival of the mortgage and for subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee, where the property has been attached by creditors because of noncompliance with the statute. The court said that it was contended on the part of the creditors that a merger could not be defeated by a plaintiff asking for affirmative relief in the same manner in which it could be resisted as a defense; that a sufficient answer to this contention was that the defendant was seeking to subject the property to the payment of its claims, and in defense the plaintiff was compelled to institute the suit; and that the form of the action or situation of the parties, whether plaintiff or defendant, was not a controlling feature.

Without deciding whether, under any circumstances, a grantee in a fraudulent conveyance who is guilty of constructive fraud may have relief on account of payment of a mortgage on the property, assumed as a part of the consideration for the conveyance, the court in Wiley v. Knight (1855) 27 Ala. 336, held that such relief would not be granted on a bill by the grantee to reform the conveyance, where to permit the setting up of the mortgage would take the defendant entirely by surprise and result in a decree predicated on a state of facts precisely the opposite of those charged in the bill.

V. Conclusions.

To indicate what appears to be the better rule, in view of the conflict of the cases on the present question, it may be said that the weight of authority and the better reasoning appear to support the view that the grantee who is guilty of actual fraud is not entitled to reimbursement, on the setting aside of the conveyance, for sums expended by him to discharge liens for taxes and encumbrances, not because a court of equity desires to punish him for his fraud, although this may be the result of the ruling, but because the conveyance is absolutely void as to creditors, and the grantee therefore pays as would a stranger to the property, and also because to permit the conveyance to stand as security for sums so expended would be to that extent to give affirmative relief to a party to a fraudulent contract. But, on the other hand, if the grantee is only guilty of constructive fraud he has an equity which entitles him to subrogation, on the setting aside of the conveyance, to the rights of holders of prior liens for taxes or encumbrances which he has discharged. If an accounting is sought for the rents and profits or the proceeds of a sale of the property, the grantee may reduce the recovery by the amount of taxes paid and prior encumbrances discharged by him, and this is true, according to the weight of authority, whether he is guilty of actual or only constructive fraud. So, also, subrogation may be allowed, in the discretion of the court, if the proof of fraud is not clear, but the circumstances are too suspicious for the court to permit the conveyance to stand. R. E. H.

exercise of its police power, has the right to enact Sunday laws, and that it also has the right to provide for the regulation and restriction of those engaged in an employment which in and of itself may prove harmful to the community, such as the liquor traffic. But it is contended that the business of conducting a barber shop is not of this class, and that it is in the nature of class legislation to prohibit this business under more severe penalties than those provided for the conduct of other legitimate business on Sunday. We do not deem the act in question open to such objection. By class legislation we understand such legislation as denies rights to one which are accorded to others, or inflicts upon one individual a more severe penalty than is imposed upon another in like case offending."

Defendant argues too that, in view of the stipulation which provides that Lefler "was in necessary need of barbering in order to be comfortable and healthy," this made the barbering a work of necessity. We do not think so. Lefler was barbered in the barber shop. Under the agreed statement of facts he did not come within the class of persons who are excepted from the operation of the statute, and for whom the services of a barber may lawfully be performed "in connection with the medical treatment of persons confined to their rooms or in a hospital and being under the care of a physician." If any of these conditions had obtained, the barbering, under the express terms of the act, would, of course, be construed to be a work of necessity. It will not be presumed that the legislature by this act intended to make it a crime, in a case of emergency, to cut the hair or to remove the beard of a person who has sustained injuries about the head or face, and for whose proper treatment such services are required. The facts stipulated do not present a case of that kind.

Defendant's contention that it is not within the province of the legislature to define what is a work of necessity or charity does not seem to be well founded. In Petit v. Minnesota, 177 U. S. 164, 44 L. ed. 716, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 666, the Supreme Court of the United States commented on and approved this language found in the Minnesota opinion: "In view of all these facts, we cannot say that the legislature has exceeded the limits of its legislative police power in declaring that, as a matter of law, keeping barbers' shops open on Sunday is not a work of necessity or charity, while as to all other kinds of labor they have left that question to be determined as one of fact."

We do not find reversible error.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of discrimination as regards degree of penalty or punishment for violation of Sunday Law.

This annotation lies in narrow compass. It is generally held that statutes are not unconstitutional because they prohibit some labors or acts on Sunday, and not others. It would seem but a short step further to indicate by the amount of prescribed punishment that some of the acts prohibited on Sunday are more obnoxious than others.

It is a general rule that statutes discriminating as regards degree of penalty or punishment for violation of Sunday laws are not unconstitutional. State v. Hogleiver (1899) 152 Ind. 652, 45 L.R.A. 504, 53 N. E. 921; People v. Bellet (1894) 99 Mich. 151, 22 L.R.A. 696, 41 Am. St. Rep. 589, 57 N. W. 1094; STATE v. MURRAY (reported herewith) ante, 563; Stanfeal v.

State (1908) 78 Ohio St. 24, 84 N. E. 419, 14 Ann. Cas. 138; Breyer v. State (1898) 102 Tenn. 108, 50 S. W. 769; Ex parte Wright (1909) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 504, 120 S. W. 868. (Probably the same was held in Re Donnellan (1908) 49 Wash. 460, 95 Pac. 1085, but the court does not touch on the point.) But compare cases at the end of this annotation.

A statute imposing a larger penalty on persons who play baseball on Sunday than is imposed by general law on those who are engaged in hunting, fishing, rioting, quarreling, and in acts of common labor, does not violate the constitutional right of citizens to equal privileges and immunities. State v. Hogreiver (1899) 152 Ind. 652, 45 L.R.A. 504, 53 N. E. 921, supra.

In Ex parte Wright (1909) 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 504, 120 S. W. 868, supra, the court sustained a statute imposing upon licensed sellers of intoxicating liquors, for Sunday sales, a greater punishment than that imposed on Sunday sellers of goods and wares generally.

In Moore v. Owen (1908) 58 Misc. 332, 109 N. Y. Supp. 585, the court apparently considered it a matter of course that the legislature could provide greater penalties for the giving of certain shows on Sunday than for the giving of other theatrical shows on that day.

The foregoing rule has been several times sustained in the case of barbers. People v. Bellet (1894) 99 Mich. 151, 22 L.R.A. 696, 41 Am. St. Rep. 589, 57 N. W. 1094; STATE v. MURRAY (reported herewith); Stanfeal v. State (1908) 78 Ohio St. 24, 84 N. E. 419, 14 Ann. Cas. 138; Breyer v. State (1898) 102 Tenn. 108, 50 S. W. 769.

In People v. Bellet (Mich.) supra, the court said: "In the present case it may have been the judgment of the legislature that those engaged in the particular calling were more likely to offend against the law of the state providing for Sunday closing than those engaged in other callings. If so, it became a question of policy as to whether a more severe penalty should not be provided for engaging in that particular business on Sunday than

In Breyer v. State (Tenn.) supra, the court said: "A day of rest was needed for this most industrious and overworked trade, and it was admitted that without the imposition of heavier penalties it could not be secured, for none were willing to close their shops on Sunday unless all were made to do so. The former law was found wholly ineffective. We cannot know or state judicially what reasons controlled the legislature in the passage of the act, but considerations like these would constitute sound and valid reasons for this classification, and such classification would neither be arbitrary nor unreasonable."

In State v. Hogreiver (1899) 152 Ind. 652, 45 L.R.A. 504, 53 N. E. 921, supra, the court said: "The constitutional authority of the legislature to enact any statute making it unlawful to do certain acts on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, being admitted, violations of such laws are not privileges and immunities which must be secured to all citizens alike, and upon the same terms. Where several different acts are prohibited by law, a difference in the penalties for violations of such several acts cannot be said to constitute a breach of the constitutional provisions intended to secure equal rights to all citizens. It is but reasonable that in every case of the violation of law the penalty should be graduated by the character and circumstances of the offense, and in proportion to its injurious consequences to the public. This principle has been recognized and adopted in this state from the earliest period of its government."

It has also been held that ordinances imposing upon the doing of some acts on Sunday greater penalties than those provided by the General Sunday Statute are not unconstitutional. St. Louis v. DeLassus (1907) 205 Mo. 578, 104 S. W. 12 (obiter); Sherman v. Paterson (1912) 82 N. J. L. 345, 82 Atl. 889; Schachter v. Hauenstein (1918) 92 N. J. L. 104, 105 Atl. 13;

Thus, an ordinance imposing a greater penalty on Sunday sales of certain articles than that imposed by the General Sunday Statute is valid. Sherman v. Paterson (1912) 82 N. J. L. 345, 82 Atl. 889, and Schachter v. Hauenstein (1918) 92 N. J. L. 104, 105 Atl. 13, supra.

So, a town authorized "to make regulations to cause the due observance of Sunday" may provide greater penalties for Sunday sales by drug-store keepers than for Sunday sales by keepers of restaurants. State v. Davis (1916) 171 N. C. 809, 89 S. E. 40, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1168, supra.

In Sherman v. Paterson (N. J.) supra, the court said: "The imposition of a fine of $2, imposed by the Vice & Immorality Act, may not have operated in the judgment of the municipal board as a sufficient deterrent in the locality to prevent the violation of the law; and the passage of the ordinance may have been deemed necessary, with its larger pecuniary penalty combined with the physical deterrent of imprisonment, to effectuate a compliance with the law."

(It may be noted that it was held in New York v. Alhambra Theatre Co. (1910) 136 App. Div. 509, 121 N. Y. Supp. 3, affirmed in (1911) 202 N. Y. 528, 95 N. E. 1125, that a statute prohibiting certain theatrical performances, declaring the same to be a misdemeanor, and imposing a penalty to be recovered in the name of a certain society, did not prevent the city from passing an ordinance imposing a like penalty for the same act, and providing that the city might recover it in an action, as the ordinance provided for a civil remedy.)

On the other hand, it has been held in some cases that a statute imposing a greater penalty on barbering on Sunday than that prescribed for violations of a general Sunday law was unconstitutional as special legislation.

Thus, a statute requiring the closing of barber shops on Sunday, and fixing a different penalty for its violation from that imposed for violations of the General Sunday Law, violates a constitutional provision forbidding special laws for the punishment of misdemeanors. Armstrong v. State (1908) 170 Ind. 188, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 646, 84 N. E. 3.

So, it has been held that the business of barbering is not such as warrants the legislature in putting its transaction on Sunday in a class by itself, and imposing upon it a penalty more severe than is imposed upon other Sunday labor, where the Constitution forbids special laws where general statutes may be made applicable, or upon the subject of punishment of misdemeanors. Stratman v. Com. (1910) 137 Ky. 500, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 949, 136 Am. St. Rep. 299, 125 S. W. 1094.

So, in State v. Granneman (1896) 132 Mo. 326, 33 S. W. 784, an act making it a misdemeanor for any person to carry on the business of barbering on Sunday was held to be a special law, in conflict with a constitutional provision prohibiting a special law when a general law can be made applicable, there being a prior general law prohibiting all kinds of labor on Sunday (which seems not to have provided the same punishment).

ERNEST CARLSON
v.
CONNECTICUT COMPANY, Appt.

(— Conn. —, 108 Atl. 531.)

Street railway — incompetent operatives — injury to person on track — liability.

1. The mere fact that an electric railway company fails to provide competent and experienced operatives for its car does not render it liable for injury to a person asleep on its track.

Evidence — sufficiency — inexperience of motorman.

2. Operatives of a street car cannot be found to have been incompetent or inexperienced merely because they had been in the company's employ only a month and had been on a particular run only four or five days at the time of the happening of an accident.

Trial — issue for jury — absence of facts.

3. No issue foreign to the facts in evidence should be submitted to the jury.

Negligence — last clear chance — necessity of knowledge.

4. Knowledge, actual or imputed, on the part of one accused of negligence with respect to the peril of a person injured is necessary to bring into operation the doctrine of last clear chance.

Notice — presence of person on railway track.

5. Knowledge of the presence of a person asleep beside an electric railway track in the night cannot be imputed to the company from the mere fact that he had been there a half or three quarters of an hour, if no car had passed and no employee of the company had been in the vicinity in the meantime.

Negligence — last clear chance — necessity of opportunity to avoid injury.

6. To render an electric railway company liable under the doctrine of last clear chance for injury to a person asleep on its track by running over him with a car, it must appear that the motorman might by the exercise of reasonable care have avoided the injury after he discovered or should have discovered the peril.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County (Case, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. New trial ordered.

Statement by Prentice, Ch. J.:

September 28, 1918, the plaintiff was injured by being run over by one of the defendant's trolley cars. He was at the time lying asleep by the side of the defendant's tracks, with one or both of his feet extending over one of the rails. As a result of his injuries both his feet had to be amputated just above the ankle.

The plaintiff lived with and was employed by one Reardon, who resided in South Windsor, and upon the main highway between Springfield and Hartford, along which the trolley line between those two cities runs. The point of injury was near the company's station No. 28. The trolley line was here a single track, one laid along the east side of the traveled way, an improved road surfaced with Warrenite. Its westerly rail was some 5 or 6 feet east of the easterly edge of the Warrenite. The intervening space was not improved for public travel. On the outer, or easterly, side of the east rail was a strip of land within highway limits, about 9 feet in width. This strip was wholly unimproved and unused by travelers. Immediately east of the tracks and for a distance of some 4 or 5 feet, the ground was slightly lower than the surface of the ties upon which the rails were laid, and from that point rose gradually to the highway boundary. At that point the land was some 2 feet higher than were the tracks. The space easterly of the tracks was covered with a growth of uncut grass of varying length. The defendant claimed that this grass was so high that all of the plaintiff's body, except his feet, was concealed from view as he lay at the time he was injured; the plaintiff, that it was not of sufficient height and character to hide the plaintiff as he lay in it. The time of the accident was about midnight, and the place in the open country where there were no street lights.

The plaintiff had left the home of his employer, which was near station No. 33, on the evening of the day in question to visit Hartford. He remained in the city until nearly 11 o'clock, and drank during that time, as he himself admitted, two glasses of beer and one of whisky. At 10:55 he boarded one of the defendant's cars to return to his home. At station No. 28, which is about 1 mile from his destination and a half mile south of the fare-limit station, which was No. 31, he, for some reason which he was unable to explain, left the car and started in the direction of his home on foot. From that time until he was run over by the car some one half or three quarters of an hour afterwards, he was not, as far as is known, seen by anyone, and in the meantime no car passed the point of accident in either direction.

The car which occasioned the plaintiff's injuries was proceeding in a southerly direction toward Hartford. It was equipped with a powerful headlight, and was running at a speed variously estimated from 15 miles an hour upward. In the front vestibule of the car, in addition to the motorman, was a constable of the town of South Windsor in uniform. He was employed by and acting under the orders of the selectmen of the town to keep a lookout for persons or other obstructions which might be upon the trolley tracks at a late hour on Saturday nights. At that time there was in the town a large number of tobacco growers and a very large acreage of tobacco. This industry called to the town during the growing and harvesting season a large number of employees, more or less of whom were likely to be found upon the highway at a later hour on Saturday nights than at other times. This the defendant motorman well knew, as he did also the reason for the constable's presence on his car.

As the car approached and passed the spot where the plaintiff lay, neither the motorman nor the constable saw him. The motorman, however, felt a jar, which caused him to think that he had run over something. He brought the car to a stop as soon as possible, and requested the conductor to see what had happened. The latter investigations having proved unsuccessful, the motorman reversed his power, and backed his car to and beyond the point where the plaintiff lay. When it had fully passed, the rays of the headlight revealed the presence of the injured plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed that the injury to his right leg was caused by the second passage of the car; the defendant, that both legs were injured when the car first passed.

The defendant claimed to have shown that the motorman was keeping a proper lookout ahead and giving proper attention to the performance of his duties, and that neither he nor the constable, who stood at his side, saw the plaintiff or any portion of his body before the car struck him, and that their failure to do so was due entirely to the concealed position in which the plaintiff lay.

The assignments of error, five in number, all challenge the correctness of portions of the court's charge as follows:

"(1) Now, as to the first of these assignments of negligence—that is, as to the inexperience of the men—it is of course the duty of the defendant to employ men fitted to perform their duties consistently with the general safety of the public. But to make any such assignment of negligence effective, it must not only appear by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the servants of the defendant were actually inexperienced men, but, further, that Carlson's injuries are directly chargeable to that inexperience.

"(2) I, of course, suggest to you that the law expects a high degree of care from one in charge of a powerful engine of this character, to preserve not only its own passengers but other travelers who may be abroad and in the neighborhood of the railroad tracks from injury. One in such a situation—that is, one in the situation of the motorman—is bound to keep strict watch of his road ahead, and to keep his car under control by maintaining only a speed proper for the surrounding conditions. If, in the fair exercise of these precautions, the motorman actually did not see Carlson before striking him, then neither he nor his principal is responsible here for whatever injury was inflicted upon Carlson when the car first struck him.

"(3) Whether that negligence still remained a proximate or efficient cause of his injuries would depend upon the entire situation then and whether he had been so long on the track as to charge the company with knowledge of his presence there.

"(4) Of course his continued presence on the track in a drunken stupor, if he was in a drunken stupor, was an act of continuing negligence; but if his position was one which was or ought to have been obvious to the motorman of an approaching car, I think you must find that the negligence of the motorman, assuming that you find him to have been negligent under all these conditions, was the proximate cause of the injury without reference to any conduct of the plaintiff, and in that event the plaintiff must have a verdict.

"(5) Remembering all the principles of negligence, as I have suggested them to you, and the specific allegations of negligence which refer to this branch of the case by the plaintiff, if you find that the man was injured by losing his remaining foot on this second trip of the car, I think the question of contributory negligence is removed—absolutely removed—from this feature of the case."

Where a railroad has reason to anticipate the presence of trespassers, it is bound to exercise due care to detect the presence of such trespassers, and in case there is a failure to use such due care in maintaining a proper watch, and the situation is such that had a proper lookout been kept the peril of the trespasser would have been discovered in time to have avoided injury by the subsequent use of reasonable care, then the railroad is liable to a trespasser even if he was injured before his presence was discovered.

The portion of the charge first complained of was called out by the allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff's injuries were caused, among other things, by the defendant's negligence in failing to provide competent and experienced operatives for its car. This was not a good allegation of actionable negligence. Had its charge been well founded, the defendant would not for that cause alone have rendered itself liable to the plaintiff. Whether those concerned in the operation of the car were competent or incompetent, experienced or inexperienced, the defendant would not be liable in this action in either event, in the absence of some negligent act or omission on their part. If there was no such act or omission, there would be no liability on the part of the defendant, however inexperienced, incompetent, and unfit for their tasks the defendant's employees may have been. If there was such act or omission contributing to the plaintiff's injuries, the defendant would be liable, however experienced and ideally competent the negligent act- or servant was. The liability of the defendant, if any, must find its basis in negligent conduct on the part of its servant or servants. It cannot rest upon their want of qualification for their task alone. Monroe v. Hartford Street R. Co. 76 Conn. 201, 209, 56 Atl. 498.

The instruction given, considered in the abstract, is perhaps not open to criticism, and, if rightly understood and applied, would not be objectionable. As furnishing the rule for the guidance of a jury under concrete conditions like those presented by the case at bar, it is, however, open to the objections, of practical importance, that it was calculated to give the jury the impression that actionable negligence on the part of the defendant might be predicated upon its employment of incompetent and inexperienced servants; that it tended to divert the attention of the jury from the real issue; that is to say, whether or not the defendant's employees were guilty of negligent conduct in the operation of its car, to one of itself immaterial, and impliedly, at least, invited them to find a ground of recovery in that which in and of itself would not create liability; and that it submitted to their consideration as constituting an issue matter which the evidence did not raise to the dignity of one.

With respect to the latter matter it is to be remembered that the only evidence upon which a finding of the motorman's and conductor's inexperience and incapacity could be predicated was that they were spare hands, who had been in the defendant's employ only a month and been on the South Windsor run only four or five days. For aught that appears they may have had long experience elsewhere and been fit and competent in a high degree. Manifestly the jury could not reasonably have found that they were either inexperienced or incapable upon such proof alone. An instruction which left the door even slightly ajar for the entrance of a finding of negligence on the defendant's part which did not arise out of the acts of its servants was calculated to do the defendant harm. "It is the duty of the court to submit to the jury no issue foreign to the facts in evidence, or in respect to which no evidence has been offered." Fine v. Connecticut Co. 92 Conn. 626, 630, 103 Atl. 902.

Trial—issue for jury—absence of facts.

The third and fourth of the criticized passages were used in connection with the court's instructions touching the so-called last clear chance doctrine invoked by the plaintiff to avoid the effect of his own negligence in placing himself in the dangerous position in which he was when injured. Knowledge, actual or imputed, on the part of the defendant or its agents, of the plaintiff's exposure where he lay, was a vitally important factor in the application of the principles under consideration. Given that, it would be difficult indeed for the defendant to escape liability. In the first of the two passages the court plainly implies that such knowledge might be imputed to the defendant from the mere lapse of time during which he had lain where he was when injured. When it is remembered that the spot where he wittingly or unwittingly sought a resting place was one quite away from the traveled roadway and in the unlighted country; that his body was more or less concealed by the growing grass in which he lay; that the time was near midnight; that he had been there not more than one half to three quarters of an hour; that no car had passed meanwhile; that no servant or agent of the defendant had had occasion during that time to be in that vicinity; and that, as far as appears, no person knew of his whereabouts after he started to walk home,—it is clear that conditions justifying the im-

last clear chance —necessity of

that conditions justifying the imputation to the defendant of knowledge of the plaintiff's presence in the grass by the side of its tracks were absolutely wanting. Clearly the defendant could not, upon the evidence, reasonably be charged with knowledge that the plaintiff lay where he did, except as such knowledge was or ought to have been gained by the motorman as his car approached the scene of the accident.

Passing now to the second of the two passages which immediately followed the first, we find the court saying to the jury that, although the plaintiff, in remaining where he was, was guilty of continuing negligence, yet if his position was one which was or ought to have been obvious to the motorman, they must find that the latter's negligence, assuming that he was negligent, was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury without reference to any conduct of the latter, and that, in that event, the plaintiff must have a verdict. This instruction predicated liability upon the acquisition by the motorman of knowledge, either actual or implied, of the plaintiff's exposed position, and ignored another condition of equal importance, to wit, that the motorman subsequently had the opportunity, by the exercise of reasonable care, to save the plaintiff from harm. Fine v.

Connecticut Co. 92 Conn. 626, 631, 103 Atl. 901. Under the charge the company would, in the application of the last clear chance doctrine, be liable, notwithstanding the plaintiff's contributory negligence, if the motorman failed to stop his car and thus save the plaintiff from harm, although the plaintiff was hit the very instant after the motorman became, or ought to have become, aware of the plaintiff's danger.

As there must be a new trial, it is unnecessary to inquire whether or not the defendant's third and fifth assignments of error are well made.

There is error, and a new trial is ordered.

The other Judges concur.

ANNOTATION.

Employment of incompetent, inexperienced, or negligent employee as independent ground of negligence toward one other than an employee.

The present annotation is confined to cases which treat the question of employment of an incompetent, inexperienced, or negligent employee as an independent ground of negligence which itself will render the employer liable for injury to one other than an employee, regardless of any negligent act or omission upon the part of the servant at the time of the infliction of the injury. This limitation excludes cases such as Baltimore Elevator Co. v. Neal (1886) 65 Md. 438, 5 Atl. 338; Laning v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 521, 10 Am. Rep. 417, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 747; Core v. Ohio River R. Co. (1893) 38 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. 596; Kliefoth v. North Western Iron Co. (1898) 98 Wis. 495, 74 N. W. 356, which relate solely to the duty of a master to one servant in respect to the employment and retention of competent and experienced coservants,—fellow servant cases having been repeatedly held to belong to a class different from that into which the cases involving the liability of a master for injury to a third person resulting from the act or omission of a servant fall. For cases making such a distinction, see Ragas v. Douglas (1916) 139 La. 773, 72 So. 242; and Fonda v. St. Paul City R. Co. (1898) 71 Minn. 438, 70 Am. St. Rep. 341, 74 N. W. 166.

It seems clear that at least so far as the liability of a master to a third person is concerned, his failure to hire only competent and experienced servants cannot in itself constitute actionable negligence, but that liability, if any, must be predicated upon the wrongful act or omission of the servant at the time of the infliction of the injury complained of, or at least upon an act or omission which in the case of an experienced or competent person would have been wrongful. (The qualifying clause is inserted to meet the situation where the servant, because of his inexperience or physical incapacity, is absolved from personal fault in doing or omitting what an experienced or competent servant in the exercise of reasonable care, would not have done or omitted. It does not vary the principle, but merely tests the question of negligence vel non upon the particular occasion by applying to the conduct of the inexperienced servant the standard of care applicable to the conduct of an experienced and competent person. If tested by that standard, and there was no negligence, the inexperience or incompetence of the servant is entirely immaterial.) This conclusion is supported not only by that great mass of cases in which it seemingly has been assumed that liability must be based on the negligent act or omission of the servant, but also by the comparatively limited number of cases which have been passed squarely upon the question whether or not the failure of an employer to furnish a competent and experienced servant in itself constitutes actionable negligence. As to the latter cases, which are the ones primarily under consideration, it is practically impossible to make a complete collection, but enough have been gathered to fully demonstrate the soundness of the rule that the employment of an incompetent, inexperienced, or negligent servant generally does not constitute an independent ground of negligence, at least with reference to third persons.

Perhaps no better illustration of the rule can be given than is afforded by the cases which involve the liability of the proprietor of a public conveyance for injuries to a third person predicated upon the alleged incompetence or inexperience of the employee or employees placed in charge of such a conveyance by the proprietor. In this class of cases the rule clearly is, that while it is generally conceded that it is the duty of the owner of dangerous agencies or instrumentalities such as steam and electric trains and cars, stagecoaches, hacks, taxicabs, elevators, etc., to use reasonable diligence in the selecting of competent and careful operators, drivers, etc., such a carrier is liable, if at all, only for injuries to a third person which result from such incompetency, inexperience, or inefficiency; and that it is the incompetent or negligent act of the servant, and not the act of employment of the incompetent servant itself, that gives rise to the liability. To this effect is the decision in the reported case (CARLSON v. CONNECTICUT CO. ante, 569), wherein the court declared the rule to be that under a complaint charging defendant with negligence in failing to provide competent and experienced operators for its electric trolley car which ran over plaintiff, the liability of the defendant, if any, must find its basis in negligent conduct on the part of its servants, regardless of their inexperience or incompetency, since the employment of incompetent and inexperienced servants is not in itself a ground of negligence. And in Denver City Tramway Co. v. Cowan (1911) 51 Colo. 64, 116 Pac. 136, an action for injuries sustained in attempting to board a street car, in which the complaint, among other things, alleged that the servants in charge of the car were reckless, inexperienced, and inattentive to their duties,—all of which was known or ought to have been known to the company,—it was held that the right of recovery depended upon the negligence of the servants at the time of the accident, and that the general incompetency of the servants was not involved. White, J., in reaching this conclusion said: "In the case at bar, neither the condition of the car nor the incompetency of the servants is involved. The plaintiff could recover only by showing that the servants of defendant in charge of the car were guilty of negligence, resulting in his injuries at the time and place alleged. The only way in which to establish such negligence was by showing that such servants, then and there, started the car without giving plaintiff sufficient time to safely board the same. Indeed, that is the only issue made by the pleadings or sought to be sustained by the evidence. If defendant's servants were not negligent at the time plaintiff sustained the injuries of which he complains, it was wholly immaterial how habitually and recklessly negligent they might have been prior thereto; or, if they were negligent then, how careful and prudent they had previously been. The incompetency of the servants, and notice thereof on the part of defendant, because of the nature of the case, were wholly immaterial, and the case must necessarily be determined under the general rule." So, in Minot v. Snavelly (1909) 97 C. C. A. 30, 172 Fed. 212, 19 Ann. Cas. 996, which was an action based on the alleged incompetence and negligence of the operator of a passenger elevator, it was held that the liability of the master depended wholly upon the fact whether the person operating the elevator was negligent at the time of the accident, and not upon the question of his general competency or incompetency, that being immaterial. Again in Davis v. Ohio Valley Bkg. & T. Co. (1908) 127 Ky. 800, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 402, 106 S. W. 843, where it was contended that defendant was guilty of negligence in permitting a boy to run an elevator, the court said: "Whether or not the operator was qualified to discharge the duties of the place is not a material inquiry, under our conception of the law of the case. The operator was placed in charge of the elevator by appellee. It thus assumed responsibility for his acts. If he permitted boys to play on the elevator, or ride on it in dangerous places, his employer must be held to the same degree of accountability as if the person in charge of the elevator had been a careful and experienced man. The liability of appellee is to be tested in this particular case, not by the age, understanding, or fitness of its employee, but by his acts." And in both Peck v. Neil (1842) 3 McLean, 22, Fed. Cas. No. 10,892, 10 Am. Neg.

Cas. 664, and Peck v. Neil (1842) 3 McLean, 26, Fed. Cas. No. 10,893, which involved the question of the duty of a carrier by stagecoach to provide competent drivers, the court charged that a driver's "good or bad conduct can only be looked at, at the time the accident occurred, or as connected with the accident," which, of course, meant that it was the particular act or acts of the driver at the time of the accident which determined the liability of the carrier. And in this connection see Holladay v. Kennard (1871) 12 Wall. (U. S.) 254, 20 L. ed. 390, wherein it was said that whether the driver of a stagecoach was competent and such as should have been employed "could only be judged of by what he did or what he neglected to do" at the time complained of. The court, however, did say that since the position of driver of the coach was one requiring skill and capacity, it would be negligent not to employ a person having those qualifications.

And for a better reason it would seem that the same rule would apply as to servants coming in contact with the public, but not having charge of a so-called dangerous agency. Such a case was Oakland City Agri. & Industrial Soc. v. Bingham (1891) 4 Ind. App. 545, 31 N. E. 383, where in holding that an agricultural society could not be held liable for an assault on a third person on the theory that it had placed an incompetent policeman or keeper in charge of its gate, the court said that an employer cannot be held to account for failing to exercise care in the selection of a suitable person for a given position unless the failure to discharge the duties of the position properly resulted in an injury to another, the theory being that a master is responsible only for misconduct even in the case of an incompetent servant. And in both McNally v. Colwell (1892) 91 Mich. 527, 30 Am. St. Rep. 494, 52 N. W. 70, and Cowley v. Colwell (1892) 91 Mich. 537, 52 N. W. 73, it was held that there could be no question made as to whether the defendant had negligently employed an incompetent servant, where it does not appear that such incompetency, if any, was the cause of the injury complained of.

However, it has been broadly held that the hiring of an incompetent servant is itself an act of negligence rendering the master liable to a third person for injuries resulting from a negligent act of the servant, the theory being that the master is liable for the consequences of his negligent act. Thus, in Wanstall v. Pooley (1841) 6 Clark & F. 911, note, 7 Eng. Reprint, 940, note, where a shopkeeper hired an incompetent person to deliver goods, and such servant negligently left a truck in the street whereby a traveler was injured by falling over it, it was held that the employment of the incompetent was an act of negligence, since by such employment the master set the whole thing in motion and must therefore answer for the consequences. It is to be observed, however, that the servant was guilty of negligence for which the master would be responsible under the doctrine of respondeat superior, regardless of whether he was competent or not.

In another line of cases the courts have held that persons or companies employing dangerous instrumentalities must exercise due care and diligence to have competent employees in charge thereof, and that failure to do so constitutes negligence; but such cases also hold that the master is not liable by reason of having employed incompetent servants unless such incompetency was the proximate cause of the injury, which qualification seems to imply that the recovery, if any, must be based on the incompetent servant's wrongful acts or omissions at the time of the infliction of the injuries complained of. Illustration of cases of this character is afforded by Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Neill (1910) 100 C. C. A. 658, 177 Fed. 328; Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Bibb (1910) 164 Ala. 62, 51 So. 345; Alabama City, G. & A. R. Co. v. Bessiere (1914) 190 Ala. 59, 66 So. 805; Broadstreet v. Hall (1907) 168 Ind. 192, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933, 120 Am. St. Rep. 356, 80 N. E. 145; Ewing & Sons v. Callahan (1907) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 537, 105 S. W. 978; Schafer v. Gilmer (1878) 13 Nev. 330; 8 A.L.R.—37.

and Hays v. Millar (1874) 77 Pa. 238, 18 Am. Rep. 445. For instance, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Neill (1910) 100 C. C. A. 658, 177 Fed. 328, a railroad crossing accident case, the court upheld a charge to the jury to the effect that if the engineer was incompetent or physically unfit to properly discharge his duties, it was negligence upon the part of the company to employ him for that work, but the court in the charge complained of also had stated that in order to recover upon this ground, the jury must also find that such negligent hiring was the cause of the accident.

Also of interest in connection with the present inquiry are those cases which merely determine the question of the admissibility of evidence as to the competency of the servant whose acts or omissions resulted in injury to a third person, and in which the decisions were based upon the theory that the only real issue was as to the negligence of the servant on the particular occasion under consideration, or, in other words, in which the liability of the master was regarded as resting on the wrongful act of the servant at the time of the accident, so that questions of general competency or incompetency were not elements for discussion or determination. However, no case of this kind has been discovered wherein there was a charge or allegation of negligence in the hiring of incompetent or inexperienced employees. Consequently, such cases, being based, as they are, on the alleged negligence of the servant, rather than on the hiring of an incompetent servant, have no direct bearing upon the question of annotation, the evidence having been offered in proof or disproof of the charge of negligence on the part of the servant. Illustrative of this class of cases are Harriman v. Pullman Palace-Car Co. (1898) 29 C. C. A. 194, 56 U. S. App. 313, 85 Fed. 353; Towle v. Pacific Improv. Co. (1893) 98 Cal. 342, 83 Pac. 207; Dinsmore v. Wolber (1899) 85 Ill. App. 152; and American Straw Board Co. v. Smith (1901) 94 Md. 19, 50 Atl. 414. For instance, in Fonda v. St. Paul City R. Co. (1898) 71 Minn. 438, 70 Am. St.

Rep. 341, 74 N. W. 166, an action based on the alleged negligence of a street car motorman, evidence of the general incompetence of such motorman was declared inadmissible. The court said: "If the motorman was negligent on this occasion, the defendant is liable, no matter how competent he was or how habitually careful he had been on other occasions. On the other hand, if he was not negligent on this occasion, the defendant is not liable, notwithstanding that he may have been incompetent or habitually careless on former occasions. The sole issue (aside from that as to plaintiff's contributory negligence) was whether or not the motorman was guilty of negligence at the time of the accident. When the act or omission is proved, whether it be actionable negligence is to be determined by the character of the act or omission itself, and not by the character of prior acts of the party committing it. If the plaintiff could offer testimony as to the general incompetency or as to prior negligent acts or omissions of the motorman, then with equal propriety the defendant, upon the issue of contributory negligence, might offer evidence of plaintiff's general carelessness, or of his negligent acts on other occasions. Indeed, we do not see why plaintiff would not, upon the same principle, have the right to introduce evidence that he himself was an habitually careful and cautious man. As the liability of a master for the acts of his servant rests upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, it can make no difference as to the admissibility of such evidence whether the alleged negligent act was committed by the servant or by the master in person. Hence, if the offered evidence was admissible in this case, it would have been equally competent had the defendant been a natural person, and operating the car himself, to prove that he was incompetent to perform such work, or had performed it negligently on former occasions." And in Monroe v. Hartford Street R. Co. (1903) 76 Conn. 201, 56 Atl. 498, an action for damages for the alleged negligence of the motorman of a street car, it was said that an instruction permitting the jury to consider, in determining the care used in the management of the car at the time of the accident, "facts tending to prove negligence in the selection of competent servants," would be fatally erroneous. It should also be remembered that there are some cases in which the courts proceeding upon the theory that the proprietor of a public conveyance such as an electric street car must employ men of experience and competency have admitted evidence of this character, but it seems that such evidence is generally regarded as merely bearing on the question of negligence at the time of the injury complained of. See Blumenthal v. Union Electric Co. (1906) 129 Iowa, 322, 105 N. W. 588, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 235, and Fisher v. Waupaca Electric Light & R. Co. (1910) 141 Wis. 515, 124 N. W. 1005. And the decisions such as Jones v. Co-operative Asso. of America (1912) 109 Me. 448, L.R.A. 1915E, 745, 84 Atl. 985, which lay down the rule that evidence of the hiring of an incompetent servant is competent, but not conclusive, evidence of negligence with respect to all consequences resulting from a failure of duty on the part of such a servant,—should not be confused with those cases which determine whether or not the hiring of an incompetent servant constitutes an independent ground of negligence. Also excluded for lack of bearing on the question under annotation are those cases where it appears that the servant actually was negligent at the time of the accident, and in which it was held that the incompetency of the servant was not a material element for the reason that the employer was responsible for the servant's negligence, whether he was or was not competent. See, for example, Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Ellison (1889) 117 Ind. 234, 20 N. E. 135, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 445, and Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Francisco (1912) 149 Ky. 307, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 83, 148 S. W. 46, 2 N. C. C. A. 636.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Vincent D. Wyman, Harry C. Kinne, and Charles E. Carpenter, for appellant:

The name of a corporation is an essential element of the corporation's existence. It is in fact its very being.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was begun in the superior court of Cook county by the Pilsen Brewing Company, the appellant, against William Wallace, the appellee, and R. D. Beaird. The declaration was the common counts in assumpsit and a special count averring that Wallace was president and Beaird secretary of a pretended stock corporation known as the Chicago Grains & Feed Company, and on October 1, 1912, entered into a contract with the plaintiff, in the name of the pretended corporation, to purchase brewers' wet grains, but no charter to conduct said pretended corporation was ever issued by the secretary of state, or filed for record in the office of the recorder of deeds of Cook county, where the principal office of the pretended corporation was located; that the plaintiff delivered to said corporation 10,000 tons of wet grains of the value of $5,000, and by means of the premises and the statute the defendants became liable to pay said amount to the plaintiff. Wallace, only, was served with process, and he appeared and pleaded the general issue. A jury was waived, and the cause was tried by the court upon a stipulation of the facts. The court found for the defendant, and entered judgment against the plaintiff for costs. On appeal to the appellate court for the first district the judgment was affirmed and that court granted a certificate of importance and an appeal to this court.

The Farmers' Grain & Feed Company was incorporated under the Illinois statute with a capital stock of $150,000. On May 26, 1911, the stockholders adopted a resolution increasing the capital stock to $200,000, but never filed any certificate of the increase in the office of the secretary of state or the recorder of deeds of Cook county. On June 18, 1912, the stockholders adopted a resolution to change the name of the corporation to Chicago

Grains & Feed Company. No certificate of a change of name was made or filed in the office of the secretary of state or in the recorder's office of Cook county, but the corporation and its officers thereafter did business under the new name. Wallace was a stockholder, owning 1,386 shares of the capital stock, of the par value of $100 each, and was president, director, and acting manager of the corporation until June 10, 1913, when he resigned as president and director. On October 1, 1912, a contract signed by Beaird as secretary, with the knowledge and consent of Wallace, was made with the plaintiff in the name of the Chicago Grains & Feed Company, for brewers' wet grains, and such grains were delivered under the contract to the amount of $4,476.80. The plaintiff had no knowledge as to the steps taken for changing the name of the corporation. On September 5, 1913, an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the Chicago Grains & Feed Company, and it was adjudicated a bankrupt, and plaintiff filed its claim in the bankruptcy proceeding and received a dividend of 5 per cent.

The declaration stated a cause of action under § 18 of the Act Concerning Corporations (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1917, chap. 32), on account of a failure to comply with provisions of that act, but the evidence did not establish a liability under that section. It provides that, if any person or persons being or pretending to be an officer or agent or board of directors of any stock corporation or pretended stock corporation shall assume to exercise corporate powers or use the name of any such corporation or pretended corporation without complying with the provisions of that act before all stock named in the articles of corporation shall be subscribed in good faith, they shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts and liabilities made by them and contracted in the name of such corporation or pretended corporation.

The liability declared by that section is incurred only by a failure to comply with the provisions of that act, and as it does not make any provision for the change of name of a corporation, and there was no failure to comply with its terms in the organization of the Farmers' Grain & Feed Company, the defendant did not become liable by virtue of that section. If a liability existed, it was not statutory, but arose from a failure to comply with the provisions of another act authorizing changing the names of corporations, which contains no similar provision. If there was a liability, it rested upon the rule of law that when individuals act under a corporate form and in a corporate name, when there solved themselves from personal liability and are liable as partners. Independently of § 18, a company which is not a corporate body is a partnership composed of the officers and subscribers to the articles of association. Bigelow v. Gregory, 78 Ill. 197; Loverin v. McLaughlin, 161 Ill. 417, 44 N.E. 99; Joseph T. Ryerson & Son v. Shaw, 277 Ill. 524, 115 N. E. 650.

The act concerning corporations, under which the Farmers' Grain & Feed Company was organized, provides that persons proposing to form a corporation under the act shall make a statement setting forth, with other things, the name of the proposed corporation, and the name so fixed is an essential part of the corporate existence. A corporation has no right or power, of itself, to change or alter the name originally selected by it, without complying with such form of proceeding as may be prescribed by law. 7 R. C. L. 128. A corporation cannot, except as authorized by law, change its name, either directly or by user; but if a corporation acts by a wrong name it will not be permitted to avail itself of its own wrong after receiving the consideration. Sykes v. People, 132 Ill. 32, 23 N. E. 391.

Estoppel—acting under wrong corporate name—receiving consideration.

The name of the corporation, the Farmers' Grain & Feed Company, was not changed, but its business was continued by the same officers under the new name on the assumption that a change had been made. There may be circumstances perhaps justifying a conclusion that a change of name amounts to a destruction of the corporation. It was held in Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Bate, 96 Ky. 356, 49 Am. St. Rep. 300, 26 S. W. 538, that an unauthorized change of name under the circumstances of that case was an abandonment not only of the corporate name, but of the corporation itself, and that an attempted substitution of a new name made the members of the corporation liable as partners, under contracts entered into in the substituted name. Individuals had acquired the entire stock of a corporation, and, without taking any legal steps, changed the name of the corporation to the names of the individuals, and by the substituted name accepted a draft, and it was held that the effect of the change of the name was an abandonment of both the corporate name and the corporation. That case was so different in its facts as to have no legitimate bearing on this case, in which there was an abortive attempt to change the name of the corporation as authorized by the statute. The law was complied with so far as the resolution of the stockholders was concerned, and the only failure to complete the change was in not having the change filed in the office of the secretary of state and recorded in the recorder's office. For that failure the name was not in fact changed, and the original corporation continued without any change of name and carried on business as before, under an unauthorized name. If the corporation was liable on the contract, the defendant was not. If there had been an actual change of name, it would not have affected in any manner the identity of the corporation, or added to or detracted from its rights or obligations.

In Mt. Palatine Academy v. Kleinschnitz, 28 Ill. 183, the Mount Palatine Academy was incorporated, and land was conveyed to it. Afterward, in 1851, the act of incorporation was amended by including in the corporation a college by the name and title of Judson College, which amounted to a change of name of the corporation. The court said that, if in strictness of law there were two corporations in name, there was but one in fact, and that was the old one, and if all the acts done under the name of Judson College were the acts of the old corporation under a new name, then the note and trust deed in question in the case were executed by the old corporation under the new name, and it should be as much bound by it as if it had been done under the proper legal name. The court likened the case to a change of name by an individual, and said that if an individual should change his name without authority of law, or even against law, and give notes and execute deeds, they would be obligatory upon him and as effective in law as if all had been done in his proper name. The Farmers' Grain & Feed Company continued in existence with the same stockholders, officers, and agents, and carried on the same business as before, but under an unauthorized name. It was not relieved from liability on the contracts made in the name of the Chicago Grains & Feed Company, and, that being so, the defendant was not liable.

ANNOTATION.

Personal liability of officers or stockholders for debts of corporation which has made an unauthorized change in its name.

The decision in the reported case (PILSEN BREWING CO. v. WALLACE, ante, 579), that an unauthorized change of the name of a corporation does not destroy the corporate identity and render its officers or stockholders, who thereafter contract in the new name liable as partners, is supported by Richards v. Minnesota Sav. Bank (1899) 75 Minn. 196, 77 N. W. 822, and Robinson v. First Nat. Bank (1904) 98 Tex. 184, 82 S. W. 505, reversing (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 103. But the opposite conclusion was reached in Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Bate (1894) 96 Ky. 356, 49 Am. St. Rep. 300, 26 S. W. 538, which is cited in the PILSEN BREWING CO. CASE.

In Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Bate (Ky.) supra, the court held that the effect of an unauthorized change of name of a corporation was an abandonment not only of the former corporate name, but of the corporation itself, and that the stockholders were individually liable for a debt thereafter incurred while they were doing business under the new name, since no new corporation was created and the business was being done by them as partners. It was said: "The contention of the appellant is that Bate and the other owners of the old concern, having abandoned the corporate name, and adopted a new name which gave special prominence to the names of the individuals composing the concern, are individually liable as partners in a venture, for the reason that no legal steps were taken to change the corporate name, as might have been done under the easy mode provided by the Indiana statute. . . . The parties assuming to do business as such company did not take a single step required by the statute for the purpose of creating a corporation, or of changing the name of the old corporation. The name of a corporation is 'the very being of its constitution, . . . without which it could not perform its corporate functions.' . . . The effect of such change of name is an abandonment not only of the corporate name, but of the corporation itself. The identity of the creature authorized by the statute to do business is destroyed. It is in no sense like the case where an individual changes his name. The very being of its constitution is destroyed by an abandonment of its name, and an attempted substitution of a new name, without authority of law." To the same effect is an earlier appeal reported in (1892) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 469.

And in Senn v. Levy (1901) 111 Ky. 318, 63 S. W. 776, the court, citing Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Bate (Ky.) supra, said: "A corporation exists only in its corporate name, and a change of name was an abandonment not only of the corporate name, but of the corporation itself. The old creature was destroyed and a new one sprang into existence, clothed with all the new powers, and charged with all the new responsibilities, imposed by the statutes which gave it birth." The change of name in this instance, however, was not, it seems, unauthorized.

It is stated (obiter) in Campbell v. J. I. Campbell Co. (1906) 117 La. 402, 41 So. 696, that the members of a foreign corporation authorized to do business in certain counties of the state of its organization, who come into a state and do business under another name without complying with the laws of the latter state, are liable as members of a partnership.

But the decision in Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Bate (Ky.) supra, does not seem to be in accord with the principles declared in a number of cases, and is, as stated above, opposed to the holding in several cases, besides the reported case (PILSEN BREWING CO. v. WALLACE).

Thus, in Richards v. Minnesota Sav. Bank (Minn.) supra, it was said, regarding an attempted change in the name of a savings bank and of its place of business, that if the change was void, because unauthorized, it would not affect the existence of the corporation, although it would affect its strictly legal right to exercise its corporate privileges under the new name. And in this case, the court, assuming for the purposes of the case the unconstitutionality of the statute under which a savings bank attempted to change its name, held that it gave the bank color of law for its action in changing its name, and if it thereafter, with the implied, if not the direct, consent of the state, in good faith exercised its corporate powers under the new name, it was a de facto if not a de jure corporation, and its stockholders were not individually liable to one who dealt with it as a corporation under the new name. The court said: "The case at bar, then, in its last analysis, is simply this: The Minnesota Savings Bank, a de facto corporation, in good faith assumes and exercises all of the functions and powers of a de jure corporation, with the acquiescence of the state; and the plaintiff contracts with it as such, on the faith of its corporate responsibility; and not otherwise. The contract is legally enforceable by him against the bank. But the bank becomes insolvent, and then the plaintiff seeks to repudiate his contract with it, and to charge innocent stockholders, who did not have, and were not permitted by law to have, any control of the affairs of the bank, as partners, with the entire liabilities of the bank. Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, happily the laws of this state sanction no such injustice. It is the settled law of this state that a creditor who has dealt with a corporation de facto in its corporate name and capacity, and given credit to it, and not to its members or stockholders, cannot, in the absence of fraud, charge them as partners with the debts of the corporation."

And the unauthorized change of a name of a corporation, it was held in Robinson v. First Nat. Bank (1904) 98 Tex. 184, 82 S. W. 505, reversing (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 103, supra, would not render the stockholders liable as partners for a liability subsequently incurred by a loan to the corporation. The court said that if the name was adopted as a new name for the corporation, and if the understanding between the parties to the loan was that it was made to the corporation, and not to a partnership under the new name, then the stockholders were not individually liable; but that if the stockholders agreed to cease doing business as a corporation, and to carry it on as a partnership under the new name, all would be bound for the debt. It was held accordingly that an instruction was erroneous that if the jury believed from the evidence that prior to the note sued on the defendants (the individual stockholders) agreed to cease doing business under the old name, and to do business in another name, for their mutual benefit, this, in law, would make them partners whether they intended to become partners or not.

It was held in Stafford Nat. Bank v. Palmer (1880) 47 Conn. 443, that a stockholder in a Massachusetts corporation, who until long after its organization knew nothing of the formation of a joint stock company under the laws of Connecticut, which succeeded to the Massachusetts corporation's property and carried on the business at the same place until it became insolvent, and whose only connection with the new corporation was to receive a certificate of stock therein in lieu of his old certificate in the Massachusetts company, could not be held liable as a partner for a debt incurred by the new company, even though it was illegally organized.

Some cases not, on their facts, within the scope of the annotation, may profitably be examined in this connection, because of their value on the question whether by an unauthorized change of name the corporation loses its identity. These cases, however, are cited as illustrative only, and no attempt is made to cite exhaustively the cases on the questions involved.

In O'Donnell v. C. R. Johns & Co. (1890) 76 Tex. 362, 13 S. W. 376, it was held that an attempted change in a corporation's name, if unlawful, would not destroy the corporate identity, but there would still be a lawful corporation under the original name, in which it might maintain an action.

And in Marmet Co. v. Archibald (1893) 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. 299, the court quoted with approval the doctrine that the identity of a corporation is no more affected by a change of name than the identity of an individual, and that, while the agents of a corporation have no implied authority to use any name except that in the charter, the use of a wrong name is ordinarily not material if the corporation is really intended; and that a contract entered into by a corporation under an assumed name may be enforced by either of the parties, the identity of the company being established by the ordinary methods of proof.

Also, in King v. Ilwaco R. & Nav. Co. (1890) 1 Wash. 127, 23 Pac. 924, the court said that if the attempt to change the corporate name was futile, either because there was no law authorizing it or because the law was not complied with, it followed that the plaintiff's name was the old and not the new name.

And where a corporation which had attempted to change its name, but had not legally done so because it had not filed and recorded the resolution authorizing the change, made an assignment for creditors under the new name, the court in Woodrough & H. Co. v. Witte (1895) 89 Wis. 537, 62 N. W.

518, said that the true name of the corporation was the old name, and that by that name it should sue and be sued, thus apparently negating the idea that the corporation had lost its identity. The assignment was held valid under the rule that a corporation, like a natural person, can bind itself by contract under an assumed name. But this holding, it will be observed, is not necessarily incompatible with the view that a corporation is dissolved by an unauthorized change of name, and that the stockholders are liable as partners. That contention was made in the case, and in reply thereto the court said that this theory established the validity of the assignment, since it could not be questioned that, as partners, the stockholders might use the new name as a firm name, and that an assignment of the partnership property under that name would be valid.

And in Speaker v. State (1917) — Ala. App. —, 75 So. 178, it was held that an attempt by a corporation to change its name, which was futile because statutory requirements were not complied with, did not operate to dissolve the company, or convert it into a de facto corporation. The court said that the statute prescribed the method of dissolving a corporation, that the attempt to change the name could not affect the company's legal status, and that, irrespective of how the business was conducted, the legal name of the company was the old name. ## STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. TWIN CITY BUILDING & INVESTMENT COMPANY, Respt.,

JAMES G. HOUGHTON, Inspector of Buildings of the City of Minneapolis, Appt.

(— Minn. —, 176 N. W. 159.)

1. Laws 1915, chap. 128, provide for restricted residence districts in cities of the first class, in which certain classes of buildings shall not be erected. Such restricted district is established by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and apartment houses, among other classes of buildings, are prohibited therein. The Constitution permits the taking or destruction or damage of private property for public use alone. It is held that the restriction, as applied to an apartment house, is based upon a "public use," and that the statute providing for condemnation is constitutional.

Constitutional law — title of act — sufficiency.

2. The subject of Laws 1915, chap. 128 (Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 1639-10 to 1639-16), relating to restricted residence districts in cities of the first class, for the establishment of which condemnation is provided, is sufficiently expressed in its title, within the constitutional requirement, though the subject of condemnation is not mentioned in it.

Eminent domain — propriety of taking — question for legislature.

3. The propriety and necessity of taking property for a public use, and the mode prescribed for the compensation, are questions for the legislature and not for the courts.

[See 10 R. C. L. 183.]

Messrs. James Schoonmaker, C. D. O'Brien, M. D. Munn, E. B. Graves, William F. Hunt, and Thomas Fitzpatrick, also amici curiæ.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mandamus, on relation of the Twin City Building & Improvement Company, against James G. Houghton, inspector of buildings of Minneapolis, to require him to issue it a building permit. There was an answer to the alternative writ, to which a demurrer was sustained, and judgment was then entered for the relator, from which the defendant appeals.

The only question is upon the constitutionality of Laws 1915, chap. 128 (Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 1639-10 to 1639-16). The relator claims that the statute is unconstitutional, because its subject is not expressed in its title, and because the use for which it is proposed to exercise the power of eminent domain is not a public use.

The act is entitled: "An Act Authorizing Cities of the First Class to Designate and Establish Restricted Residence Districts and to Prohibit the Erection, Alteration and Repair of Buildings Thereon for Certain Prohibited Purposes."

It provides for establishing restricted residence districts by condemnation. The claim of the relator is that the subject of the act is not expressed in its title, within the constitutional requirement. Const. art. 4, § 27. We have given this matter consideration, and reach the conclusion that the subject of the act is sufficiently expressed in its title. The matter has been gone over frequently, and the question does not call for discussion. Dunnell's Dig. (Minn.) and 1916 Supp. §§ 8906 et seq.

The remaining question is whether there is any public use in aid of which the right of eminent domain may be used.

On March 8, 1918, the city council passed a resolution, pursuant to Laws 1915, chap. 128, designating block 8, in J. T. Blaisdell's revised addition of Minneapolis, as a restricted residence district. The relator owns lot 13 and the south 84.9 feet of lot 12 in this block. It was proposing to erect a three-story apartment building, costing approximately $50,000, and for this building a permit for certain parts of the structure was asked and denied. Laws 1915, chap. 128, provide for the designation by the common council of restricted residence districts and the prohibition of the erection therein of buildings of a certain class, including such as the apartment building intended by the relator. Sections 1 and 2 of the statute (Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 1639-10, 1639-11), important here, are as follows:

"Section 1. Any city of the first class may, through its council, upon petition of fifty (50) per cent of the owners of the real estate in the district sought to be affected, designate and establish by proceedings hereunder restricted residence districts within its limits wherein no building or other structure shall thereafter be erected, altered or repaired for any of the following purposes, to wit, hotels, restaurants, eating houses, mercantile business, stores, factories, warehouses, printing establishments, tailor shops, coal yards, ice houses, blacksmith shops, repair shops, paint shops, bakeries, dyeing, cleaning and laundering establishments, billboards and other advertising devices, public garages, public stables, apartment houses, tenement houses, flat buildings, any other building or structure for purposes similar to the foregoing. Public garages and public stables shall include those, and only those, operated for gain.

"Nothing herein contained shall be construed to exclude double residences or duplex houses, so-called, schools, churches, or signs advertising for rent or sale the property only on which they are placed.

"No building or structure erected after the creation of such district shall be used for any purpose for which its erection shall be prohibited hereunder.

"The term 'council' in this act shall mean the chief governing body of the city by whatever name called.

"Section 2. The council shall first designate the restricted residence district, and shall have power to acquire by eminent domain the right to exercise the powers granted by this act by proceedings hereinafter defined, and when such proceedings shall have been completed the right to exercise such powers shall be vested in the city."

The Constitution provides that "private property shall not be taken, destroyed or damaged for public use, without just compensation therefor first paid or secured." Const. art. 1, § 13.

The parties agree that the only question involved, the question of the title aside, is the constitutionality of the statute under the eminent domain provision of the Constitution. That question is the single question whether the legislature may authorize a common council to establish by condemnation a restricted residence district which shall exclude apartment buildings, and that question is whether there is a public use in such restriction.

That the public gets no physical use of the premises condemned is clear. It cannot travel upon or occupy them. The use acquired, so far as the general public is concerned, is rather negative in character, except, perhaps, that its sense of the appropriate and harmonious will not be offended by the erection in the condemned district of prescribed buildings. The condemnation does not take any part of the ground away from the owner; the taking consists in restricting its use. He is compensated for the restriction imposed, but compensation is merely an incident to the exercise of the right of condemnation, and without a public use to be served gives no right.

Naturally enough, we do not find parallel cases. It is not supposed that a considerable portion of the public will derive benefit from the restriction. This is evidenced by the requirement that the condemnation money ultimately be paid from assessments for benefits to the restricted district, which in this case is one block. It is not paid out of the general fund, though the city's credit is pledged for it. It is treated much as a local benefit or use; but this fact, or the fact that only a small part of the public is appreciably or directly benefited, does not make the use not public. 10 R. C. L. p. 31.

"In holding a use to be public, it has never been deemed essential that the entire community, or any considerable portion of it, should directly enjoy or participate in the improvement or enterprise." Sisson v. Buena Vista County, 128 Iowa, 442, 70 L.R.A. 440, 104 N. W. 454.

The notion of what is public use changes from time to time. Public use expands with the new needs created by the advance of civilization and the modern tendency of the people to crowd into large cities. Such a taking as here proposed could not possibly have been thought a taking for public use at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, when the state was practically a wilderness without a single city worthy of the name.

"The term 'public use' is flexible and cannot be limited to the public use known at the time of the forming of the Constitution." Stewart v. Great Northern R. Co. 65 Minn. 515, 33 L.R.A. 427, 68 N. W. 208.

What constitutes a public use at the time it is sought to exercise the power of eminent domain is the test. The Constitution is as it was when adopted; but, when it employs terms which change in definition as conditions change, it refers to them in the sense in which they are meant when the protection of the Constitution is sought. The Constitution of this state nowhere attempts to define what may be a public use, nor does it prohibit the legislature from determining what shall be deemed such a use.

In comparatively recent times it was questioned whether a public use extended so far as to justify the condemnation of property and the expenditure of money for public parks, or for boulevards, or for pleasure drives, or for public baths, or for playgrounds, or for libraries and museums, or for numerous other purposes which contribute to the general good. Now condemnation and expenditure for these and like or similar purposes are common, and recognized as lawful. Not so very long ago there would have been a revolt against restricting a property owner in the full use of his lot to the street line. But a condemnation for the purpose of widening a street by adding a strip on each side, which is not to be used for travel, but for ornament and beauty, and with the reservation of a limited use in the owner, is held valid. Re Clinton Ave. 57 App. Div. 166, 68 N. Y. Supp. 196, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 624, 60 N. E. 1108. The taking of land used as a stone quarry along the Palisades of the Hudson, for the purpose of preserving the scenic beauty of the river and of the park, has been sustained as a taking for public use. Bunyan v. Palisades Interstate Park Comrs. 167 App. Div. 457, 153 N. Y. Supp. 622. A case often cited is

Atty. Gen. v. Williams, 174 Mass. 476, 47 L.R.A. 314, 55 N. E. 77, where a statute limiting the height of buildings about Copley square, on compensation paid, was sustained; and condemnation was sustained for preserving and improving and ornamenting the battlefield of Gettysburg. United States v. Gettysburg Electric R. Co. 160 U. S. 668, 40 L. ed. 576, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427. The condemnation was thought clearly for a public use.

In the prevailing and dissenting opinions in State ex rel. Lachtman v. Houghton, 134 Minn. 226, L.R.A. 1917F, 1050, 158 N. W. 1017, where the question was upon the propriety of the exclusion of a store from a restricted residence district under the police power, there was a thorough examination of the authorities, many of which are of value here; but they do not call for reconsideration. The right to restrict under the police power without compensation, and to restrict by condemnation with compensation, differ, but have much in common. It is likely that many of the businesses and buildings referred to in the statute could be excluded under the police power. It is unnecessary to cite or discuss authorities at length, but the following may be noted: Nichols, Em. Dom. §§ 40, 58, 100, 101; 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 271 et seq.; Dill, Mun. Corp. § 695; 10 R. C. L. 36; 4 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. 1485 et seq.; 20 Harvard L. Rev. 35; 27 Harvard L. Rev. 665; 15 Mich. L. Rev. 75; 1 Minn. L. Rev. 489.

The tendency is in the direction of extending the power of restriction, either through the exercise of the police power or the exercise of the right of eminent domain in aid of the so-called city planning, or the improvement of housing conditions. Our elaborate Housing Code of 1917 is an illustration of an effort on the part of the state, through the exercise of the police power, to so regulate the construction of buildings that living conditions shall be better. Chapter 137, Laws 1917

(Gen. Stat. Supp. 1917, §§ 4755-1 et seq.). The tendency is also illustrated by such decisions as State ex rel. Banner Grain Co. v. Houghton, — Minn. —, 170 N. W. 853, where we held that the exclusion of a factory manufacturing cereal products, from a residence district, was sustainable under the police power, although the district was sparsely settled and of the ordinary class of dwellings, and though the property was naturally suited for the use of such a factory, located as it was on a railway line.

The expression is often found in the decisions that whether a use is public is a judicial question. No doubt it needs be where the legislature has not attempted to designate or define the public use for which condemnation is sought. Justice Mitchell, in Fairchild v. St. Paul, 46 Minn. 540, 49 N. W. 325, in speaking of the limitation upon the power of eminent domain, said: "Of course, there is the further limitation, necessarily implied, that the use shall be a public one, upon which question the determination of the legislature is not conclusive upon the courts."

This implies that in the first instance the legislature may designate what is a public use for which condemnation can be exercised.

"The question as it presents itself to the courts is not whether the use is public, but whether the legislature might reasonably have considered it public. The presumption is that a use is public if the legislature has declared it to be such, and the decision of the legislature must be treated with the consideration due to a co-ordinate department of the government of the state." 10 R. C. L. pp. 29 and 30.

And, among the cases there cited, we find Justice Marshall (in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Morehouse, 112 Wis. 1, 56 L.R.A. 240, 88 Am. St. Rep. 918, 87 N. W. 849) conceding that "the right to declare what shall be deemed a public use" is "vested primarily in the legislature." In Bankhead v. Brown, 25

Iowa, 540, Chief Justice Dillon said: "If a public use be declared by the legislature the courts will hold the use public, unless it manifestly appears by the provisions of the act that they can have no tendency to advance and promote such public use."

Instead of it manifestly appearing that the legislature has authorized the taking for a use not public, by the law in question, we think good reason exists for saying that the restrictions which may be imposed upon the owner of property, under the provisions of the act, constitute a taking for a public use. That the act unmistakably implies that the taking, or the restricting, is deemed to be for a public use, is clear from the fact that condemnation is the means employed to achieve the end in view. No one will gainsay that the chief aim of all legislation is the general good or public welfare. Legislators must ascertain and determine what makes for public welfare in order to enact laws designed to promote and secure the same. Many reasons might be suggested as sufficient for the adoption of this statute. We will mention but one or two. It must be admitted that owners of land in congested cities have of late, through selfish and unworthy motives, put it to such use that serious inconvenience and loss result to other landowners in the neighborhood. In large cities, where the lots for residences must necessarily be of the minimum size, especially where the man of small means must dwell, it is readily seen that if a home is built on such a lot, and thereafter three-story apartments extending to the lot line are constructed on both sides of the home, it becomes almost unlivable and its value utterly destroyed. Not only that, but the construction of such apartments or other like buildings in a territory of individual homes depreciates very much the values in the whole territory. The loss is not only to the owners, but to the state and municipality, by reason of the diminished taxes resulting from diminished values.

The absence of restrictions of use also gives occasion for extortion. The occurrences have been common in our large cities of unscrupulous and designing persons securing lots in desirable residential districts, and then passing the word that an apartment or other objectionable structure is to be erected thereon. In order to protect themselves against heavy loss and bitter annoyance, the adjacent owners, or parties interested in property in the neighborhood, are forced to buy the lots so held at exorbitant prices. The well-to-do may in this way be able, by financial sacrifice, to protect their homes against undesirable invasions. But when this occurs in territory occupied by people of modest homes and moderate means, where all they have is represented by the home, and that, perhaps, not free of mortgage lien, there is nothing to do but to submit to the loss and the injustice. There should be a lawful way to forestall such wrongs. Courts have often resorted to the rule, "sic utere tuo alienum non lædas," in administering justice between property owners. Why should not the legislature also make use of this rule?

Another reason is that giving the people a means to secure for that portion of a city wherein they establish their homes, fit and harmonious surroundings, promotes contentment, induces further efforts to enhance the appearance and value of the home, fosters civic pride, and thus tends to produce a better type of citizens. It is time that courts recognized the esthetic as a factor in life. Beauty and fitness enhance values in public and private structures. But it is not sufficient that the building is fit and proper, standing alone; it should also fit in with surrounding structures to some degree. People are beginning to realize this more than before, and are calling for city planning, by which the individual homes may be segregated from not only industrial and mercantile districts, but also from the districts devoted to hotels and apartments.

Eminent domain —creation of
restricted residence district.

The act in question responds to this call and should be deemed to provide for a taking for a public use. In Com. v. Boston Adv. Co. 188 Mass. 348, 69 L.R.A. 817, 108 Am. St. Rep. 494, 74 N. E. 601, is this language: "We agree that the promotion of the pleasure of the people is a public purpose, for which public money may be used and taxes laid, even if the pleasure is secured merely by delighting one of the senses."

There it was sought to prevent billboards on private property adjoining parks; but the court held it could not be done without compensation. The inference from the reasoning is that the law authorizing the rule prohibiting the billboards would have been sustained, had the restriction upon the owners' use been acquired by condemnation.

Closely analogous to this law is the Drainage Act, which was upheld in Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N. W. 1094. It was there stated that all courts sustained such laws, "when enacted in the interest of the public health, convenience, or welfare." That act left the county commissioners to determine whether the proposed drainage would be "of public utility, or conducive to public health, or of public benefit or convenience." Many of the drainage projects established under this law have no direct effect on the public at large. In many cases the public acquires no more right to pass over or to occupy any part of the land of the drainage system than the public, as such, does under the taking in the act under consideration. The direct benefits are to the individuals owning the land comprising the drainage district, the same as to the owners of lots in the restricted building district. The public health proposition is really of no more actual consequence in the one than in the other. We think there is a public use served by the taking authorized by chap. 128, Laws 1915. It does not seem to impinge any inhibition of state or Federal Constitution.

Given a public use, the propriety and necessity of the taking and the mode prescribed for the compensation are for the legislature. State ex rel. Ford Motor Co. v. District Ct. 133 Minn. 221, 158 N. W. 240. We are concerned only with the question of the constitutionality of the statute, as against the two objections urged and above disposed of. There may be some provisions in the act which permit of an oppressive use, under certain conditions; but we are not interested in them at present. The method of compensation might have been more attractive, had it afforded the right to a jury award. But the one provided was held constitutional as long ago as in Ames v. Lake Superior & M. R. Co. 21 Minn. 241.

The former opinion (— Minn. —, 174 N. W. 885) rendered here-in is overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

Brown, Ch. J., and Dibell, J., dissenting:

We adhere to the views expressed in the former opinion. — Minn. —, 174 N. W. 885.

The reargument brings nothing of moment that is new. It cannot be successfully urged that there is a public use upon which to rest a condemnation which will prevent an owner from building upon his private property an apartment, upon the sole claim, assumed to be well founded, that his building deteriorates property values in the vicinity. If this is so, the owner of vacant land may be restricted in its improvement to such a use as leaves values stationary or enhances them. The suggestion that a condemnation such as is sought can be supported to prevent extortion we cannot accept as sound. No public use can be found, and condemnation money is not paid as tribute. Nor, unless the prevailing opinion changes the law of the state, can it be rightly said that the question whether a use is a public use is not strictly a judicial one. Dunnell's Dig. (Minn.) and 1916 Supp. § 3027.

The maxim, "sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," quoted in the prevailing opinion, is not a foundation principle of eminent domain. It finds application in the exercise of the police power, under which restrictions are imposed without compensation; and it states a principle which we apply in controversies between conflicting private owners. Under the police power, with some reference to this principle, we support restrictions upon the use of private property in a way substantially interfering with the rightful enjoyment by another of his private property. State ex rel. Banner Grain Co. v. Houghton, — Minn. —, 170 N. W. 858, where a cereal factory, the conduct of which substantially annoyed the residents of the community because of noise and dust, was excluded, is an illustration. And in a controversy between private parties, and without a resort to the police power, we restrict the use of private property when it brings substantial physical discomfort to residents of the community, as when it is used for a stone quarry or for stabling purposes. Brede v. Minnesota Crushed Stone Co. — Minn. —, 6 A.L.R. 1092, 173 N. W. 805; Lynch v. Shiely, 131 Minn. 346, 155 N. W. 390.

However far we follow the arguments, we return to the question whether a residence district, voluntarily organized under legislative authorization upon a 50 per cent vote, may exclude from its midst apartment buildings which are thoroughly sanitary, and which furnish satisfactory dwelling places to large numbers of our people, who either cannot live or do not choose to live in detached dwellings, with more or less commodious grounds surrounding. If there may be such an exclusion, there may be a like exclusion of an unsightly cottage, which is the only possible home the owner of the land can build or have, whenever it is displeasing to the composite good taste of the community; and by a like exclusion the architectural fashion of a community may be fixed. Back of all the suggestion of esthetic considerations, and potent in urging the result here sought to be attained, is the disinclination of the exclusive district to have in its midst those who dwell in apartments. It matters not how mentally fit, or how morally correct, or how decorous in conduct they are, they are unwelcome. The exclusive district is unwilling to battle with the economic law which changes the character of residence districts as time goes, or the natural instinct which prompts flat dwellers to seek agreeable surroundings; and so it asks the exercise in its behalf of the state's power of eminent domain.

It is the same feeling which often finds expression in the making of distinctions based on race or nationality, or upon natural or artificial social status. All talk of beautifying parks and public squares and boulevards and establishing playgrounds is quite beside the present discussion. No one questions the public use which justifies condemnation and taxation for them. This court readily gives relief, in a proper case, to a private owner, whose right to the enjoyment of his property is interfered with by another private owner not using his own with a just regard to the enjoyment of his neighbor; but it has not given effect to class distinctions imposed by law.

In conclusion, and without further discussion, our judgment is that the present decision is without constitutional basis for its support, and is directly opposed to the fundamental principle that one may use and enjoy his property as best suits his convenience, so long as no unnecessary injury is done to his neighbor. The statute in question is aimed in the wrong direction, and not in promotion of the general welfare, as that term for many years has been understood and applied by the courts. The intelligent thought of the day notes with some concern the increasing unrest and discontent with the trend of our civil affairs, prevalent among the people, not only of this state and nation, but the world over. Yet that same intelligence, apparently without thought or reflection, at the same time demands the enactment and enforcement of laws the only tendency of which is to add to, and accentuate, in a measure, conditions made the basis of such discontent; legislation like the statute here involved, which in effect segregates the people into classes founded on invidious distinctions, extending to one thereof, by positive law, the powerful eminent domain arm of the state, by which one class may, on esthetic or fanciful grounds, exclude from their selected neighborhood members of the other classes, and thus deprive them arbitrarily of the free enjoyment of their property, although they may be of equal intelligence and moral standing with those thus temporarily vested with the use of that powerful state weapon. Heretofore the people in this country have been permitted to work out their own social relations, unaided by direct legislation. And those who are willing to take cognizance for the moment of the history of civil governments, and of the reasons for the downfall of many of them, cannot but be impressed that the general welfare will best be promoted by a continuance of that method of regulating matters of that kind.

This case, briefed favorably to the result by both lawyers and editors, will create no disturbance nor attract any special attention. The statute which is sustained is but a straw indicating a drifting from constitutional moorings toward class distinctions created and fostered by law.

ANNOTATION.

Eminent domain: power to condemn against particular use of property.

The books contain a number of cases relating to district prohibition of kinds of business and kinds of buildings, decided with reference to the police power; that is to say, to the power to prohibit certain kinds of buildings or business without compensation to the owner. It is not infrequent in these cases to find statements that the prohibition in question cannot be legal, without compensation. This, of course, does not necessarily mean that the prohibition would be legal, with compensation to the owner.

But, as will be seen, the decision in the reported case (STATE EX REL. TWIN CITY BLDG. & INVEST. CO. v. HOUGHTON, ante, 585) is one in the law of eminent domain. It is there held that a statute is constitutional which enables 50 per cent of the inhabitants of a city district to have it restricted so that apartment houses and other designated classes of buildings shall be prohibited therein, the right to build such buildings to be condemned by the city.

In Parker v. Com. (1901) 178 Mass. 199, 59 N. E. 634, where a Massachusetts statute to limit the height of buildings in the vicinity of the state house provided for the payment of damages for the deprivation of any rights existing under the Constitution, the court, in overruling the claim of the state that owners were entitled to no damages, said, inter alia: "In some of the arguments addressed to us it was assumed that the only view which it was possible to take of this statute was that it was intended to benefit the state house considered as a dominant estate, and to annex to it an easement or quasi easement, whether for prospect or security it does not matter. Manifestly, this is not true. It may be argued that the statute was passed at least as much in the interest of the public at large as travelers on the highway, as it was in the interest of the commonwealth as an owner of property—that one object, at any rate, was to save the dignity and beauty of the city at its culminating point, for the pride of every Bostonian and for the pleasure of every member of the state. It is on this footing that it is argued for the commonwealth that the act is a valid exercise of the police power; that a building law would be valid within reasonable limits; . . . that a limitation to 70 feet is reasonable, and that such a law is no less valid when passed to satisfy the love of beauty than when passed to appease the fear of fire."

It may be noted that it was held in Atty. Gen. v. Williams (Knowlton v. Williams) (1899) 174 Mass. 476, 47 L.R.A. 314, 55 N. E. 77, that the statutory restriction of the height of buildings adjacent to a square, if intended to benefit the public by promoting the beauty and attractiveness of a public park and preventing unreasonable encroachments upon the light and air which it had previously received, justifies the expenditure of public money to pay compensation for property rights thereby injured by thus creating an easement of light, air, and view, annexing it to the park in the exercise of eminent domain.

So, it was held in Com. v. Boston Adv. Co. (1905) 188 Mass. 348, 69 L.R.A. 817, 108 Am. St. Rep. 494, 74 N. E. 601, that forbidding the use of land near a park or parkway for advertising purposes amounts to a taking of it for public use, for which compensation must be made.

But in Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Philadelphia (1913) 242 Pa. 47, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 88 Atl. 904, it was held that the power of eminent domain cannot be utilized to enable a municipal corporation to acquire property outside the limits of a parkway for resale, with restrictions for the protection of the parkway or preservation of the view, appearance, light, air, health, or usefulness thereof, as this is not a public use.

It was held in Farist Steel Co. v. Bridgeport (1891) 60 Conn. 278, 13 L.R.A. 590, 22 Atl. 561, that the purpose of preventing a new bridge from being marred by unsightly structures is not a public use.

As in line with the dissenting opinion in the reported case (STATE EX REL. TWIN CITY BLDG. & INVEST. CO. v. HOUGHTON, ante, 585), it may be permissible to quote from a case decided under the police power: "It cannot be pretended that the citizen has not the common-law right to acquire title to a lot of land, qualified or absolute, in a city as elsewhere, and to build upon and improve it as his taste, his convenience, or his interest may suggest, or as his means may justify, without taking into consideration whether his buildings and improvements will conform in 'size, general character and appearance' to the 'general character of the buildings previously erected in the same locality,' even though there might be those in whose 'judgment' his so building might in some way 'tend to depreciate the value of surrounding improved or unimproved property.'" Bostock v. Sams (1902) 95 Md. 400, 59 L.R.A. 282, 93 Am. St. Rep. 394, 52 Atl. 665.

CITY OF NEW YORK, Respt.

(227 N. Y. 25, 124 N. E. 141.)

Landlord and tenant — lowering water level — right to recover.

1. One in possession of land as tenant at will may recover the diminished annual value of the property during his possession, by the wrongful lowering of the level of the water table under the property.

— tenant at will — cropping by permission.

2. One working his wife's land by her permission and receiving the proceeds thereof is a tenant at will.

Trespass — diminution of usable value — right of tenant.

3. That a continuing trespass by which the water table under a parcel of land was lowered commenced before a tenant took possession of the property does not prevent his holding the trespasser liable for diminution in the usable value of the property.

Damages — lowering of water table under real estate — value of crops.

4. Upon the question of diminution of usable value for which a trespasser is answerable to a tenant for lowering the water table under real estate, evidence may be considered as to the value of the crops raised before and after the injury.

Injunction — excessive prayer for relief — effect.

5. A landowner is not deprived of his right to enjoin a trespasser from lowering the water table under the property, to its injury, by the fact that he joined in the action a prayer for injunction with respect to other lands which he occupied as tenant.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing in part a judgment of a Special Term for Queens County (Kapper, J.) in his favor, in an action brought to enjoin the operation by defendant of certain driven wells and pumping stations belonging to its water supply, and for the recovery of damages for injury to plaintiff's land. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Hogan, J.:

The facts found by the trial justice are, in substance:

The plaintiff and one Johanna Baumann are husband and wife. On or about April 14, 1908, the plaintiff, by devise under the will of his father, became the owner of a piece of land of about 10 acres, and his wife, Johanna Baumann, under a devise in the same will, became the owner of a piece of land of about 10 acres adjoining the land of plaintiff on the south, the two pieces of land being separated by a ditch running east and west. Plaintiff has, since April, 1908, occupied the 10-acre parcel belonging to his wife, by her permission, in connection with his own land, for the cultivation of market garden crops, the proceeds whereof have been received and retained by plaintiff with the consent of his wife.

Since 1906, the defendant has maintained two driven-well pumping stations about 1,200 feet distant from the premises of plaintiff, and has used and operated said stations for the purpose of supplying water to the inhabitants of the city for household or other purposes, for a consideration paid by consumers.

The soil of said property of plaintiff and his wife is naturally well supplied with ground water and moisture therefrom, and is very fertile, and is particularly well adapted to the growing of garden vegetables for market. Prior to the construction and operation of said driven-well stations, said property bore abundant crops, and the business of market gardening thereon was profitable.

The operation of the well has abstracted, and does abstract and withdraw, from said property and its soil a large part of the natural underground and percolating waters belonging to the same, and has lowered and lowers the normal water table thereon from 1 to 5 feet, and has rendered and renders said soil dry and unproductive, and has greatly injured the bearing qualities of 7 acres of said property, 4 acres of which are in the parcel owned by the plaintiff and 3 acres of which are in the parcel owned by plaintiff's wife, and has rendered the business of market gardening on said land much less profitable than before said driven wells were put in operation.

The diminution in the usable value of said lands, caused by the abstraction of the water therefrom and the consequent lowering of the natural underground water table and the interference with capillary moisture has been $200 per acre for each of said 7 acres of land, for each of the years 1909 to 1915, both inclusive.

During the year 1916 defendant ceased the operation of the pumping stations, by which a large part of the natural moisture was restored to said lands.

As conclusions of law, the trial justice found: (1) Since February, 1906, and September, 1907, the city has been and now is a continuing trespasser. (2) Since April 14, 1908, plaintiff has been a tenant at will of the property belonging to his wife. (3) Plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages to the usable value of any portion of the property belonging to his said wife, and said damages belong to her as the owner of the fee of said land. (4) Awarded judgment to plaintiff for the sum of $5,600 as plaintiff's past damages to the 4 acres for the years stated, and granted an injunction restraining the operation of the driven-well stations, unless within a reasonable time defendant take proceedings to acquire by the power of eminent domain such property rights of the plaintiff as it may lawfully acquire.

Upon appeal to the appellate division, the third conclusion of law was modified by the appellate division so as to provide that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this suit any damages to the land of his wife of which he was tenant at will, and, as thus modified, the judgment was affirmed by a divided court.

The city does not appeal from that part of the judgment allowing plaintiff to recover damages to the 4 acres. Plaintiff appeals from such part of the judgment only as determines that he is not entitled to recover damages to the lands of his wife.

Mr. Charles Coleman Miller, for appellant:

Plaintiff is entitled to the damages to the southerly half of the farm owned by his wife.

A lessee of premises located in the vicinity of the pumping stations forming part of the waterworks system of the city of New York, whose lease was executed after the operation of such pumping stations had been commenced, cannot maintain an action against the city to recover damages occurring during the term of the lease because of the withdrawal of surface and subsurface water from the leased premises, incident to the operation of the pumps.

The general rule that a lessor cannot maintain trespass while his tenant is in possession does not apply if the tenancy is one at will merely, if the injury is to the reversion, and not a mere disturbance of possession.

The land owned by plaintiff's wife was, by permission of the latter, worked by plaintiff in connection with the plot of land owned by him, and he received the entire proceeds of the two pieces of land. The relation between the wife and husband as to the plot of land owned by the wife was that of landlord and tenant, the plaintiff being a tenant at will. Harris v. Frink, 49 N. Y. 24, 10 Am. Rep. 318. As between a landlord and his tenant, the latter, in the absence of some contractual provision to the contrary, has an exclusive right to the control and possession of the leased premises, and may defend such particular estate until the same has been legally terminated. The tenancy of plaintiff never having been terminated, he was lawfully in possession of the 3-acre plot of land, and entitled to the annual product of the soil in the nature of emblements, and for

 inution of his enjoyment of the premises he would be entitled to redress. On the other hand, if the injury is one of a permanent character to the reversion, such as destruction of standing timber, etc., the right to recover for such wrong is vested in the landlord. Where both landlord and tenant sustain damages by the wrongful act of a third person, the law recognizes the right of each to maintain a separate action against the wrongdoer to redress his individual injury. Miller v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 184 N. Y. 17, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1060, 76 N. E. 734, 6 Ann. Cas. 146; Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. §§ 254, 255, 1517, 1519; Bly v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 172 N. Y. 1, 58 L.R.A. 500, 64 N. E. 745.

Counsel for defendant argued that the rule stated is inapplicable to the case at bar for the reason that the tenancy of plaintiff did not commence until April 14, 1908, and, the city having constructed and operated the pumping stations in 1906-1907, the trespass having been committed at that time, the tenant cannot sustain a cause of action therefor. In support of his argument reliance is placed upon the case of Sposato v. New York, 75 App. Div. 304, 78 N. Y. Supp. 168, affirmed by this court in 178 N. Y. 583, 70 N. E. 1109.

In the Sposato Case, the plaintiff was lessee of land for a term of five years, commencing in 1898. The pumping stations from which the alleged damages resulted were erected in 1885-1894. The order in the Sposato Case was made October 10, 1902. On October 7, 1902, we decided the Bly Case, sustaining the principle heretofore stated (172 N. Y. 1, 58 L.R.A. 500, 64 N. E. 745), and, subsequent to our decision in the Sposato Case, 178 N. Y. 583, 70 N. E. 1109, we reiterated the rule of law in the Miller Case, 184 N. Y. 17, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1060, 76 N. E. 734, 6 Ann. Cas. 146. A casual reading of the Sposato Case might lead to a conclusion that a conflict of decisions existed. Such, however, is not the case. In the Sposato Case the plaintiff alleged that the land in its natural condition, and before the time of the acts complained of (1885-1894), was well saturated with water; that by the act of the city two wells had been dried up, and the soil on the land had, by the abstraction of water, become so thoroughly dried up that it is comparatively worthless for the raising of crops, and by reason of such diversion of water the plaintiff, during the three years of his term of five years,—which term had not expired,—was deprived of his rightful use of the premises. The complaint did not allege the injury to or loss of any crops on the land during his possession of the same, and upon the opening of the case at trial term the complaint was dismissed on motion of counsel for the city, who argued in this court that upon the complaint the injuries sought to be recovered for were permanent to the fee, and thereby vested in the landlord.

The complaint in the case at bar, while not as specific in expression as might be desirable, nevertheless alleged injury to the possession of plaintiff, in that it asserts that the soil was, by reason of the abstraction of the water therefrom, made dry, rendering the same less productive and profitable for garden purposes than before the wells were put in operation, which caused a depreciation in the usable value of the premises, and in substance the trial justice so found, and, as a basis for damages, found the diminution in the usable value of the land caused by the abstraction of water therefrom.

My view is that the principle stated in the Bly and Miller Cases, cited, which are controlling in this case, is not in conflict with the Sposato Case.

In Reisert v. New York, 174 N.

Y. 196, 66 N. E. 731, the plaintiff, as owner and in possession of some 80 acres of land, sought to recover damages, as he alleged, by reason of the act of the city, through the construction of driven wells, in rendering the soil of his land dry and worthless for cultivation, and a stream on the land valueless for fish and game purposes. Upon the trial of that action, counsel for plaintiff contended that the plaintiff was entitled to recover his profits, as such, which he was able to prove during the six years prior to the commencement of the action, basing his argument upon the decision of this court in Forbell v. New York, 164 N. Y. 522, 51 L.R.A. 695, 79 Am. St. Rep. 666, 58 N. E. 644, which action was one by a lessee of land. An examination of that decision does not justify the argument made by counsel, as was determined by us when the case reached this court, though counsel made the same argument here. In the Reisert Case, counsel for the city argued that the plaintiff's recovery was limited to the loss in rental value which might be proved as resulting from the trespass, and the main question treated by us was the correct measure of damages. The judgment below was reversed for errors on the trial, and we held that evidence of the rental or usable value of the premises was competent; that if the land was commonly rented, the ordinary rentals received for the same would be admissible, as well as testimony tending to show the nature of the soil, the character and extent of the use made of the lands, the nature of the business conducted thereon when in their normal or usual condition as to surface or subterranean waters, and when deprived thereof, and was competent as proving or tending to prove usable value, and from such facts the court or a jury would be enabled to determine whether and to what extent the rental or usable value of the land as affected by the diversion of the water had been substantially injured.

We also held that in such a case profits, as such, were not recoverable; that a plaintiff suffering from a tort or trespass of another is bound, so far as he reasonably can, to reduce his damages, and that the plaintiff would not be justified in efforts year after year to raise crops upon this damaged land, or portion thereof, if experience had demonstrated that they would not mature and produce a marketable or profitable article.

In the present case the courts below held that the trespass was a continuing trespass; that by reason thereof the bearing qualities of the land had been affected, and the usable value of the 7 acres, 4 acres of which were owned by plaintiff and 3 acres of which he occupied as tenant, by reason of the trespass, had been diminished $200 per acre for each of the years 1909 to 1915, both inclusive, but the damages awarded were limited for diminution in usable value to the 4-acre plot.

To deny the plaintiff damages to the usable value of the 3-acre plot of land was error.

The defendant was a trespasser, and as such invaded the right of tenant.

possessory rights of the plaintiff and materially diminished the value of the use of the premises for the purposes for which the same were adapted and had been used. For damage sustained to such usable value the plaintiff was entitled to redress. Reisert v. New York, 174 N. Y. 196, 66 N. E. 731.

I do not deem it necessary to refer at length to the evidence adduced on the trial. My conclusion is that the evidence was ample to sustain the finding of the courts below that the diminution in the usable value of the premises was $200 per year.

The plaintiff produced evidence tending to show the nature of the soil of the land, the character and extent of the use made of the same, and the nature of the business conducted prior to, during, and subsequent to the commission of the trespass by the city, the extent of the crops raised, the prices received for the same in the market, and the expenses incident to the cultivation and marketing of the same. While evidence of the amounts realized from the crops before and after the trespass was admitted, the record does not justify a presumption that such amount was adopted as a basis of damages by the trial justice. The evidence was proper for consideration by him upon the question of usable value and as to whether or not the plaintiff had exercised proper judgment as a reasonable man in the management of the 7 acres, in view of the changed conditions produced by defendant's trespass.

Neither is it material that plaintiff sought injunctive relief as to the 7 acres. He was granted such relief so far as the 4-acre plot was concerned.

The judgment should be modified so as to provide that plaintiff recover of defendant the sum of $9,800, instead of $5,600, and, as thus modified, affirmed, with costs.

ANNOTATION.

Right of tenant to recover damages from third person for injury to premises.

- I. Introductory, 600.
- II. General rule, 600.
- III. Application of rule:
  - a. Generally, 602.
  - b. Particular injuries:
    1. Injury to crops or grass, 605.
    2. Injury to trees, 608.

I. Introductory.

This note treats only of the rights of a tenant, as such, to recover damages from a third person for injuries to the leased premises. It excludes a treatment of those cases wherein merely the form of action is considered, aside from the right of the tenant, as such, to sue. It also excludes the right of a tenant to compensation for injuries to his estate in condemnation proceedings. So, damages suffered by a tenant by reason of the impairment or destruction of easements appurtenant to the leased property are beyond the scope of this discussion, as is a tenant's remedy by injunction for the protection of his rights in the leased premises.

II. General rule.

It is a general rule of the common law that, for any injury to leased

In the case of a tenant, whether for life or for years, he may sue and recover for the injury to his possession and right of enjoyment. Zimmerman v. Shreeve (Md.) supra.

"The general rule of the common law is that, when real property is permanently injured, the tenant in possession, for life or a term of years, and the reversioner, each has a cause of action, to recover damages according to the extent of the injury to the estates of each." Anthony v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 60, 37 N. E. 780.

"One who is in exclusive possession of real estate as tenant under a lease is, during the continuance of his tenancy, to all intents and purposes the owner, and may maintain an action against a wrongdoer, which cannot be defeated by showing the title to be in someone other than the plaintiff. A tenant in possession is deemed the owner in law." State v. Burns (1890) 123 Ind. 427, 24 N. E. 154.

III. Application of rule.

a. Generally.

Where the plaintiff and the defendant were tenants of adjoining lots owned by a common landlord, and the defendant piled boards on his premises in such a way as to cause rain-water to be thrown through the window of the plaintiff's bedroom, wetting his floor and furnishings and rendering his house unhealthy for use as a dwelling, it was held that there was a physical invasion and interference with the plaintiff's possession, for which he could recover damages from the adjoining tenant. Darnell v. Columbus Show-Case Co. (1907) 129 Ga. 62, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 333, 121 Am. St. Rep. 206, 58 S. E. 631.

Similarly, it has been held that a tenant might recover for injuries done to the leased premises, during the course of excavations preliminary to building on adjacent property, where it appeared that the defendant in his operations dug up the walks and gravel on the demised premises, and deprived the plaintiff of the use and occupation of the yard. Daly v. Margolies (1918) 169 N. Y. Supp. 448.

So, a tenant for years may recover for injuries he has suffered because of the diversion of a stream from the demised premises by upper riparian owners, the diversion interfering with the possession and use of the leased property. Heilbron v. Kings River & F. Canal Co. (1888) 76 Cal. 11, 17 Pac. 938.

Where a railroad company put a pipe or culvert under its roadbed by which it diverted the water from its natural flow upon leased premises, the right of action for damages to the land, sustained on this account, was held to be in the tenant at will or by sufferance, in possession of the land, and not in the owner. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Moore (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 141, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 579, 101 S. W. 934.

Where a railroad company put a pipe or culvert under its roadbed, by which it diverted the water from its natural flow upon leased premises, the right of action for damages to the land, sustained on this account, was held to be in the tenant at will or by sufferance, in possession of the land, and not in the owner. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Moore (1907) 31 Ky. L. Rep. 141, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 579, 101 S. W. 934.

A tenant of mining lands may maintain an action against a water power company for damming up a stream and causing the tenant's mine to be flooded. Shomon v. Spring River Power Co. (1908) 78 Kan. 779, 99 Pac. 235.

In Green v. Shoemaker (1909) 111 Md. 69, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 667, 73 Atl. 688, a tenant of rooms in a dwelling house was allowed to recover for the damage to her property and the interference with her enjoyment of the premises, resulting from the defendant's blasting operations near by, causing concussions which jarred the premises and hurled rocks through the roof and windows of the house.

A lessee of mining property has been held to have a right of action against a subsequent lessee of the same property, who, with knowledge of the former existing lease, entered the premises, worked the mine, and removed some of the minerals therefrom. Breyfogle v. Wood (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 782.

In Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 524, 79 Am. Dec. 799, a lessee of a livery stable was allowed to recover damages resulting from the maintenance of leaky gas pipes in near-by streets, from which gas escaped through the ground into a well located on the leased premises, poisoning the water therein.

A complaint asking for damages done to realty by the overflowing of the lands should be sustained, although the complaint alleges that the complainant holds the lands only as a life tenant. Howe v. Ray (1872) 110 Mass. 298.

It was held in Burt v. Warne (1860) 31 Mo. 296, that a sublessee of the tenant of the owner of premises could recover for damages done by a third person to the premises after the owner had recognized the sublessee as his tenant.

In Beach v. Morgan (1894) 67 N. H. 529, 68 Am. St. Rep. 692, 41 Atl. 349, a lessee of riparian lands was held to have sufficient title to maintain an action of trespass against persons going on the leased premises and fishing without license.

A petition which alleges that the defendant, with force and arms, entered and took possession of lands held by the plaintiff under a lease, and allowed defendant's cows to pasture thereon, excluding the plaintiff therefrom, states a good cause of action. Creswell Ranch & Cattle Co. v. Scoggins (1896) 15 Tex. Civ. App. 373, 39 S. W. 612.

In Halsey v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1883) 45 N. J. L. 26, it was held that a tenant of a mill located on a stream could recover, in an action for damages, the diminution in the value of the use of the property during the existence of the lease, caused by the diversion of water into a canal by an upper riparian owner.

Where the agent of a turnpike company enters demised premises and begins the construction of a road thereon, without complying with the mode of procedure provided by the statute, he is a trespasser, and the tenant in possession may recover for injuries he sustains on account of the trespass. Brown v. Powell (1855) 25 Pa. 229.

In Ganter v. Atkinson (1874) 35 Wis. 48, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 13, it was held that lessees of a mine had sufficient interest in the land to maintain an action of trespass to recover damage sustained by reason of the defendant entering on the property and digging and removing ore therefrom.

It has been held that, where a tenant has set up a mill on the banks of a stream under a lease, with the right to use the water thereof in the operation of his mill, and the site has been rendered worthless, and its value, for which the land was leased, destroyed, by the draining of the sewage of a city into the branch, he has a sufficient title to maintain an action for damages for the injuries to his leasehold interest. McLaughlin v. Hope (1913) 107 Ark. 442, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 137, 155 S. W. 910.

In Burbridge v. New Albany & S. R. Co. (1857) 9 Ind. 546, the plaintiff, a tenant for years, claimed damages to his term, arising from the construction of a railroad through the demised premises. In showing his interest in the land, the plaintiff set forth a lease in which the lessor reserved the right to recover for all damages to the land as the result of the construction of the road, the premises being leased subject to the right of way of such railroads as might be constructed through them. While it was admitted by the court that a tenant may recover the damage to his term, yet, since the interest of the tenant depended on the construction of the lease, he had no right to recover for such damages by virtue of his term for years.

Under a statute (North Carolina Pub. Acts 1895, chap. 224, p. 297) which provides that, in actions for trespass on realty, "the jury shall assess the entire amount of damages which the party aggrieved is entitled to recover by reason of the trespass upon his property," it has been held that a tenant may maintain an action against a railroad company for injuries to the land demised, rendering it less productive during his term, by obstructing a natural watercourse running through the premises. Dale v. Southern R. Co. (1903) 132 N. C. 705, 44 S. E. 399.

It has been held that the owner of the reversion, occupying premises as a tenant at will of the life tenant, may maintain an action for damages against an adjoining landowner who throws up an embankment which obstructs the natural flow of water, and thereby injures the land so occupied. Ashley v. Ashley (1855) 4 Gray (Mass.) 197.

In Reynolds v. Egan (1909) 123 La. 294, 43 So. 940, it was held that a statute (Civ. Code, art. 2703) gives to the lessee a right of action against third persons for the wrongful disturbance of his possession of leased premises.

Under a lease by which the owner of a mill pond "leased, demised, and let" to the plaintiff, for the term of one year, "the sole and exclusive right to cut and carry away from the Falls pond, so called, . . . all such ice as can be so cut in form and shape to use either for private use or as merchandise," and which provided that the "lessor may cut all ice needed for his own use from and off said pond," the lessee has a sufficient interest in the premises to maintain an action, as stated in the complaint, for "breaking and entering the plaintiff's close . . . and cutting and carrying away . . . ice, the property of the plaintiff." Richards v. Gauffret (1888) 145 Mass. 486, 14 N. E. 535.

A tenant is as much entitled to recover the flowage damage done to his land during his tenancy as though he were a freeholder. Ellice Twp. v. Hiles (1894) 23 Can. S. C. 429.

A tenant may recover for injuries by a third person to a cesspool located on the leased premises. Stapp v. Madera Canal & Irrig. Co. (1917) 34 Cal. App. 41, 166 Pac. 823.

It has been held that although a lease is not recorded as required by statute, yet if a tenant is in possession, he has such an interest in the land, as against a stranger, as will entitle him to maintain an action of trespass for entering and fishing on the premises without permission from the lessee. Beach v. Morgan (1894) 67 N. H. 529, 68 Am. St. Rep. 692, 41 Atl. 349.

So, in Dumois v. New York (1902) 37 Misc. 614, 76 N. Y. Supp. 161, it was held that in an action by a lessee in possession to recover for injuries to the use of leased premises, it is no defense that the lease had not been recorded. Possession by the lessee is enough to put the defendant on notice, and the lessee's interest in the property may, for this purpose, be proved by parol.

1. Injury to crops or grass.

Where a tenant's crops or grass growing on the demised premises are injured or destroyed through the negligence or wrongful act of another, the tenant may recover damages he suffers on that account.

It was said in Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Patchette (1894) 59 Ill. App. 251: "Wherever the owner of land may bring his suit for damages to it and to the crops growing thereon, caused by the wrongful act of another, we take it to be well established that a tenant may sue for the damages caused to his tenancy by a similar wrongful act."

"For an injury to crops grown or growing on demised premises, the right of action is in the tenant alone." Frink v. Pratt (1889) 130 Ill. 327, 22 N. E. 819.

It was stated in Reynolds v. Williams (1846) 1 Tex. 311, that "the tenant being in the possession, the right of action is in him for any trespass committed on the premises."

It was said in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith (1898) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 433, 23 S. W. 89, that the lessor has no property in the grass pending the lease, but grass and crops growing on leased premises are the property of the lessee, and he alone can sue for their destruction.

Thus, where a railroad company so constructed an embankment as to cause an increased overflow of water on plaintiff lessee's land, destroying his crops growing thereon, the right of action against the railroad company for such injury was held to be exclusively in the tenant. Ringer v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1911) 161 Ill. App. 43. The court, in sustaining the right of the tenant to recover, said: "We are of opinion that by the weight of authority there is no right of action in the landlord to recover against appellant, but that such right is in the tenant exclusively. It is only where some injury results from the tort to the reversion that the landlord may recover damages. It must be an injury to the reversion of such permanent character that it would lessen the value of the property on the expiration of the tenancy. Dicey, Parties, * 340. The landlord has no title to the crops. He is not a tenant in common. The ownership is in the tenant, subject to the lien of the landlord given by statute. This lien invests him with no title, either general or special, and for any injury to the crops grown or growing the right of action is in the tenant alone."

In Grand Rapids Booming Co. v. Jarvis (1874) 30 Mich. 308, a lessee for a term of years brought an action against a booming company for damages caused by obstructing a river by the congestion of logs, and flooding the leased premises, and destroying the crops. In holding that the plaintiff might recover, the court said: "Though in speaking of the rights of riparian owners, we have said nothing of terms for years or other terms in the land, it is hardly necessary to say that, so far as regards any injury to the use of the land during the term, no distinction exists between them and the ownership of the fee. A term for years is as clearly property as ownership in fee, and just as much entitled to the protection of the law."

A tenant may recover damage done to his crops, even against a grantee of the landlord. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. v. Linard (1883) 94 Ind. 319, 48 Am. Rep. 155.

It has been held that a tenant from year to year could recover damages suffered from "killing the crop and destroying the productive nature and capacity of the soil for the growing of the crops," resulting from the overflow caused by the negligent construction of an embankment by a railroad company. Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Patchette (Ill.) supra.

In St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Graham (1892) 55 Ark. 294, 18 S. W. 56, it was held that a life tenant could recover for destruction of his crops, and injuries proved to be done to his life interest in the land, by an overflow of the land, resulting from the negligent construction of an embankment on defendant's roadbed.

Where crops are destroyed by an overflow caused by the unskillful construction of a railroad across a creek, the tenant on the land may recover against the railroad company, especially where it appears that the landlord has assigned to the tenant all his interest in the claim for damages. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jones (1885) 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 33.

When several annual overflows of premises occupied by a tenant each resulted in injury to his crops, it was held that the tenant might sue for the injury occasioned by each overflow, though resulting from the same obstruction or diversion of waters; and that a former recovery was no bar to an action for damages arising subsequently to the former suit. McKee v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. (1892) 49 Mo. App. 174.

It has been held that a tenant at will can maintain an action of trespass against one who, before the determination of the tenancy, unlawfully enters and cuts grass growing on the premises. Evans v. Watkins (1912) 76 N. H. 433, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404, 83 Atl. 915.

A complaint which alleges that the defendant entered the premises rented to the plaintiff, and gathered and hauled away certain quantities of the crop, has been held to be good on demurrer. Childers v. Verner (1878) 12 S. C. 1.

In Salimonie Min. & Gas Co. v. Wagner (1891) 2 Ind. App. 81, 28 N. E. 158, the plaintiff lessee was held to have sufficient title to maintain an action of trespass to recover damages for the wrongful entry and taking of potatoes growing on the demised premises, by one who had purchased the land from the lessee.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hall (1903) 71 Ark. 302, 74 S. W. 293, wherein it appeared that growing grass was burned by the negligence of the defendant railroad company, a tenant at will of the premises was allowed to recover for the injury.

A railroad company has been held answerable in damages to a tenant where its contractors negligently tore down fences and cattle guards on the leased premises, allowing cattle to enter and destroy the tenant's growing crops. Clark v. St. Louis, S. F. & N. O. R. Co. (1906) 79 Ark. 629, 94 S. W. 930.

An action for damages for the destruction of crops by a stranger on demised premises may be maintained by the lessee alone, without the joinder of the lessor, since the lessee is the "real party in interest," under § 177, North Carolina Code, although § 1754 provides that the crops shall be deemed vested in the landlord, the latter section being merely for the landlord's security. Bridgers v. Dill (1887) 97 N. C. 222, 1 S. E. 767. To the same effect, see Dale v. Southern R. Co. (1903) 132 N. C. 705, 44 S. E. 399.

In Crowell v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. (1884) 61 Miss. 631, it was held that a tenant could recover damages of a railroad company for entering on the leased premises for the purpose of constructing its railroad, tearing down a fence, and destroying crops.

So, in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Bayliss (1884) 62 Tex. 570, it appeared that the plaintiff had leased certain premises for which he was to pay to the owner, in lieu of rent, one third of the corn raised on the land. The defendant railroad company negligently failed to provide cattle guards along the tracks, whereby cattle were allowed to come on the leased premises and destroy the crops growing thereon. The lessee was held entitled to recover for the value of the crops so destroyed.

A tenant has also been allowed to recover damage for the destruction of his growing crops by hogs, turned in on the premises by one who purchased the premises from the landlord during the pendency of the lease. Lathrop v. Rogers (1849) 1 Ind. 554.

Where a railroad company constructed a railroad over land occupied by the plaintiff, as tenant, and, by reason of the failure of the railroad company to provide sufficient gutters and drains for the natural drainage of the land adjacent to the railroad, the premises were flooded, and the crops of the tenant destroyed, the tenant was held to be entitled to recover from the railroad company. Baltimore & S. P. R. Co. v. Hackett (1898) 87 Md. 224, 39 Atl. 510.

In an action for damages sustained by breaking and entering a close and harvesting and taking away the crops growing thereon, plaintiff working the crops with the landlord "on halves," the following instructions were held to be correct: That if the jury found that the close was let to the plaintiff, and that he was the owner of one half of the crops when the defendant entered and took them away, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the value of one half so taken, no damage being claimed for injury to the close. Darling v. Kelly (1873) 113 Mass. 29.

It has been held that an assignee of a lease, in possession of the leased premises, may maintain an action for damages done by negligently burning the grass and growing crops. Townley v. Oregon R. Co. (1898) 33 Or. 323, 54 Pac. 150.

Even where the lessor, after the demise, sells leased premises to a railroad company, if the purchaser enters the premises and destroys the crops of the tenant the tenant may recover from the railroad company for the damage. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. v. Linard (1883) 94 Ind. 319, 48 Am. Rep. 155.

It has been held that a lessee of pasture lands can recover damage from one who unlawfully herded his sheep on the demised premises, destroying the grass and rendering the land of no value to the plaintiff during the term of his lease for grazing purposes. The only damage sought to be recovered was that suffered by the plaintiff as tenant for the term of the lease, in relation to his right to the use and benefit of the pasturage. Painter v. Stahley Bros. (1907) 15 Wyo. 510, 90 Pac. 375.

A tenant on shares has sufficient interest in growing crops to maintain an action for damages to the crops resulting from a wrongful levy thereon, although the landlord has a lien for a share of the crops and for supplies he has furnished the tenant. Parker v. Hale (1903) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 555.

2. Injury to trees.

The right of a tenant to recover damages for the cutting of trees growing on the leased premises has been recognized in several cases. Zimmerman Mfg. Co. v. Daffin (1906) 149 Ala. 380, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 663, 123 Am. St. Rep. 58, 42 So. 858; Hayward v. Sedgley (1837) 14 Me. 439, 31 Am. Dec. 64; Zimmerman v. Shreeve (1882) 59 Md. 357; Albin v. Lord (1859) 39 N. H. 196; Wood v. Griffin (1865) 46 N. H. 231; Lewis v. Thompson (1896) 3 App. Div. 329, 38 N. Y. Supp. 316; Perry v. Jefferies (1901) 61 S. C. 292, 39 S. E. 515.

In Hayward v. Sedgley (1837) 14 Me. 439, 31 Am. Dec. 64, it was decided that a tenant at will, in possession, might maintain an action of trespass against a stranger for wrongfully cutting and carrying off trees growing on the leased premises. The court said: "The objection in this case is that the injury is to the freehold, and that the owner only can maintain the action for such an injury. But the cases cited and relied upon tend only to show that the owner may have his action for his injury, although there be a tenant in possession; not that the tenant may not also have his action for his injury. The case in Y. B. 19 Hen. VI. 45, decides that a tenant at will may have an action for injury to the soil, and the landlord also for his injury. The same rule applies to the cutting of trees.

If trees are cut upon the land of a tenant at will, he may have an action of trespass. Rolle, Abr. Trespass, note 4; Comyns's Dig. Trespass, B. 2. The principle is quite explicitly stated in note 2, 1 Co. Litt. 57a: 'If a stranger cuts trees, the tenant at will shall have an action; as shall also the lessor, regard being had to their several losses.'

In Perry v. Jefferies (S. C.) supra, it was held that a tenant in possession of lands, under a deed which gave her at least a life estate, could maintain an action for damages caused by cutting down and carrying away growing timber from the premises.

It has been held that the purchaser of timber, growing on lands in possession of a tenant, is liable to the tenant for entering and cutting down the trees, but, if no actual injury was done to the soil or the tenant's possession, only nominal damages can be recovered. Zimmerman Mfg. Co. v. Daffin (Ala.) supra.

A tenant, though the lease is by parol and the nature of the tenancy and its terms are unknown, can recover damages for picking and carrying away cranberries from the premises, and also nominal damages for cutting and carrying away timber growing thereon. Albin v. Lord (1859) 39 N. H. 196.

In Wood v. Griffin (1865) 46 N. H. 231, it was held that a tenant might recover for damages by cutting trees on the premises, although, if the damage was to the inheritance only and none shown to be to the possession, the damages should be nominal.

In Guild v. Prentis (1909) 83 Vt. 212, 74 Atl. 1115, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 313, an action was brought under a statute (P. S. 5842) to recover for the cutting of trees on land held by the plaintiff under a lease. The objection was made that plaintiffs, being lessees, could not recover in this action. The court held that a lessee was the "owner" of the land, for the purpose of this act, and was, therefore, entitled to recover thereunder.

But in Lewis v. Thompson (1896) 3 App. Div. 329, 38 N. Y. Supp. 316, an action brought by a lessee under a statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1667) which provides that if anyone cuts down wood, trees, etc., on the land of another, without the owner's leave, he shall pay to the owner treble the amount of damages done, it was held that this provision applied only to the owner of the freehold, and that the lessee could not bring an action under this section, but would be entitled to his actual damages in a common-law count. See to the same effect, Achey v. Hull ((1859) 7 Mich. 423.

3. Injury to structure.

Recovery by a tenant is generally allowed for direct injuries to buildings or other structures on the leased premises.

A tenant may also recover for injuries resulting from the unlawful removal of the lateral or subjacent support. Bass v. West (1900) 110 Ga. 698, 36 S. E. 244; Payne v. Moore (1903) 31 Ind. App. 360, 66 N. E. 483, 8 A.L.R.—39.

Co.* (1906) 41 Wash. 486, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1086, 111 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 84 Pac. 18; McCann v. Chisholm (1883) 2 Ont. Rep. 506.

In California Dry-Dock Co. v. Armstrong (1883) 8 Sawy. 523, 17 Fed. 216, it appeared that a marine railway on leased premises was destroyed through the negligence of the defendant. The tenant was limited in his recovery to nominal damages, on failing to show any actual injury to the leasehold.

It has been held that a petition alleging possession by the plaintiff as tenant, and an illegal interference by the defendant in going on the land, tearing down a bridge and fence thereon, and using part of the premises as a log yard, is good as against a general demurrer, and states facts entitling the plaintiff to general damages. Daniel v. Perkins Logging Co. (1911) 9 Ga. App. 842, 72 S. E. 438.

The case of Little v. Palister (1824) 3 Me. 6, lays down the rule that the right of action against one who enters upon land in the possession of a tenant, and treads down the grass and throws down a fence built by the tenant for his own convenience, is in the tenant alone.

It has been held that a tenant has sufficient interest in the leased premises to maintain an action for damages by trespass, consisting of throwing down of fences inclosing lands held for agricultural purposes. Foster v. Elliott (1871) 33 Iowa, 216.

The lessee of a building used as a hothouse has an interest in the building which will entitle him to maintain an action against one whose negligence has resulted in damage to the buildings. Moeckel v. C. A. Cross & Co. (1906) 190 Mass. 280, 76 N. E. 447, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 294.

In Anthony v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 60, 37 N. E. 780, the plaintiff, who was lessee of certain premises, on which were ice-houses which were burned by fire communicated from defendant's locomotive, was allowed to recover the amount of the damage done, in an action of tort, under an act (Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 214) which provides that "every railroad corporation . . . shall be responsible in damages to a person . . . whose buildings or other property may be injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engines."

It has also been held that a tenant may recover for the negligent destruction of bridges built by himself on the leased premises, although he intended to leave the bridges as a part of the freehold at the expiration of the lease. Sacchi v. Bayside Lumber Co. (1910) 13 Cal. App. 72, 108 Pac. 885.

An assignee of a lease for a term of years has been held to be entitled to recover damages for injuries to the premises resulting from the negligence of a steamboat company in the operation of one of its boats, causing fire and sparks to fall on the leased property and setting fire to a building thereon. Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. (1845) 1 Denio (N. Y.) 91.

In Gourdiere v. Cormack (1853) 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 200, an action was brought by a tenant of a house and lot for an injury to his possession by the blasting of rocks on the adjoining lot, by which pieces of rock were thrown upon the plaintiff's premises, the blasts extending underneath and forcing out the rock some 3 or 4 feet on the lot of the plaintiff, below the foundation of the house. The house was greatly injured and rendered insecure, and it was held that the plaintiff might recover such damages as he had suffered. In discussing the right of a tenant to recover, and its extent, the court said: "A tenant may have an action for an injury to his possession. The same wrongful act which injures the freehold, and for which the reversioner may, under our statute, have an action, is often,—nay, in general,—an injury to the possession also, and for the latter the tenant has an action. . . . So far as by such acts the plaintiff was deprived of the use of his house, he was entitled to the value of such use during the interruption; and so far as he was put to expense in removing stones thrown upon the house or lot, or in repairing damages thus occasioned, he was entitled to indemnity."

In Hardrop v. Gallagher (1854) 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 523, wherein the facts were similar, a declaration alleging possession of the injured premises in the plaintiff was held to be sufficient, since an action would lie for the recovery of damages, whether the plaintiff was the owner or merely a tenant.

In Ulrich v. McCabe (1856) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 251, it was held that one who built a house on leased premises might recover damages for injuries to the house by blasting done under the direction of the defendant.

In McPhillips v. Fitzgerald (1904) 177 N. Y. 543, 69 N. E. 1126, an action for damages for injuries done to plaintiff's building, it appeared that the plaintiff had leased certain property for a term of years and had erected a building thereon with the right to remove the building at the expiration of the lease. On account of the negligence of the defendant, who was an adjoining owner, a building on defendant's lot was allowed to collapse and greatly injure plaintiff's building. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages he had sustained.

A tenant in occupation of a dwelling can recover damages for breaking in the windows and defacing the walls of the house, although the nature and duration of the tenancy does not appear. Weston v. Gravlin (1877) 49 Vt. 507.

In Froelich v. Morse (1896) 15 Wash. 636, 47 Pac. 22, the plaintiff, a lessee, was held to be entitled to recover damages sustained by reason of the tearing down of a building by the defendants, of which the plaintiff was the lessee.

It was held in Fisher v. Grace (1868) 27 U. C. Q. B. 158, that a tenant from year to year could recover for damage to the premises, occasioned by removing fences therefrom.

A lessee of a building can recover from a contractor damages resulting from the negligent excavation on adjoining property, causing the wall of the leased building to fall in. Contos v. Jamison (1908) 81 S. C. 488, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 498, 62 S. E. 867.

In Bass v. West (1900) 110 Ga. 698, 36 S. E. 244, the facts and the ruling of the court were stated as follows: "According to the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff was in possession of the premises in question as a tenant for a term of years, of the owner. He alleges that the defendant dug down and undermined the wall of the building and deprived it of its lateral support, and that it collapsed and fell. And, further, that the defendant, some time thereafter, totally destroyed and removed the building and evicted petitioner therefrom. As against a general demurrer, the petition sets forth a cause of action. Any wrongful interference with the possession of a tenant of real estate gives to him a right of action against the wrongdoer. 1 Sedgw. Damages, § 69; 3 Sutherland, Damages, § 1012."

A tenant of land for a term of years, who erected thereon a building which was caused to fall in on account of the negligent excavation of an adjoining landowner, can maintain an action for damages sustained on this account, though at the time of the injury the building was occupied by a sublessee. Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 334.

A tenant can recover damages for injuries to leased property, resulting from tunneling underground near the premises, which caused the earth to give way and the building located on the demised land to collapse. Farnandis v. Great Northern R. Co. (1906) 41 Wash. 486, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1086, 111 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 84 Pac. 18.

4. Nuisance.

If a leasehold is injured by the maintenance of a nuisance, the tenant may generally recover from its author the damages resulting therefrom. Crommelin v. Coxe (1857) 30 Ala. 318, 68 Am. Dec. 120; Bentley v. Atlanta (1893) 92 Ga. 623, 18 S. E. 1013; Pause v. Atlanta (1895) 98 Ga. 92, 58 Am. St. Rep. 290, 26 S. E. 489; Cornes v. Harris (1848) 1 N. Y. 223; Beir v. Cooke (1885) 37 Hun (N. Y.) 38;

Dumois v. New York (1902) 37 Misc. 614, 76 N. Y. Supp. 161; Garland v. Aurin (Carland v. Aurin) (1899) 103 Tenn. 555, 48 L.R.A. 862, 76 Am. St. Rep. 699, 53 S. W. 940; Lockett v. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. (1890) 78 Tex. 211, 14 S. W. 564.

"A lessee may maintain an action for a nuisance to the real estate which he occupies, which is injurious to his possessory interest; while the landlord must bring the action for any injury to the reversion. If the nuisance of which the plaintiff complains made the enjoyment of the estate less beneficial, or in any way rendered it expensive or inconvenient, without fault on his part, he is entitled to compensation therefor." Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 524, 79 Am. Dec. 799.

A tenant, although he has no estate in the land, is the owner of its use for the term of his rent contract; and it is held that he can recover damages for any injury to such use occasioned by the erection and maintenance of a public nuisance in the street adjacent to, or in the immediate neighborhood of, the premises. Bentley v. Atlanta (1893) 92 Ga. 623, 18 S. E. 1013.

It has been held that a lessee has such an interest in leased property as will support an action against a city for damages to his estate resulting from the construction and maintenance of a public nuisance in the street by the municipal authorities. Pause v. Atlanta (1895) 98 Ga. 92, 58 Am. St. Rep. 290, 26 S. E. 489.

In Beir v. Cooke (1885) 37 Hun (N. Y.) 38, the plaintiff, the lessee of a dwelling house, was held to have been properly awarded damages for injuries resulting to her occupancy of the building from the operation of a planing mill on adjoining property, which threw dust and cinders on and into the plaintiff's dwelling, and often enveloped it in smoke.

It has been held that a tenant in possession may recover for injuries which he sustains on account of the percolation of water into a cellar on his premises from a cellar on the adjoining lot, causing damage to his stock of goods and rendering the occupation of the leased premises unhealthy and unwholesome. Crommelin v. Coxe (1857) 30 Ala. 318, 68 Am. Dec. 120.

Where the defendant so constructed a railroad embankment as to cause water to collect and become stagnant near a dwelling occupied by a tenant, rendering the dwelling unhealthy and unwholesome, it was held that the tenant could recover damages for injuries resulting therefrom. Lockett v. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. (1890) 78 Tex. 211, 14 S. W. 564.

In Cornes v. Harris (1848) 1 N. Y. 223, an action for damages sustained in consequence of the maintenance of a nuisance, the declaration alleged that plaintiff was possessed of a dwelling house which he inhabited with his family. After alleging the nature of the nuisance, the declaration concluded: "To the nuisance of the said dwelling house and premises of said plaintiff, and to his damage," etc. It was held that the plaintiff might maintain the action, although there was no allegation that he was the owner of the freehold.

In Dumois v. New York (1902) 37 Misc. 614, 76 N. Y. Supp. 161, a lessee of a part of a pier, the other part of which was used by the city as a dumping board, was held to be entitled to damages for injuries resulting from the nuisance.

Where water was obstructed in its natural flow, causing it to back up on demised premises, there forming a stagnant pond, impairing the use of the premises, the lessee was held to be entitled to recover for the injury so occasioned. Garland v. Aurin (Carland v. Aurin) (1889) 103 Tenn. 555, 48 L.R.A. 862, 76 Am. St. Rep. 699, 53 S. W. 940.

IV. Effect of agreement between landlord and third person.

The consent of the landlord to the doing of an act which results in injury to the leased premises will not relieve the wrongdoer from liability to the tenant for the injuries which he suffers on that account.

Vermont.—Guild v. Prentiss (1909) 83 Vt. 212, 74 Atl. 1115, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 313.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff held land as tenant at will, and the owner of the fee sold the grass growing on the premises to the defendant, such a sale and permission to enter and cut the grass is no defense to an action for damages by the tenant for injury for entering and cutting grass, when the acts complained of were done before the tenancy was at an end. Since the owner himself had no right so to enter the premises while the tenancy existed, he could not pass the right to another. Evans v. Watkins (N. H.) supra.

In Central R. Co. v. Valentine (N. J.) supra, it appeared that while a tenant was in possession of leased premises, the landlord made certain agreements with the defendant railroad company for the use of a part of the premises as an embankment, and subsequently, during the tenancy, executed a release for damages previously sustained by injury to the property. And it was held that such an agreement and release between the landlord and the defendant could not affect the right of the tenant to recover for injuries he had sustained previous to such agreement and release.

Where it appeared that one of the walls of a building leased by the plaintiff had been condemned by city authorities and ordered to be torn down and rebuilt, and the defendant undertook the construction under a contract with the lessor, he was held liable to the lessee for injuries resulting from negligence in the operations. Campbell v. Porter (N. Y.) supra.

In an action by the lessee against a third party for an injury to the premises during the term, resulting from the maintenance of a nuisance by the defendant, it is no defense, as against the lessee, that in the lease there was an agreement whereby the lessee surrendered all rights to recover for "damages accruing heretofore," nor can the defendant plead as a bar to recovery an agreement and settlement with the lessor for damages on account of the nuisance. Dumois v. New York (N. Y.) supra.

In an action by a lessee to recover damages for the wrongful cutting of trees on the demised premises, it is no defense that the defendant, a former owner of the fee, having conveyed it to another, reserved the right to cut the timber therefrom. The owner of the fee had no right as against the lessee to cut the trees during the life of the lease, and he could not, therefore, concede the right to the defendant so as to release him from liability to the lessee. Guild v. Prentis (Vt.) supra.

And it was held in Brown v. Powell (Pa.) supra, that a license from the owner of the fee to go upon the demised premises is no defense in an action by the lessee against a third person to recover damages for the trespass and injury to the land.

Nor can the contributory negligence of the landlord be imputed to the lessee so as to defeat his recovery against a third person causing the injury. Thus, in an action by a tenant for damages caused by the falling in of the walls of a leased building on account of negligent excavation on adjoining property, it is no defense that the landlord had notice of the operations and made no objection to the manner of the work, and did nothing to protect the wall, which negligence and consent on his part were alleged to have contributed, as a proximate cause, to the

In Flowers Lumber Co. v. Bush (1916) 18 Ga. App. 269, 89 S. E. 344, it appeared that plaintiff was in possession of timberlands on which he had leased turpentine privileges, and the lessor conveyed the land to one by security deed, which, in this state, passes legal title. The grantee under this deed then leased the timber-cutting privileges on the land to the defendant. In an action to recover for the cutting of the timber by the defendant under his lease, it has held that the plaintiff lessee had no legal interest whatever in the land, nor in the timber thereon, and could not maintain an action for such damage, which was to the realty.

Where an adjoining landowner makes excavations which cause a wall to fall on the leased premises, injuring the property of the tenant, it is no defense to the tenant's action to recover damages so sustained that the excavations were made with the knowledge and consent of his landlord. Payne v. Moore (1903) 31 Ind. App. 360, 66 N. E. 483, 67 N. E. 1005.

In an action by a tenant against a railroad company for going on the leased premises and destroying growing crops thereon, it is no defense that such entry and acts committed on the premises were done by the consent of the landlord. In allowing the tenant to recover in this case, the court said: "The appellant, having leased the land for the year of 1882, was the owner of the term therein, and it was thereafter not within the power of the landlord to confer upon the company the right to construct its road on the land during the term. The landlord could confer no right which he himself could not exercise over the premises. He himself would have been a trespasser if he had done the acts complained of, and the company, acting under his authority only, is not protected by it from a recovery by the tenant for the injury inflicted." Crowell v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. (1884) 61 Miss. 631.

In Fischer-Leaf Co. v. Caldwell

(1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 542, where a wall was torn down between defendant's property and a house occupied by the plaintiff as tenant, an agreement between the plaintiff's landlord and the defendant, whereby the landlord indemnified defendant against all damage that the plaintiff might sustain, was held not to prevent the tenant from recovering of the defendant the damages so sustained.

It was held in Baughner v. Wilkins (1860) 16 Md. 35, 77 Am. Dec. 279, that where an injury results to a tenant from the pulling down of a party wall, the action for such injury must be brought against the person who did the act causing the injury, and not against the landlord who consented to the pulling down of the wall; and that such consent would not relieve the wrongdoer of his liability to the tenant for damages so sustained.

In an action by a tenant to recover damages for breaking and entering a close, and for gathering and taking away the crops growing thereon, it is no defense that the owner of the land consented to the trespass. Since the plaintiff was entitled to the exclusive possession of the land, even against the landlord, the landlord could not consent to the defendant's entry so as to relieve him from liability to the tenant for the tort. Darling v. Kelly (1873) 113 Mass. 29.

On the question whether damages accruing during a tenancy, from a nuisance existing before the commencement of the term, or at the time of the renewal of the lease, are recoverable by the tenant, the authorities are not abundant, and there is some conflict in the decided cases. The rule in New York, which was announced in Kernochan v. New York Elev. R. Co. (1891) 128 N. Y. 559, 29 N. E. 65, involving the right, as between the landlord and tenant, to sue for damages caused by an elevated railroad, was at first deemed to have settled the question in favor of the right of the landlord to recover for such injuries. At least, relying on the authority of the Kernochan Case, it was held in Yoos

v. Rochester (1895) 92 Hun. 481, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1072, that a tenant who leased premises, knowing of the existence of a nuisance affecting the value of his use of the property during the term, cannot recover damages for injuries he sustains on that account if the nuisance is not perceptibly increased during the term. In that case the nuisance consisted of the pollution of a stream by the defendant, which gave rise to noxious odors, interfering with the enjoyment of the leased property by the plaintiff.

But in Bly v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. (1902) 172 N. Y. 1, 58 L.R.A. 500, 64 N. E. 745, the elevated railroad cases were disposed of by the statement that they were sui generis and the rule was laid down that a tenant who "comes to a nuisance" may recover damages to the property accruing during his term. And it was held immaterial to the tenant's right of recovery whether the nuisance originated before or after the beginning of the term. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff leased certain property to be used as a boarding house, with the knowledge that the manner in which the defendant was operating his power house caused the emission of smoke and cinders which soiled furniture and clothing, and created noise and vibration which interfered with the sleep and comfort of the plaintiff and her boarders, the same being a private nuisance and doing great damage to the business and comfort of the plaintiff. The court said: "In the case at bar we are not advised as to the effect of the nuisance upon the owner's reversion, but there is evidence from which the trial court has found that the plaintiff's right of occupancy has been impaired, and that her own personal effects have been injured to her substantial damage. This was not an injury for which the owner of the reversion could sue. If there was any right of action it belonged to the plaintiff. The injury to her right of occupancy was as separate and distinct from any injury to the reversion as the injury to her furniture and household belongings. During the term of the lease the premises belonged to the plaintiff, and the owner had no rights therein except such as were expressly reserved in the lease, or such as reverted to him after its expiration. . . . If the act complained of is a nuisance, it is a wrong the existence of which cannot be justified at any time as against anyone injuriously affected thereby. If this is the rule, is it any less applicable in favor of tenants whose term begins during the continuance of the nuisance, than in favor of subsequent owners? . . . Logically, there can be no more reason for denying such a right of action to a tenant who 'comes to the nuisance' than there can be for withholding it from the tenant whose occupancy precedes the nuisance. There can be no presumption that a wrong which may in fact be merely temporary will be permanent. Of course it may be permanent so long as no fault is found, but in a case like the one at bar, where the nuisance grows out of the method of operation rather than the character of the business or the structure in which it is carried on, the presumption, if any, is and should be that it is merely casual and temporary, and not permanent. If it is casual and temporary, then there is no reason why the landlord or owner should have a right of action for the injury, which is in fact suffered by his tenant, and by him alone. . . . In this state we have held that the owner of premises affected by a nuisance may recover his damages occasioned thereby, although he does not himself occupy the premises. Hine v. New York Elev. R. Co. (1891) 128 N. Y. 571, 29 N. E. 69; Francis v. Schoellkopf (1873) 53 N. Y. 155. But in the latter case the plaintiff's recovery was expressly limited to the rent for the time that the house was vacant, and to the diminution of the rent when she succeeded in obtaining a tenant, thus recognizing, by implication, the existence of a separate right to damages in the tenant. . . . Several propositions seem to be quite satisfactorily established, therefore, both upon principle and by authority: (1) That an owner of property affected by a nuisance may maintain an action to recover his damages, or to abate the nuisance, or both, no matter whether he takes his title before or after the introduction of the nuisance; (2) that a landlord and his tenant have separate estates, for injuries to which each may have his appropriate remedy. If, then, an owner who 'comes to a nuisance' can maintain an action to redress his wrongs, why should a tenant who 'comes to a nuisance' be denied any remedy? The last owner or occupant, when he acquires his property or possession, acquires with it all the rights which by law belong to it, and exemption from wrongful injury by a contiguous proprietor is one of them."

In Hoffman v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. (1903) 87 App. Div. 371, 84 N. Y. Supp. 437, a recovery by a lessee for damages resulting from the operation of the same plant was sustained, it appearing that the tenant leased the property subsequently to the creation of the nuisance.

The decision in the Bly Case was also followed in Pritchard v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. (1904) 92 App. Div. 178, 87 N. Y. Supp. 225, affirmed in (1904) 179 N. Y. 364, 72 N. E. 243.

The decision in Miller v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. (1906) 184 N. Y. 17, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1060, 76 N. E. 734, 6 Ann. Cas. 146, that the landlord cannot recover damages to rental value in such case, notwithstanding that he was obliged to rent the premises for a lower rental than he would have received but for the nuisance, is the counterpart of the decision in the Bly Case that a tenant may, under such circumstances, recover for damages to the use and occupation.

In Dumois v. New York (1902) 37 Misc. 614, 76 N. Y. Supp. 161, wherein it appeared that the defendant maintained a dumping board on a pier which was a nuisance, likely to injure the use of the leased premises during the term, and the lessee had notice of the existence of the nuisance at the time of making the lease, he was nevertheless held entitled to recover for damage to his use of the premises resulting from the continuance of the nuisance during the term.

But the appellate division of the su-stable for damages resulting from the maintenance of leaky gas pipes in near-by streets, from which gas escaped into a well on the leased premises, it was held to be no defense to the action that at the time of the lease the pipes leaked, although in a less degree than subsequently, during the term of the lease. Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 524, 79 Am. Dec. 799.

So, it has been held that a lessee of land may maintain an action against a railroad company which so constructed its embankment as to obstruct the natural flow of the water, and failed to provide sufficient artificial drains, thereby causing the crops of the lessee to be flooded and destroyed, although such embankment, with insufficient drains, existed at the time the lease was made. Baltimore & S. P. R. Co. v. Hackett (1898) 87 Md. 224, 39 Atl. 510.

Where a railroad company maintained a nuisance on property which it had leased, and a tenant of adjoining property, with full knowledge of the existence of the nuisance, rented the premises for another year, it was held that the tenant was entitled to recover for injuries resulting from the nuisance during his second contract term. And it was held to be no defense to an action against the railroad company that the tenant might have avoided the injury by moving away. He had a right to presume that the railroad company would abate the nuisance. Central R. Co. v. English (1884) 73 Ga. 366.

It is no defense to an action by a tenant for injury to his occupancy, resulting from the maintenance of a nuisance on adjoining lands, that the nuisance existed at the incipiency of the lease. Crommelin v. Coxe (1857) 30 Ala. 318, 68 Am. Dec. 120.

In Davis v. Jewett (1842) 13 N. H. 88, it was held that where, during a portion of the time for which damage from throwing backwater upon land was claimed, the plaintiff was in possession of the land, and that for the remaining period he had leased to a tenant, he cannot recover for damage during the time of the lease unless he specifically alleges an injury to the reversion.

In Morrison v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1902) 117 Iowa, 587, 91 N. W. 793, it was said: "That the lessee may maintain a suit for the injury to the use of the leasehold occasioned by the continuance of a previously existing nuisance appears to be well established."

Baker v. Sanderson (1826) 3 Pick. (Mass.) 348, was an action for damages caused by the erection of a dam below the plaintiff's mill, causing the water to flow back on the wheels of the mill. It appeared that during part of the time for which the damages were claimed the mill was in possession of the plaintiff, and during another part in possession of certain tenants under the plaintiff. The defendant's counsel contended that for the damages arising during the portion of the time the mill was in possession of tenants he was responsible to the tenants in possession, and not to the plaintiff, who had only a reversionary interest. The court said that the objection would have been insuperable had it not been alleged that the plaintiff, in consequence of the obstructions complained of, had reduced his rents at the request of the tenants, they having threatened to quit unless he would agree to a fair reduction.

In Sumner v. Tileston (1828) 7 Pick. (Mass.) 198, the court said, arguendo, that a tenant of a mill who had taken the same at a reduced rent because of the heightening of defendant's dam below the mill, in consequence of which the wheels of the mill were retarded, could not recover against the defendant, because he was not damaged.

In Jones v. McCleary Mfg. Co. (1900) Rap. Jud. Quebec 18 C. S. 130, it is held that a tenant is not entitled to recover for injuries resulting from the operation of a plant on a neighboring lot, where it appeared that the plant was in operation in the same manner at the time of the execution of the lease.

It was held in Funston v. Hoffman (1908) 232 Ill. 360, 83 N. E. 917, that, where a tenant leases the premises after the wrongful act of the third person which caused the damage, he has no right against the third person for any damage caused thereby subsequently to the leasing, and that for such damages the action must be brought by the owner as an injury to his fee. In that case a tenant brought an action for damage occasioned by the flooding of his crops, due to the wrongful removal of the outlet of a drain. The tenant was not allowed to recover for injuries to his crops on this account, since it appeared that the outlet had been removed, to his knowledge, before the beginning of his present term, although it was said that he might recover for such injuries arising during a former term, during the pendency of which the outlet had been removed.

In McConnel v. Kibbe (1864) 33 Ill. 175, 85 Am. Dec. 265, wherein it appeared that a partition wall supporting the upper story of leased premises was removed before the tenant leased the premises, resulting in damages subsequent to the demise, the damage was held to be to the owner of the fee, and not to the tenant in possession. The reasoning of the court was, in substance, that when a wrongful act is done which results in an injury to leased premises, there can be no recovery by the tenant if the wrongful act was done before the lease began, although the injuries occur subsequently to the lease. But when the wrongful act occurs during the period of the lease, the tenant may recover for such portion of the damages as he sustains.

In Kankakee & S. R. Co. v. Horan (1890) 131 Ill. 288, 23 N. E. 621, a case wherein the owner of premises in the possession of a tenant at will recovered for damage to land resulting from the negligent construction of a railroad, it was said: "The roadbed, embankments, . . . and other appurtenances of a railroad, constructed and maintained in pursuance of lawful authority, are to be regarded in law as permanent structures. . . . And in case other property is damaged by its construction . . . such damage is in its nature equally permanent. . . .

Where deterioration of the value of land is occasioned by a nuisance created by the construction of a railroad, such nuisance is a permanent one, so that all damages for past and future injury to the property may be recovered in one suit, and such recovery is a bar to all future actions therefor. . . . An injury to land which is permanent in its nature is necessarily an injury to the entire estate, and that includes the estate in expectancy as well as the estate in possession."

See also Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Loeb (1884) 118 Ill. 203, 59 Am. Rep. 341, 8 N. E. 460, holding that the improper construction of a railroad imposes a permanent injury on the land, for which there can be but one recovery and that by the owner of the fee.

The rule in Illinois seems to be well settled by the foregoing cases, that when a tenant leases property or renews his lease, with the knowledge that there is an existing nuisance liable to cause injury to the premises, he cannot recover for injuries so sustained. But there is a statute in that state, applicable to railroads, which provides as follows: "In no case shall any railroad company construct or maintain a railroad without first constructing the necessary culverts or sluices as the natural lay of the land requires for the necessary drainage thereof." Section 19, Railroad Act (Jones & A. ¶ 8754). Under that act it is held that a tenant who leases land after the construction of a railroad which is provided with insufficient drains may yet recover from the railroad company for injury to his crops from an overflow resulting from such embankment. And it is held that the ordinary rule that a tenant cannot recover for damage already done to the premises by the erection of a nuisance does not apply to railroads under this act. Renner v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1915) 197 Ill. App. 11.

So, it was held in St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Brown (1890) 34 Ill. App. 552, that a tenant who leases and occupies property, subject to the danger of overflow on account of a negligently constructed trestle across a stream on adjoining property, may recover from a railroad company which maintains such defective structure, in case an overflow does occur on that account, resulting in damage to his growing crops, and the tenant's right of action is not defeated because he knew of the existence of the structure when he rented and entered into the possession of the demised premises. He is not bound to assume that the defendant would continue to keep the structure in its defective condition, but, rather, that it would perform the duty it owed to him and to the public not to allow an injury to them by the negligent use of its property.

VI. Injury to reversion.

While recognizing the right of a tenant to recover damages for injury which he sustains on account of the interruption of his term and the lessening of the value of the use, and courts are not in harmony in respect to the tenant's right to recover for injuries to the reversion, as such, aside from the injury to the leasehold estate. It is apparent that the same act may be an injury to both estates. Though, under the ancient common law, the owner of the fee could not maintain an action for an injury to the land while it was in the possession of a tenant, this right is now generally recognized, and it is usually conceded that when the same act results in an injury to both estates a right of action accrues to both the landlord and the tenant for the damages each has respectively suffered. At the same time, it is generally recognized that the tenant is liable to the landlord for injuries to the fee, and this liability is often imposed by contract. In some jurisdictions it is held that whenever the tenant is liable to the landlord for injuries to the freehold, either by contract or under the common law, he has a right of action against a third person causing such an injury. Stapp v. Madera Canal Irrig. Co. (1917) 34 Cal. App. 41, 166 Pac. 823; Anthony v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 60, 37 N. E. 780; Moeckel v. C. A. Cross & Co. (1906) 190 Mass. 280, 76 N. Dougherty* (1900) 30 Misc. 455, 62 N. Y. Supp. 510; Dix v. Jaquay (1904) 94 App. Div. 554, 88 N. Y. Supp. 228; West v. Treude (1630) Cro. Car. 187, 79 Eng. Reprint, 764; Attersoll v. Stevens (1808) 1 Taunt. 194, 127 Eng. Reprint, 807, 9 Revised Rep. 731, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 67.

In Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. (1845) 1 Denio (N. Y.) 91; it appeared that plaintiffs were the assignees of a lease for a term of years, which provided that any buildings the lessees should erect, should, at the expiration of the demise, revert to the lessors, without damage to the same, ordinary wear excepted, but no such covenant was made by the assignees when the lease was assigned to them. A building erected by the lessees was burned by reason of the negligence of the defendants in allowing sparks and fire to be blown onto the building from their steamboat. In an action to recover the damages to the leased premises, the court held that the assignee of the lease might recover for the full value of the building destroyed, on the ground of the common-law liability of the tenant to the landlord for waste committed on the premises, saying: "There was no express covenant by the lessees to keep the premises in repair, nor to rebuild in any event whatever. The covenant was that all buildings which might be erected on the premises should revert to the lessors when they might come into possession. The unexpired term and all the interest of the lessees had been assigned to the plaintiffs, and they had taken possession; but no express covenant or agreement on their part, to pay rent or do anything else, was shown. The first term of years had not expired; and it did not appear that the lessees or the plaintiffs had indicated an intention to hold the premises for the second term, as was authorized by the lease. Upon this state of facts it was argued that the plaintiffs were bound to rebuild the mill for the benefit of the lessors, and therefore were entitled to recover its full value from the defendants; and if such was the liability of the plaintiffs, the consequence stated would seem to follow. This liability of the plaintiffs was placed on two distinct grounds: (1) It was said the lessees were bound by their covenant to rebuild, that the covenant ran with the land and bound their assignees, and therefore the plaintiffs were liable. (2) That the destruction of the mill by tortious negligence was waste, for which the plaintiffs, being tenants for a term of years, were answerable to the reversioner, wholly irrespective of any express agreement, and therefore they were entitled to a corresponding redress from the defendants. I pass by the first ground stated, for the last seems decisive of the question. The plaintiffs claim that the mill was destroyed by the wrongful act of the defendants; and, if so, it was waste for which the plaintiffs, being tenants for years, were responsible. 'It is common learning,' said Heath, J., in Attersoll v. Stevens (1808) 1 Taunt. 198, 127 Eng. Reprint, 808, 10 Moir. Min. Rep. 67, 'that every lessee of land, whether for life or years, is liable in an action of waste to his lessor, for all waste done on land in lease, by whomsoever it may be committed.' Chambre, J., in the same case (p. 196) said: 'The situation of the tenant is extremely analogous to that of a common carrier; to prevent collusion (and not on the presumption of actual collusion), both are charged with the protection of the property intrusted to them, against all but the acts of God and the King's enemies; and as the tenant in the one case is charged with the actual commission of the waste done by others, so in the other case the carrier is charged with actual default and negligence, though he loses the goods by a force that was irresistible, or by fraud against which no ordinary degree of care and caution could have protected him.' Lord Coke is not less explicit, for he says: 'Tenant by the curtesy, tenant in dower, tenant for life, years, etc., shall answer for the waste done by a stranger, and shall take their remedy over.' . . . The plaintiffs, thus being bound to answer to their landlord for the full value of the building which was destroyed, were entitled to recover a like amount from the defendants."

In Gourdier v. Cormack (1853) 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 200, an action by a tenant to recover for damages to his possession by a third person, evidence was offered which tended to show "the amount of the damage done to the house itself," and it was held to have been properly admitted. However, the court seemed to qualify the opinion on this point, making the competency of the evidence depend on whether the tenant was in fact liable to the landlord for the injury, or bound to repair it, saying: "If it were proved to be one of the conditions of the plaintiff's estate in the premises that he should make all repairs rendered necessary by causes such as the defendants' acts in the matter in question, the evidence would, I think, be clearly admissible. If it were only proved that the plaintiff was bound to make the ordinary repairs rendered necessary, by use, the evidence would as clearly be irrelevant and incompetent."

The right in the tenant to recover for injuries to the reversion was also suggested as a basis of the rule in the case of Ulrich v. McCabe (1856) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 251, wherein it appeared that a house built on leased premises by the lessee was injured, and the lessee brought an action to recover damages suffered by the plaintiff in making repairs. It was held that he was entitled to recover such damages, the court declaring the right to arise from the fact that he was presumably bound to make repairs, thus: "The appellant is mistaken in supposing that the tenant was not bound to repair, if the house was part of the fee. There is no proof on that subject, and for that reason the presumption is that he was bound to uphold the premises in question from decay, and to render them, when his term expired, in such condition as reasonable use would permit. . . . At all events, the landlord was not bound to repair during the term, without an agreement on his part so to do, and the tenant must either make the repairs, or lose the beneficial enjoyment of the premises. The latter circumstance entitles him to recover the expense of such repairs, whether the house was his or not, and whether or not the house could be removed by him at the expiration of the term."

In Attersoll v. Stevens (1808) 1 Taunt. 182, 127 Eng. Reprint, 802, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 67, it appeared that the plaintiff was lessee of certain lands at an annual rental, for a term of years, under an agreement that he might dig half an acre of brick earth annually, and that if he dug more he would pay an increased rental. A stranger dug brick earth on the premises, and it was held that the lessee was entitled to recover the full value of the earth so taken. The basis of the defendant's liability to the plaintiff was held to be the liability of the plaintiff to the lessor; and the liability of the lessee to answer to the lessor was said not to be different from that which arises from the relation of landlord and tenant where waste is committed by a stranger, the tenant being answerable to the landlord, and having his action over against the stranger. The court said: "Lord Coke, 2 Inst. 303, says the lessee shall answer for the waste done by any stranger; for he in the reversion cannot have any remedy but against the tenant, and the tenant shall have his remedy against the wrongdoer, and recover all in damages against him, and by this means the loss at last shall light upon the wrongdoer. If the lessee gave permission to a stranger to dig, no doubt it would be the act of the lessee, and he would be bound to pay the lessor the stipulated price. Then what is the difference between his agreeing to it, and his standing by while the stranger takes it? . . . If the lessee may take it, as against the lessor, and recovers damages as against a stranger, although the stranger took it in the first instance against the will of the lessee, he cannot say he does not so far confirm the act of the stranger that he ought to pay the lessor for it. He has in fact the brick earth, since he is paid for it in damages in an action; and he could not avoid paying on his covenant for any brick earth beyond the half acre of which he has the advantage."

It was held in West v. Treude (1630) Cro. Car. 187, 79 Eng. Reprint, 764, that a tenant may, at his election, maintain an action of trespass or case to recover damages for injuries to leased premises by a sublessee in possession. Full indemnity was allowed on the ground that the plaintiff was subject to an action of waste by his lessor.

In Coale v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1875) 60 Mo. 227, it was held that a tenant at will or by sufferance, not being liable to his landlord for waste committed on the premises by a stranger, could not recover from a railroad company for the burning of fences on leased premises by sparks from its locomotives. It is suggested in the opinion that if it were shown that the tenants were liable to their landlord for waste by a stranger, they would then be entitled to their action over against the stranger.

But in McKee v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. (1892) 49 Mo. App. 174, it was held that a plaintiff who was a tenant for a year only, unless he had paid cash rent and was unable to cultivate the ground by reason of overflows of the premises, cannot recover for the depreciation in the rental value of the land occasioned by such flooding, although he can recover for damages to his crops which were growing on the premises.

In Stapp v. Madera Canal & Irrig. Co. (1917) 34 Cal. App. 41, 166 Pac. 823, a tenant was allowed to recover damages for injury to a cesspool located on the demised premises, the tenant having contracted to keep the premises in repair in lieu of rent, and the cesspool being susceptible of repair.

Under a contract of lease whereby the lessee agreed to return the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as they were at the time of the lease, fire and other unavoidable casualties excepted, the lessee may maintain an action for permanent injuries to the premises caused by an explosion on defendant's property, resulting from the negligent maintenance of a nuisance thereon, and it is not necessary as a condition precedent to his recovery that he has in fact made reparation, nor even that he was under obligation, under the terms of the lease, to make repairs for damage caused by the explosion. Moeckel v. C. A. Cross & Co. (1906) 190 Mass. 280, 76 N. E. 447, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 294.

In an action by a lessee against a railroad company to recover for the destruction of buildings on the premises by fire from defendant's locomotive, it appeared that the lease contained the following stipulations: "And in addition to the rents to be paid as aforesaid the said party of the second part agrees to keep all the said buildings, appurtenances, and improvements in good repair, and also to maintain an amount of insurance upon all of said buildings sufficient to repair or replace them in case of destruction or damage by fire. Said repair and insurance to be at the cost of said party of the second part, and it is expressly understood and agreed by said party of the second part that, if any building shall be destroyed or damaged by fire, it shall be rebuilt or repaired by said party at once, unless this requirement shall be waived by the party of the first part, in which case all moneys received by and in the hands of the party of the second part for insurance on the damaged or destroyed property shall be promptly paid to said party of the first part, their heirs or assigns. If said party of the second part shall desire to alter or remove any building, appurtenances, or improvements on said premises, or to place any new building, appurtenances, or improvements upon the same, it shall be lawful and proper to do so, provided that all such operations shall in no wise impair the value of said premises, its buildings, appurtenances, and improvements as they now exist." The defendant's counsel asked one of the plaintiff's witnesses if the lessee had replaced the buildings in compliance with the lease, if there was any waiver on the part of the lessors of the lessee's obligation to rebuild, and if the lessors had taken any insurance on the buildings. These questions were held to have been properly excluded as immaterial, on the grounds that the liability of the defendant to the plaintiff was to be determined on the facts as they existed at the time of the fire, and that what was done afterwards between the lessors and lessees did not concern the defendant, and that the insurance was wholly res inter alios. The lessee was allowed to recover the amount evidenced by his liability to the lessor, it being the actual damage to the property, and the question whether the liability had in fact been satisfied was said to be wholly immaterial to the defendant's liability to the lessee. Anthony v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 60, 37 N. E. 780.

However, in Foley v. Wyeth (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 131, 79 Am. Dec. 771, the declaration alleged that the plaintiff was seised and possessed of a parcel of land, and the defendant dug a pit on his own land, whereby a considerable portion of plaintiff's land caved in and was removed. It appeared from the facts reported that plaintiff held the land under a contract to purchase the premises for a valuable consideration, to be paid in the future. The court decided that plaintiff was a tenant at will, and held that a tenant at will could not recover for injuries to the reversion, although he subsequently purchased the land in pursuance of his contract.

The view was taken in Dix v. Jaquay (1904) 94 App. Div. 554, 88 N. Y. Supp. 228, that a life tenant might recover damages to the inheritance as well as to the life estate, in an action for waste by cutting down trees on the premises. The court said: "There are strong reasons for giving this right of action to the life tenant. With this absolute liability to make good to the remainderman waste committed, even by a stranger, the remainderman may trust to his liability and reserve his action until at any time within the Statute of Limitations. The remainder may be to an infant, and even to one not in being at the time of the commission of the waste. The remainder may be a contingent one, so that it may not be known who will have the ultimate estate. By § 1665 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 'a person seised of an estate in remainder or reversion may maintain an action founded upon an injury done to the inheritance, notwithstanding any intervening estate for life or for years.' A contingent remainderman can hardly be said to be seised of an estate in remainder. In such case, to whom would the wrongdoer respond? He is either liable to the life tenant for the waste committed, or he is liable to no one, and the life tenant, with a certain ultimate liability to the remainderman, whosoever he shall prove to be, is absolutely without recourse or indemnity for the liability imposed upon him by the wrongful act of the defendant. If the life tenant must wait for an action by the remainderman to determine his liability, his recourse against the wrongdoer must, in many cases, become ineffective by the delay. Nor can he perfect his right of action by satisfying the damages to the inheritance, and then suing. The damages are unliquidated. Any amount which he pays in satisfaction must be paid at his peril, with his chance of establishing such amount as the damage done in an action against the wrongdoer. If the remainder is contingent, to whom shall he make satisfaction of the liability? In such case I am unable to conceive of any satisfaction of that liability which would be binding, if perchance another became entitled to the remainder upon the happening or not of the contingency named. It will thus be seen that, if the judgment below be well rendered, a life tenant at the best is subjected to a dangerous hazard in being compelled to make satisfaction of an unliquidated claim to a remainderman, upon his chance of being able to establish that claim in full as damage in his action against the wrongdoer. At the worst the wrongdoer has burdened the life tenant with an absolute liability to one who, upon the happening of a contingency, shall thereafter become the remainderman, without liability to the life tenant, and only with a remote liability to the person who shall, upon the contingency, thereafter become seised with the remainder. If these premises be sound, the conclusion is irresistible that the wrongdoer must answer to the life tenant for the full damage done, both to his life estate and to the inheritance, and the damage to the inheritance recovered by the life tenant is held by him as trustee for the remainderman. Other grounds might be urged upon which could be rested the liability of the wrongdoer to the life tenant for the injury to the inheritance. If, perchance, a building be burned by the negligence or wrong of a stranger, the life tenant is entitled to the moneys with which to rebuild that building, that he may have the life use thereof. Even if a recovery for such an injury should be had by the remainderman, it is not clear that the court would not require the remainderman to rebuild the building with the proceeds of such recovery that the life use given by the deed be not restricted. Again, one who has wrongfully imposed a liability upon a life tenant to make good to a remainderman should rightfully be required to provide him with the means whereby that liability could be satisfied. A life tenant thus injured should not first be required to satisfy the liability and take his chance of reimbursement from the wrongdoer. It cannot matter to the wrongdoer to whom he pays, if only he be not required to pay twice, and it will appear by the rulings in analogous cases . . . that a recovery of the wrongdoer by the life tenant is a bar to a recovery by the remainderman."

The right of a tenant to recover for an injury to the freehold was clearly recognized and affirmed in Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 334. It appeared in that case that a tenant for years erected a building on leased premises, and the building was then sublet. An adjoining owner in making excavations on his lot caused the walls to fall in. The original lessees were held entitled to recover for injuries thus caused to the building, and the grounds of the decision were thus stated by the court: "But if it were necessary to enable the plaintiffs to maintain the action that they should have held an interest in the premises at the time of the injury, such interest appeared. They were lessees of the land on which the warehouse was erected for an unexpired term of years. The injury occurred in 1852, and their lease did not expire until 1858. The destruction of the warehouse by tortious negligence was waste, for which the plaintiffs, being tenants for a term of years, were answerable to the reversioner, wholly irrespective of any express agreement to repair or rebuild. Being bound to answer to the heirs of Bloodgood for the injury to the building, they were entitled to a corresponding redress from the defendants.

A sublessee, who has covenanted, under a lease, to keep the premises in good repair, is entitled to recover for expenses incurred in replacing a plate glass window in the demised building, broken through the negligence of the defendant. Le Salg v. Dougherty (1900) 30 Misc. 455, 62 N. Y. Supp. 510.

Other courts, assuming the liability of the tenant to the landlord for injuries to the reversion by third persons, hold that reparation or satisfaction to the landlord is a condition precedent to the tenant's right to sue, and that until such reparation is made there has been no injury to the tenant. California Dry Dock Co. v. Armstrong (1883) 8 Sawy. 523, 17 Fed. 216; Wood v. Griffin (1865) 46 N. H. 231; Weston v. Gravlin (1877) 49 Vt. 507. And see Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heikens (1904) 112 Tenn. 378, 65 L.R.A. 298, 79 S. W. 1038.

In California Dry Dock Co. v. Armstrong (Fed.) supra, the plaintiff was the tenant of premises under a covenant to repair. A marine railroad, located on the premises, was damaged by the defendant's ship. The plaintiff brought his action in two counts, the first alleging injury to the inheritance, and setting forth the lease and covenant to repair, and his liability to the owner, the second count alleging injury to the possession. There was a demurrer to the first count, and the demurrer was sustained on the ground that it failed to allege payment or repairs by the tenant. The court said: "Whether the liability in this case, to repair, rests upon the express covenant set out, upon implied covenants, or upon principles of public policy which hold the tenant responsible for a violation of duty to his landlord in failing to protect the freehold while in his possession as tenant, in my judgment, both upon reason and authority, no recovery can be had until the tenant has made repairs or made satisfaction to the landlord. It is argued that if this rule be adopted, then the tenant may never be able to recover, as he may not be able to agree with his landlord as to the amount to be paid, and he may not be able, for want of means, either to repair or make satisfaction. If this be so, his damages will never accrue, and he certainly ought not to recover. That is the very question presented. Clearly, the general rule in all matters is that damages cannot be recovered until they have actually accrued, and I can find no possible good ground for applying a different rule to cases of this kind."

In Wood v. Griffin (1865) 46 N. H. 231, an action by tenants to recover for injuries by the wrongful cutting of timber on the premises, the question arose whether the plaintiff could recover damages for the injury to his possession, and also for injury to the inheritance. It was held that, notwithstanding the liability of the tenant to the remainderman or reversioner, he could not recover for injuries to the inheritance without there having been satisfaction made to the remainderman or reversioner. The court said: "The question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to include in their damages the full value of the wood and timber, upon the ground that they are liable over to the remaindermen or reversioner; or whether they are limited to damages for the injury to their possessory interest. There can be no controversy that the cutting of the wood and timber by a tenant for life or a stranger, for the purposes indicated in the case, is waste, . . . and it seems equally clear that the tenants are liable to the person having the immediate remainder or reversion for such waste, whether committed by themselves or a stranger, or by a part of such tenants only. . . . It seems also to be settled that, although the remainderman or reversioner cannot maintain an action of waste against a stranger, yet he may maintain an action on the case in the nature of waste for an injury to his reversionary interest, while at the same time the tenant may sue for the injury to his possession. . . . It may also be considered as established that, while the tenant is answerable to the remainderman or reversioner for waste done by a stranger, such stranger is liable over to the tenant. . . . The precise question, then, is whether, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit by the tenant against a stranger, he can recover damages for the injury to his possession, and also for the injury to the inheritance, without there having been any recovery against him by the remainderman or reversioner, or any satisfaction made by him in any form. In 1 Chitty Pl. 63, it is laid down that 'the tenant may support trespass against a stranger for an injury to his possession; and the immediate reversioner may at the same time support an action on the case, if the injury were sufficient to prejudice his right and interest; and a recovery by one will be no bar to an action by the other.' In Attersoll v. Stevens (1808) 1 Taunt. 190, 127 Eng. Reprint, 805, 9 Revised Rep. 731, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 67, Chambers, J., holds that when different persons are entitled to compensation for an injury to each by the same act, a compensation to one is no bar to the action of the other; and this he applies to the case of injuries to the tenant and to the reversioner. In Bedingfield v. Onslow (1684) 3 Lev. 209, 83 Eng. Reprint, 654, which was a case for the injury to plaintiff's land by penning back the water of a rivulet, the defendant pleaded that one Stedman was in possession of the land of the plaintiff under a lease from his father, and that he, the defendant, paid Stedman 20 shillings, which he accepted in satisfaction of the trespass; to which the plaintiff demurred, and the plea was held bad, upon the ground that, in respect to the prejudice done the reversion, the plaintiff may maintain an action, and Stedman another in respect of the possession; and so another, in respect of the shade, shelter, and fruit of the trees, for the same trespass; and the satisfaction given to one is no bar to the other. . . . In Davis v. Jewett (1842) 13 N. H. 91, it is laid down that, for an injury to land in possession of a tenant, both the tenant and the reversioner have separate actions for their several damages; and to the same effect is 1 Co. Litt. 57a. . . . This, indeed, is apparent from a consideration of the nature of the interests held by each; the tenant having the right to the possession of the land and to the enjoyment of the shade and fruit of the trees, and the reversioner the right to the trees themselves, subject to this use by the tenant. . . . If he [the tenant] has already been compelled to pay the reversioner for the injury done to him, it would seem that this should be stated, and that the tenant's claim in respect to that part of the injury should be limited to the amount so paid, for to that extent only is he injured. The suit by the tenant may or may not be designed to recover for the injury to the inheritance as well as to the possession, and it is therefore obviously important that it appear from the declaration whether it does or does not; and this accords too with the general rules of pleading. It is clear from the adjudged cases that the claims of the tenant and reversioner can be separated, that they are in fact distinct, and that each may maintain a suit for the injury done to him, and that both may be pending at the same time. How, then, can the tenant include in his damages the injury to the reversion? If he can in any case, how is the defendant to avail himself of the fact that another action is pending by him in remainder or reversion? Again, there is no necessity for arming the tenant with such power. If he is entitled to recover for the injury to the inheritance, whether he has satisfied the reversioner or not, his recovery must be a bar to a suit by the landlord, and still the trespasser might avail himself, by way of defense, of a license or admission by the tenant which might, in effect, defeat the landlord's claim against such trespasser, and, besides, the landlord might find his claim against the trespasser defeated by the result of a suit prosecuted without his assent, in a manner opposed to his wishes, or by his inability to obtain from the tenant himself the fruits of the suit against such third person. The fact that the tenant is answerable for the injury does not, we think, furnish an adequate reason for sanctioning such doctrines. Where waste is committed by cutting down timber trees by a stranger, the property in them at once passes to the landlord; and he may take them or maintain trover for them; and there surely can be no propriety in holding that the tenant also could have the same remedy, for he has no property whatever in them. If the tenant has been compelled to satisfy the landlord for the injury by a third person, he may have his remedy over, but, until then, we think he must be confined to damages for the injury to the possession. . . . But, beyond this, the authorities, so far as we have any, are opposed to the claim of the tenant to recover damages for an injury to the inheritance until he has first satisfied the landlord."

The rule laid down in the case last cited was approved in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heikens (1904) 112 Tenn. 378, 65 L.R.A. 298, 79 S. W. 1038, wherein the minority opinion delivered by Chambre, J., in Attersoll v. Stevens (1808) 1 Taunt. 194, 127 Eng. Reprint, 807, 9 Revised Rep. 731, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 67, was also approved.

It was suggested in George v. Fisk (1855) 32 N. H. 32, that no damages could be recovered by a tenant for injuries to the reversion, as such, but that the recovery was limited to the actual injuries he had sustained to his estate, in the way of diminution of profits accruing from the land and the interruption of the leasehold. It was held proper in that case for the court to instruct the jury to find such damages as the plaintiff had suffered, according to the title he had proved, and commensurate with the injury which he had sustained in his estate; although, for the permanent injury to the soil, the owner of the fee alone was entitled to recover.

In Weston v. Gravlín (1877) 49 Vt. 507, it appeared that the plaintiff was in the possession and occupancy of a house as a dwelling. He was not the owner, but the nature of his tenancy did not appear. The defendant unlawfully broke windows and blinds of the house and defaced the walls. An instruction that the plaintiff might recover for the actual damage to the house was held to be erroneous, the court saying: "The tenant can only recover for such damages as affect his possession and enjoyment of the premises. He cannot ordinarily recover for injuries to the inheritance. For such injuries, the reversioner has an action." But it was held that the error was harmless, since this injury did in fact affect the tenant's enjoyment, and the extent of recovery in this instance would be the actual damage to the house, for the injuries were such that the tenant would ordinarily be required to repair, in order to make the house habitable.

In still other jurisdictions, the right of the tenant to sue for injuries to the reversion is denied altogether, remitting the landlord and tenant each to his own action for injuries to his separate estate in the land. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. King (1896) 63 Ark. 251, 38 S. W. 13; Beasley v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (1916) 17 Ga. App. 615, 87 S. E. 907; Zimmerman v. Shreeve (1882) 59 Md. 357; Townley v. Oregon R. Co. (1898) 33 Or. 323, 54 Pac. 150; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Torrey (1891) 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 445, 16 S. W. 547; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 23 S. W. 89; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cusenberry (1894) 86 Tex. 525, 26 S. W. 43; Vance v. San Antonio Gas Co. (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 317; Baldwin v. Rich-

The extent of the right to recover is generally the injury to the estate of the plaintiff. Thus, in Zimmerman v. Shreeve (1882) 59 Md. 357, which was an action by a life tenant for damages caused by the cutting and carrying away of wood, the recovery was so limited, the court saying: "In the present case, the lot trespassed upon was an outlying, uninclosed mountain lot, used exclusively for its wood and timber, and which constituted its main value. Such timber lots are generally used in connection with separate farm land, and as means of supplying the necessary wood and timber to the farm. In such case, the injury to the possessory right, by cutting and carrying away the wood and timber, consists in the damage done to the right to use such wood and timber by the life tenant, according to the customary mode of user; such user to be reasonable, and confined to such wood and timber as could be taken for ordinary estovers; and any trespass that disturbs and impairs such beneficial user by the tenant for life is an injury for which he may recover."

It was held to be error for the court so to instruct the jury as to allow it to award damages for injuries to the estate in remainder.

It was suggested by the court in Townley v. Oregon R. Co. (1898) 33 Or. 323, 54 Pac. 150, that a lessee might not recover for injuries to the land itself, although it appears from the decision that this statement applied to the recovery for injuries to the reversion, as such, the lessee in that case being allowed damages for injuries, although to the land, which resulted in a decrease in the value of the leasehold.

It seems to be the rule in Texas that the tenant is not under obligation to make repairs of injuries caused by acts of strangers, and hence cannot recover for injury to the premises, which does not affect his leasehold. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 23 S. W. 89.

In a hypothetical case assumed by the court in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Torrey (1891) 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 445, 16 S. W. 547, the rule was announced that a tenant at sufferance might recover damages for injuries sustained from the burning of grass on the premises, such injury being the value of the grass during his term, but that he could not recover for injury to the turf.

It was held in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cusenberry (1894) 86 Tex. 525, 26 S. W. 43, that a tenant at will cannot recover for injuries to the land by a trespasser, but that the landlord alone can recover damages for such injuries.

And in Vance v. San Antonio Gas Co. (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 317, it was stated that, although the tenant is bound to repair, the landlord may, nevertheless, have his action for an injury affecting his reversionary interest, thus denying by implication the right of the tenant to sue for such injuries.

It has been held that, in an action by a lessee of pasture lands for the recovery of damages arising from the destruction of pasturage on the leased premises, the extent of his right to recover was for the destruction of the grass to which he would be entitled during the term of his lease. Baldwin v. Richardson (1905) 39 Tex. Civ. App. 406, 87 S. W. 746.

In an action by a tenant for damages to the premises occasioned by removing fences therefrom, it has been held that his recovery should be limited to the diminished value of his interest in the property. Fisher v. Grace (1868) 27 U. C. Q. B. 158.

But in Beasley v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (1916) 17 Ga. App. 615, 87 S. E. 907, wherein it appeared that a railway company negligently set a fire on leased premises, causing the woodland to be burned over, destroying all the trash and litter, and exposing the land to the hot sun and damaging the timber on the land, it was held that the injury was to the freehold of the owner and not to the leasehold of the tenant, and that for such injury the tenant could not recover. The court, in disallowing recovery by the tenant, apparently based its decision on the fact that, the injury being to the realty, the tenant, in order to recover, must have shown specifically how, why, and in what amount his lease was of less value after the injury, although it appeared that the tenant did allege in his petition that he had suffered loss by reason of his right, under the contract of lease, to cut and sell the timber, and his added expense in cutting and clearing the wooded land after it had been burned. The court referred to an official headnote for its reason, which is there stated as follows: "The same tortious act might injure both the freehold of the owner and the leasehold of a tenant, thus entitling each to a distinct right of action for damages,—in the one case for the injury to the freehold estate, and in the other to the leasehold estate. But one in possession under a lease for five years cannot recover for injury to the realty, though he may recover damages for the injury or destruction of any property included within his usufruct. In view of the plaintiff's failure to set forth the alleged contract of lease, and construing the petition as amended most strictly against the pleader, it does not appear that the fire set out by the defendant destroyed any wood or timber of the plaintiff which had been severed from the realty, or any other personalty of his situate upon the leasehold. The petition does not set forth specifically why, or how, or in what amount the value of the plaintiff's lease is less than it would have been had the fire not occurred. The probable profits from the sale of timber, as alleged, are too vague and contingent to be the basis of a recovery, and the right to recover for the damage to the land, caused by the burning of decaying trash and litter, is in the owner of the freehold. None of the allegations of the original petition were withdrawn by the plaintiff, and the petition as amended failed to show any injury for which the plaintiff, as a tenant, was entitled to recover."

In Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. King (1896) 63 Ark. 251, 38 S. W. 13, the owner of certain leased premises brought an action against a railway company for wrongfully fencing off its right of way over the premises, cutting off the approach to a spring situated thereon. Recovery by the landlord was denied, the court holding that this was an injury to the tenant in possession for which he could recover, and not an injury to the reversion which would give rise to a cause of action by the owner. The distinction between an injury to the freehold and that merely to the possession was made by the court, as follows: "It appears from the testimony in this case that the land of the appellee, upon which the appellant has a right of way, and upon which the spring is situated, was, at the time this suit was brought and the cause was tried, in the possession of a tenant of the appellee, and had been in the possession of such tenant since the building by the appellant of the fence inclosing the right of way and the spring thereon situate. It does not appear that there was any evidence that any damage had been done to the reversion, and, if there was any damage, it must have been to the right and interest which the tenant had in the possession of the land by virtue of his tenancy, and it follows, therefore, that there was no right of action in the plaintiff; that the right of action, if there was any, was in the tenant, who, as we understand, was in possession when the wrong was done of which the appellee complains, and held continuous possession until after the institution of this suit. It appears that the structure complained of was a fence which, according to the adjudged cases as we understand them, being temporary and not permanent in its character, gave to the party who might be entitled to sue for any damage consequent upon its erection a right to sue for such damages only as had accrued before the institution of the suit, and a right to bring successive actions for damages consequent upon the continuance of the structure thereafter, if the same was wrongful. It is not to be presumed that the railroad company would persist in the wrongful continuance of the fence, or that the party who might be entitled to damages for such wrong could foresee all the damages that might occur from a wrong which might occur in the future, and which might never occur."

By the weight of authority, a tenant who is not in possession of the demised premises is not entitled to recover for injury thereto by a third person. M'Laughlin v. Long (1820) 5 Harr. & J. (Md.) 113; McKinley v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. (1890) 40 Mo. App. 449; Tobias v. Cohn (1867) 36 N. Y. 363; Wilson v. Douglas (1847) 33 S. C. L. (2 Strobb.) 97; McDougall v. Campbellton Water Supply Co. (1898) 34 N. B. 467.

It was decided in McKinley v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. (1890) 40 Mo. App. 449, that a tenant under verbal lease, prior to taking possession, has not sufficient interest in the leased premises to maintain an action against a railroad company for authorizing a trespass on the land, under which authorization, after the tenant went into possession, the defendant's servant entered the premises, and began the clearing of a right of way, and destroyed the tenant's growing crops.

In McDougall v. Campbellton Water Supply Co. (N. B.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff had leased certain premises and had made a sublease to M., who was in possession at the time of the alleged trespass. The defendant entered the premises, dug ditches thereon, and laid pipes across the lot with the permission of the plaintiff's subtenant. In an action of trespass for the injury so occasioned, wherein the plaintiff did not allege an injury to the reversion, it was held that, not being in possession, he could not recover.

In the case of Tobias v. Cohn (1867) 36 N. Y. 363, a tenant for life, who had subleased the property for a term of years, brought an action of trespass alleging that the defendant entered the yard in the possession of the plaintiff, erected a fence thereon, and deprived the plaintiff of the use of a portion of the premises. It was held that only the tenant in possession could maintain such an action, and hence the plaintiff was denied recovery.

In Wilson v. Douglas (1847) 33 S. C. L. (2 Strobb.) 97, it appeared that the defendant held land located within the plat leased to the plaintiff. The court instructed the jury that if the defendant's possession of the land held by him had begun before the lease of the whole to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff could not recover from the defendant for a trespass on the land which the defendant held. It was held that the instruction was properly given.

It was held in M'Laughlin v. Long (1820) 5 Harr. & J. (Md.) 85, that a tenant from year to year, who had subleased all of his interest in the premises, could not maintain an action for waste committed on the premises, since such an action could be brought only by one who had an estate in remainder or reversion, or a tenant in possession; that when he had transferred all the interest he had in the premises, nothing remained in him to be injured.

A lessee may maintain an action against a grantee of premises, who held the property by a deed from the purchaser at a master's sale, where the grantee forcibly entered the premises, the lessee being in jail, but still in possession. Schwartz v. McQuaid (1905) 214 Ill. 357, 105 Am. St. Rep. 112, 73 N. E. 582.

But in West v. Treude (1640) Cro. Car. 187, 79 Eng. Reprint, 764, it was held that a tenant for years might maintain an action of trespass or case against his subtenant in possession, to recover damages for injuries to the premises by the subtenant.

And see Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 334, wherein recovery was allowed in an action by a lessee for an injury to the premises, although the land was in the possession of a sublessee at the time of the injury.

FIRST STATE BANK OF SHELBY, Appt.,
v.
BOTTINEAU COUNTY BANK et al., Respts.

(— Mont. —, 185 Pac. 162.)

Homestead — enlarged — liability for debts.

1. The enlarged Homestead Act of 1909 is to be read in connection with the original act, and therefore the enlarged homestead is not liable for debts of the homesteader, contracted before issuance of patent.

Equity — jurisdiction — suit to enjoin sale under execution.

2. A court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit to enjoin the sale under a judgment against one person of land belonging to another person.

Statutes — amendment — adding new provisions.

3. In the absence of constitutional limitation a statute may be amended merely by adding new provisions.

— intention of Congress.

4. Whether an act of Congress is or is not an amendment of an existing act must be determined by the intention of Congress.

5. A supplemental act is one designed to improve an existing statute by adding something thereto without changing the original text.

Exemption — Homestead Law.

6. The statute exempting homesteads from liability for debts prior to the issuance of patent is not strictly an exempting act, but a condition attached to the granting of the public land as an inducement to secure settlers.

[See 22 R. C. L. 265, 266.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Cascade County (Leslie, J.) dismissing an action brought to restrain defendants from proceeding with a sale of plaintiff's property to satisfy a judgment against another. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Jesse G. Henderson and Freeman & Thelen, for appellant:

The purpose of Congress was to allow its citizens to acquire the public domain and to establish homes for the benefit of themselves and their families.

Adams v. Church, 193 U. S. 510, 48 L. ed. 769, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 512; Miller v. Little, 47 Cal. 350; Lewton v. Hower, 18 Fla. 872.

When an execution is levied on lands which are exempt from an execution or which belong to a third party, not a party to the original action under which the judgment was secured, the rule that one court of concurrent jurisdiction cannot interfere with the process of a court of concurrent jurisdiction does not apply.

Messrs. H. S. Kline and C. B. Elwell, for respondents:

The court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, and the demurrer should be sustained on that ground.

Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 25, 1913, Charles R. Wilbur made final proof upon 320 acres of land which he had theretofore entered under the Enlarged Homestead Act. On July 30, 1913, the Bottineau County Bank recovered judgment against Wilbur in the district court of the twelfth judicial district in and for Hill county, and a certified copy of the transcript of the original docket was filed in Toole county, where the land above mentioned is located. In January, 1914, Wilbur received patent, and on April 15, 1914, sold and conveyed the land by warranty deed to the First State Bank of Shelby. In November, 1914, the Bottineau County Bank caused execution to be issued on its judgment, placed the same in the hands of the sheriff of Toole county, who levied upon the land and advertised it for sale. The First State Bank of Shelby thereupon commenced this action in the district court of the eighth judicial district, to secure an injunction restraining the judgment creditor and the sheriff from proceeding with the sale.

To the complaint, which sets forth the history more in detail, the defendants interposed a demurrer, first, upon the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; and, second, upon the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer as to the second ground, indicating in its order that a 320-acre homestead acquired under the Enlarged Homestead Act is liable for the debts of the homesteader contracted before patent issues. Plaintiff, declining to plead further, suffered a judgment of dismissal to be entered against it, and appealed.

There is no merit in the first ground of the demurrer. The purpose of this action is to restrain the sale of plaintiff's property to satisfy a judgment against Wilbur, and not to restrain the enforcement of the judgment against Wilbur or against any property he may have.

This appeal presents the novel question: Is a 320-acre homestead liable for the debts of the homesteader, contracted prior to the issuance of patent? If this question is to be answered in the affirmative, then the judgment became a lien upon the land in controversy while owned by Wilbur, and the Shelby bank acquired its title subject to that lien, and is not entitled to the relief sought. If the question is to be answered in the negative, then the complaint states a cause of action for the relief demanded.

Under the original Homestead Act of May 20, 1862, chap. 75 (12 Stat. at L. 392), as it has existed from the date of its enactment to the present time, the land acquired thereunder (160 acres) cannot "in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor." Section 2296, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575. There cannot be a controversy over the purpose which the Congress had in enacting that statute. It was designed to provide the homesteader and his family sufficient land upon which to make a home (Ruddy v. Rossi, 248 U. S. 104, 63 L. ed. 148, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46), and to secure that land against the homesteader's prior misfortune or improvidence (Anderson v. Carkins, 135 U. S. 483, 34 L. ed. 272, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905). It was designed solely for the benefit of the grantee and his family, and not for the benefit of antecedent creditors. Lewton v. Hower, 18 Fla. 872.

During most of the period when the homesteader might secure 160 acres under the original Homestead Act, he might also secure 160 acres under the Pre-emption Act, and an additional 160 under the Timber Culture Act, making in all 480 acres, practically of his own selection, and that, too, land for the most part susceptible of successful cultivation without artificial irrigation. Under these favorable statutes the public domain of the Mississippi valley and the humid regions of the Pacific coast were settled. It is a part of the public history of our country that during the forty years succeeding the enactment of the original Homestead Law, the best of the public lands were entered upon and title thereto secured from the government, leaving the later homeseeker to make his selection only from lands in semiarid regions, and lands so rough and broken that but a comparatively small portion of entryable units could be cultivated. In other words, it came to require more than 160 acres of the lands available to entry, to make a home upon which the entryman could reasonably expect to succeed. In the meantime the Pre-emption and Timber Culture Acts were repealed, leaving only the original Homestead Law under which public land might be acquired, and the area limited to 160 acres. These facts, greatly enlarged upon and emphasized in an extended message by the President, were presented to the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, and bills looking to the enlargement of the area obtainable under the Homestead Laws were introduced. The history of those measures and subsequent bills having the same general purpose is too extensive to be recited here. It is sufficient to say that the outcome of the agitation was the Enlarged Homestead Act of February 19, 1909, chap. 160 (35 Stat. at L. 639, Comp. Stat. §§ 4563-4568, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 613). As originally enacted, the statute applied only to the nonmineral, nontimbered, nonirrigable, unreserved, unappropriated, surveyed public lands in Colorado, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico, designated by the Secretary of the Interior as not being, in his opinion, susceptible of successful irrigation, at a reasonable cost, from any known source of water supply. By subsequent amendments the act became applicable to the same class of lands in other western states.

The act is entitled: "An Act to Provide for Enlarged Homesteads." It contains but 6 sections. Section 1 defines the lands subject to entry under the act. Section 2 provides that a person applying to make entry shall furnish the affidavit required by § 2290 of the United States Revised Statutes, and in addition shall make affidavit that the land sought is of the character described in § 1. Section 3 provides for an entry additional to one already made at the time the act went into effect, in order that the entryman might secure the full amount—320 acres. Section 4 provides that in addition to the final proof required under § 2291, United States Revised Statutes, the entryman shall disclose that he has cultivated the required area. Section 5 declares that the provisions of this act shall not be construed to prevent a qualified homesteader from making entry under the original Homestead Act in any of the states named, but that a person who makes entry under the Act of 1909 shall not be entitled to make entry under the original act. Section 6 relates only to the state of Utah. It will be seen at once that the Enlarged Homestead Act does not in terms change any of the provisions of the original act. The determination of the principal question before us, therefore, depends upon the proper construction of the Enlarged Homestead Act with reference to the original act.

Was it intended as an independent statute, or was it meant to become a part of the original Homestead Act as it existed at the time this new measure went into effect? Aside from any other consideration, the bare reading of the Act of 1909 would seem to be sufficient to convince one that it could not have been intended as an independent act. To illustrate: A prospective entryman cannot determine from this act whether he is qualified to secure its benefits. He must refer to the original act (§ 2289, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. § 4530, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 543) for the qualifications required. He is not advised by this act how to proceed. He must refer to the original act (§ 2290, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. § 4531, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 555). He is required by this act to make an affidavit, but he is not informed what the affidavit must contain. Again, he must refer to the original act (§ 2290, above) for the required information. He is advised by this act that he must pay certain fees, but the amount of the fees is not disclosed. He may only ascertain the amount by referring again to the original act (§ 2290, above). He is informed by this act of the amount of cultivation required before final proof, but he is not informed of anything further to be done by him; and if he depended upon this act alone he could never make final proof or secure patent. The procedure is all contained in the original act (§ 2291, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. § 4532). It cannot be said that an act so absolutely dependent upon a prior act is an independent statute. State ex rel. Cuneo v. Wyandot County, 16 Ohio C. C. 218, 9 Ohio C. D. 90.

In the absence of constitutional limitations, a statute may be amended merely by striking out portions of it, by inserting new provisions, by striking out portions and inserting new matter in lieu thereof, or by adding new provisions. Fletcher v. Prather, 102 Cal. 418, 36 Pac. 658; 36 Cyc. 1054; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 706. There are practically no constitutional restrictions imposed upon the Congress as to the methods to be pursued in enacting statutes. Even the title of a Federal statute is not always a controlling, or even persuading, consideration in construing the act. United States v. Union P. R. Co. 91 U. S. 72, 23 L. ed. 224. It not infrequently happens that a statute of the character of the one now under review is to be found attached as a rider to an appropriation bill. Whether an act is or is not an amendment to an existing statute must be determined by the intention of the Congress. Blake v. National City Bank, 23 Wall. 307, 23 L. ed. 119.

If the Enlarged Homestead Act was intended as an amendment to the prior Homestead Laws, then the acts are to be construed as one—as originally in the amended form. The history of this act is fairly conclusive that it was never intended to be construed otherwise than as a part of the original Homestead Law as it was then in force. Without quoting from the committee reports or the debates in the Congress, we think it is apparent from them that it was the intention of the lawmakers by this act to supplement the existing statutes—to improve the Homestead Laws, and encourage the settlement of the vast areas of public lands in the semiarid regions by increasing the amount of land subject to entry, so that the homesteader in 1909, and thereafter, might acquire land approaching in value that of the more fortunate entryman who secured land which could be irrigated at reasonable cost, or land which could be cultivated successfully without irrigation, and which would produce a crop every year.

A supplemental act is one designed to improve an existing statute, by adding something thereto without changing the original text. McCleary v. Babcock, 169 Ind. 228, 82 N. E. 453; Loomis v. Runge, 14 C. C. A. 148, 30 U. S. App. 133, 66 Fed. 856. Supplemental statutes include every species of amendatory legislation which goes to complete a legislative scheme. Rahway Sav. Inst. v. Rahway, 53 N. J. L. 48, 20 Atl. 756.

Our conclusion is that the Enlarged Homestead Act is merely supplementary to the original Homestead Law, and is to be construed as a part of it. It follows that land acquired under it becomes subject to the provisions of § 2296 of the United States Revised Statutes, Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575, and that the land in controversy in this action could not in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted by Wilbur prior to the date his patent was issued.

Our attention has been called to but a single adjudication upon this subject. Judge Bourquin gave this same construction to the Enlarged Homestead Act. Re Auge (D. C.) 238 Fed. 621. It is said that the same conclusion was reached by the United States district court for the district of North Dakota, but the opinion does not mention the fact that the homestead there involved was acquired under the Enlarged Homestead Act. Re Cohn (D. C.) 171 Fed. 568.

It is insisted by counsel for respondents that exemption from liability for debts is a special privilege or immunity granted by statute; that liability is the rule and exemption the exception, and that the party claiming the immunity must be able to show that he comes clearly within the statute providing the exception. Granting that this is so, for the sake of argument, the rules have no application here.

Section 2296, United States Revised Statutes, is not, strictly speaking, an exemption statute. It was not enacted pursuant to the police <sup>Exemption—</sup>Homestead Law. powers of the government, but in virtue of the power conferred upon the Congress to dispose of the public lands. The non-liability declared by that section is one of the conditions attached to the grant as an additional inducement to secure settlement of the public domain. Ritzville Hardware Co. v. Bennington, 50 Wash. 111, 126 Am. St. Rep. 894, 96 Pac. 826.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to the District Court to overrule the demurrer.

ANNOTATION.

Enlarged Homestead Acts of 1909 and 1910.

The purpose of the enactment of the Enlarged Homestead Acts of 1909 and 1910 (8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 613 et seq.) obviously was to encourage the settlement of the semiarid areas of public land in the far West, to which lands it is by its terms confined, by increasing the amount of land which may be secured by an entryman.

The only judicial consideration of the acts thus far seems to have been in the reported case (FIRST STATE BANK v. BOTTINEAU COUNTY BANK, ante, 631) and a single other decision, Re Auge (1916) 238 Fed. 621, both of these cases holding that the acts are to be construed as supplementary to the original Homestead Act, so that the provision therein contained (Rev. Stat. § 2296, Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575), that "no lands acquired under the provisions of this chapter shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor," is applicable to an enlarged homestead acquired under the Acts of 1909 and 1910.

Thus, in the case of Re Auge (Fed.) supra, in holding that a bankrupt was entitled to an exemption of the full 320 acres acquired under the later acts, the court said: "The chapter referred to is the Federal original Homestead Law, providing for entries of 160 acres or less. Later homestead enactments (35 Stat. at L. 689, chap. 160, Comp. Stat. § 4563, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 613, 37 Stat. at L. 123, chap. 153, Comp. Stat. § 4532, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 557) permit entries for as much as 320 acres—enlarged homesteads—of public lands of certain quality, and subject to somewhat different conditions. These latter are but additions to and amendments of the original law, and upon settled principles all form a whole, to be taken and read together as though the later enactments were part of the original law from the beginning, so far as the protection extended by § 2296 is concerned. Said section provides protection; other sections define the area protected. Changes in the latter affect not the former. Hence enlarged homesteads are 'lands acquired under the provision of this chapter,' within § 2296, and are entitled to its protection, even as lesser or ordinary homesteads are."

On the same principle it is held in the reported case (FIRST STATE BANK v. BOTTINEAU COUNTY BANK) that the grantee of a patentee of lands under the Enlarged Homestead Act is entitled to enjoin a sale thereof, under an execution issued on a judgment entered against the patentee before the transfer, for a debt contracted before he received a patent.

In Callison v. Ronstadt (1920) — Ariz. —, 188 Pac. 266, it was held that one who had performed the acts of settlement on 320 acres of unsurveyed land so as to acquire a three months' preference right to enter the same under the act of February 19, 1909 (Comp. Stat. §§ 4563-4568, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 613-616), could not be enjoined from fencing the land so as to prevent the plaintiff's cattle from passing over the same in going to and from the open range and water troughs on plaintiff's land. ## COURTLAND J. YEARSLEY

v.

REBECCA A. GIPPLE, Appt.

Accretions — rights of land becoming riparian.

1. If lands become riparian by the washing away of adjoining lands, the owner is entitled to the right of a riparian owner to accretions, even though they extend beyond the original boundary line of his land.

Common law — riparian rights — existence.

2. The common law as to the rights and duties of riparian owners is in force in this state, except when altered or modified by a statute.

Headnotes by LETTON, J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Otoe County (Begley, J.) in favor of plaintiff, and dismissing the cross petition in an action brought to quiet title to certain land, and to enjoin defendant from trespassing upon such land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William H. Pitzer, Earl M. Cline, and Varro E. Tyler, for appellant:

Where a conveyance of land is made by definite boundaries, whether by metes and bounds, by government subdivision, or even by limitation to a river bank, accretions to or a part of the lands conveyed, but lying beyond such boundaries, do not pass by the deed.

Bissell v. Fletcher, 27 Neb. 582, 43 N. W. 350; Harrison v. Stipes, 34 Neb. 431, 51 N. W. 976; Gilbert v. Eldridge, 47 Minn. 210, 13 L.R.A. 411, 49 N. W. 679.

By common law in force in Nebraska, the owner of shore land on one side of the stream, whether navigable or unnavigable, owns the land to the thread of the stream.

Kinhead v. Turgeon, 74 Neb. 580, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 316, 121 Am. St. Rep. 740, 104 N. W. 1061, 109 N. W. 744, 13 Ann. Cas. 43.

Such riparian ownership is not affected, either by encroachment or recession of the waters of the stream. If the bed of the stream becomes dry, the riparian owner may come into possession and claim to his boundary. If the shore land to which the riparian rights attached is submerged, neither the title to the shore land nor the riparian rights are thereby destroyed, but on reappearance of the land it may be reclaimed and such rights restored.

Kinhead v. Turgeon, supra; Chicago v. Ward, 169 Ill. 392, 38 L.R.A. 849, 61 Am. St. Rep. 185, 48 N. E. 927; Crandall v. Allen, 118 Mo. 403, 22 L.R.A. 591, 24 S. W. 172; Fowler v. Wood, 73 Kan. 511, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 117 Am. St. Rep. 534, 85 Pac. 763; Mulry v. Norton, 100 N. Y. 426, 53 Am. Rep. 206, 3 N. E. 581.

The submergence of shore land to which riparian rights attach does not vest riparian rights in the owner next removed from the water's edge.

Mr. George E. Hager also for appellant.

Mr. D. W. Livingston, for appellee:

Where original boundary lines have become submerged by the river, they cease to exist, the river is itself a natural boundary, and every changing condition of the river in relation to adjoining lands is treated as a natural relation, and is not affected in any manner by the relations of the river and land at any former period.

Welles v. Bailey, 55 Conn. 292, 3 Am. St. Rep. 48, 10 Atl. 565; Bouvier v. Stricklett, 40 Neb. 792, 59 N. W. 550; Nebraska v. Iowa, 143 U. S. 359, 36 L. ed. 186, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396; Peuker v. Canter, 62 Kan. 371, 63 Pac. 617.

These cases also announce the rule that "nonriparian lands become riparian when the stream washes its soil, and as such is entitled to all accretions formed on its shores even though these extend beyond the original boundaries."

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this action is to quiet the title to certain lands lying in the valley of the Missouri river, together with accretions, and to enjoin the defendant from trespassing upon the accreted lands. The defendant denies the title of plaintiff to the premises, and by way of cross petition alleges title in herself by deed from Mary A. Topping to that portion of the accreted lands which lies east of the original boundary of plaintiff's land. The court found that plaintiff was a riparian owner, and entitled to all accretions, that the defendant's grantor, Mary A. Topping, was not possessed of any title or interest in the accreted land, and that her deed conveyed no title to the defendant. The title of the plaintiff was quieted, defendant was enjoined from entering or trespassing upon the premises, and her cross petition was dismissed, from which decree she appeals.

In 1908 a tract of land 200 rods square, in the northwest corner of section 31, described as "government lot No. 1, and accretions, in section 31," and also by a sectional description which would have applied to it if it had been in existence and surveyed when the original survey was made, was conveyed by Mary A. Topping to John M. Livingston. This title is held by the plaintiff by mesne conveyance from Livingston.

At the time of the government survey, there was only a small portion of land in the northwest corner of section 31, the remainder of the section being occupied by the Missouri river. Afterwards a large body of accreted land, part of it occupying the place where defendant now claims, was formed to the south and east of this tract. Still later, that vagrant and inconstant stream, by a gradual change of channel, moved westward again, and washed away these accretions to a large extent.

In September, 1912, when the plaintiff purchased, there was some of the accreted land belonging to the Toppings lying to the east of the 250-acre tract. The river continued to encroach westward. In November, 1912, a survey of the land was made, and a plat drawn by the county surveyor. This plat and the testimony of the surveyor show that at that time all of the accretions east of the 250-acre tract had been washed away, and the west bank of the river was some distance within the east boundary of the tract. Afterwards the river receded again, and accretions formed to the eastward. The title to the accretions which lie to the east of the original line of plaintiff's land is the matter in controversy in this action.

Plaintiff's contention is that, after the land to the east had been washed away, so that the river formed the eastern boundary of his land, he became a riparian owner, and as such was entitled to all accretions which thereafter formed in front of his property, without regard to the original boundary lines.

Defendant contends that where a conveyance of land is made by definite boundaries, accretions extending beyond such boundaries do not pass by the deed; that the riparian owner may claim to this original boundary line only, and that the original owner of the soil so washed away and gradually replaced may again assert title.

A critical examination of the cited decisions by defendant shows that a number of general expressions are used, which if considered without reference to the facts in each case might mislead. They are mostly cases in which the several courts considered that the stream had changed its course by avulsion. The principles applying to avulsion do not apply where the original soil was gradually disintegrated and washed away, the river taking its place, and as it receded leaving accretions.

rights of land becoming riparian.

was entitled to all accretions. "The question is well settled at common law that the person whose land is bounded by a stream of water, which changes its course gradually by alluvial formations, shall still hold by the same boundary, including the accumulated soil. No other rule can be applied, on just principles. Every proprietor whose land is thus bounded is subject to loss by the same means which may add to his territory; and as he is without remedy for his loss, in this way, he cannot be held accountable for his gain." New Orleans v. United States, 10 Pet. 662, 717, 9 L. ed. 573, 594. This decision was quoted from and approved in Lammers v. Nissen, 4 Neb. 250.

The contention of defendant that, where there are known boundaries of land which has been submerged, this principle does not apply, has been carefully considered by the courts of England and Ireland, and a contrary conclusion reached. Gifford v. Yarborough, 5 Bing. 163, 130 Eng. Reprint, 1023, 2 Bligh, N. R. 147, 4 Eng. Reprint, 1087, 1 Dow. & C. 178, 6 Eng. Reprint, 491, affirming 3 Barn. & C. 91, 107 Eng. Reprint, 668, 4 Dowl. & R. 790, 27 Revised Rep. 292, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 458. This case was decided in the same manner in the King's bench, and afterwards brought by writ of error to the House of Lords. Lord Eldon and Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst took part in the decision in the House of Lords, which was unanimous. See also Re Hull & S. R. Co. 5 Mees. & W. 327, 151 Eng. Reprint, 139, 8 L. J. Exch. N. S. 260, and Atty. Gen. v. McCarthy, [1911] 2 Ir. R. 260, in which it was held that the existence of marks, bounds, or other evidence by which the former boundary line could be ascertained did not prevent a private owner of lands acquiring title to the accreted land. This is the general rule in this country. Welles v. Bailey, 55 Conn. 292, 3 Am. St. Rep. 48, 10 Atl. 565. Courts in other states bordering upon the Missouri river take the same view. The exact point is decided in Widdecombe v. Chiles, 173 Mo. 195, 61 L.R.A. 309,

96 Am. St. Rep. 507, 73 S. W. 444; Buse v. Russell, 86 Mo. 209; Naylor v. Cox, 114 Mo. 232, 21 S. W. 589; Cox v. Arnold, 129 Mo. 337, 50 Am. St. Rep. 450, 31 S. W. 592; Peuker v. court from its earliest decisions on this subject has followed the common law. Lammers v. Nissen, supra; Gill v. Lydick, 40 Neb. 508, 59 N. W. 104; Meng v. Coffee, 67 Neb. 500, 60 L.R.A. 910, 108 Am. St. Rep. 697, 93 N. W. 713; Kinkead v. Turgeon, 74 Neb. 580, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 762, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 316, 121 Am. St. Rep. 749, 104 N. W. 1061, 109 N. W. 744, 13 Ann. Cas. 43. In Bouvier v. Stricklett, 40 Neb. 792, 59 N. W. 550, both accretion and avulsion had taken place. The fourth paragraph of the syllabus is: "Where the middle of the channel of a stream of water constitutes the boundary line of a tract of land, and the water undermines the banks and the soil 'caves in' and mixes with the water and is washed away, the owner of the land must stand the loss; and the middle of the new channel formed for the river by such process, if a new channel is thus formed, will constitute the boundary line of the tract of land."

In Ocean City Asso. v. Shriver, 64 N. J. L. 550, 51 L.R.A. 425, 46 Atl. 690, which is the principal case relied upon by defendant, and other cases making the same quotations, there is a misconception as to the rule laid down in De Juris Maris, a work ascribed to Lord Hale, in that the text quoted to support the decision is taken from that part of the treatise relating to sudden changes by avulsion or by submergence. The writer treats first, of "alluvio maris," next of "recessus maris." As to land acquired by accretions, or, as he says, "by insensible degrees," it is said "that such an acquisition lies in custom and prescription; and it hath a reasonable intendment, because these secret and gradual increases of the land adjoining cedunt solo tanquam majus principali; and so by custom it becomes as a perquisite to the land, as it doth in all cases of this nature by the civil law."

He then takes up the subject of "recessus maris," saying: "This accession of land, in this eminent and sudden manner by the recess of the sea, doth not come under the former title of alluvio, or increase per projectionem." "But in the case of alluvio maris, it is otherwise, because the accession and addition of the land by the sea to the dry land gradually is a kind of perquisite and an accession to the land, and, therefore, in case of private rivers, it seems by the very course of the common law, such a gradual increase cedit solo adjacenti."

Chapter 6, De Juris Maris, containing the above quotations, is reprinted in 16 Am. Rep. 60. It is under that part of the chapter treating of the sudden retreat of the sea, recessus maris, that the quotation in the New Jersey case, and in the other opinions to the same effect, is found, and it is inapplicable to the facts in cases of pure accretion.

ANNOTATION.

Right to follow accretions across division line previously submerged by action of water.

The authorities on the present question are in conflict and somewhat confused. This confusion arises in part from the peculiar circumstances of individual cases. It arises also from the application under somewhat similar circumstances of principles which, as applied, are conflicting, though under other circumstances they may be well established.

There are a number of cases supporting the general proposition that where land bordering on a stream is washed away, and an accretion to the land of another subsequently extends over the same place, the newly formed land belongs to the owner of the land to which it is an accretion, and not to the one originally owning the land in that place. Bush v. Alexander (1918) 134 Ark. 307, 203 S. W. 1028; Welles v. Bailey (1887) 55 Conn. 292, 3 Am. St. Rep. 48, 10 Atl. 565; Peuker v. Canter (1901) 62 Kan. 363, 63 Pac. 617; Wood v. McAlpine (1911) 85 Kan. 657, 118 Pac. 1060, affirmed on rehearing in (1912) 86 Kan. 804, 121 Pac. 916; Buse v. Russell (1885) 86 Mo. 209; Naylor v. Cox (1892) 114 Mo. 232, 21 S. W. 589; Rees v. McDaniel (1893) 115 Mo. 145, 21 S. W. 913; Widdecombe v. Chiles (1903) 173 Mo. 195, 61 L.R.A. 309, 96 Am. St. Rep. 507, 73 S. W. 444; see also Cox v. Arnold (1895) 129 Mo. 337, 50 Am. St. Rep. 450, 31 S. W. 592, and Frank v. Goddin (1906) 193 Mo. 390, 112 Am. St. Rep. 493, 91 S. W. 1057; YEARSLEY v. GIPPLE (reported herewith) ante, 636; Hempstead v. Lawrence (1911) 147 App. Div. 624, 132 N. Y. Supp. 615, reargument denied in (1912) 149 App. Div. 922, 133 N. Y. Supp. 1146.

The rule is implied also in Fowler v. Wood (1906) 73 Kan. 511, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 117 Am. St. Rep. 534, 85 Pac. 763, holding that if the owner of land, a part of which has been submerged, convey the upland and retain title to the remainder, the purchaser, upon the reappearance of the submerged portion, can include it within his boundaries only by the processes of accretion or reliction.

And the right of a grantee of land, described as bounding on the ocean, to follow accretions thereto, even though they extend across the place where the grantor's land had been before it was lost by erosion, is recognized in Dewey Land Co. v. Stevens (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 314, 90 Atl. 1040, concurring opinion in (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 656, 91 Atl. 934. But the point was not directly involved in the case, as the land was not claimed by accretion, the contest being between the grantee in a riparian grant from the state and one who claimed under a deed from the former owner of the submerged land after it had been restored.

In Widdecombe v. Chiles (1903) 173 Mo. 195, 61 L.R.A. 309, 96 Am. St. Rep. 507, 73 S. W. 444, supra, the court approved the principle that accretions belong to the owner of the land against which the deposits are made, and not to the owner of land against which they are not made, although they cover a space where the land of the latter was before it was washed away.

And in Buse v. Russell (1885) 86 Mo. 209, supra, it was held that where a portion of an island is washed away, and accretions forming from the mainland extend over the place where such portions stood, they will belong to the owner of the shore land, and not to the owner of the island. To the same effect is Rees v. McDaniel (1893) 115 Mo. 145, 21 S. W. 913. And the same principle was applied to the converse of this proposition in Naylor v. Cox (1914) 114 Mo. 232, 21 S. W. 589, where the accretions forming from an island extended over the place where the mainland had been before it was washed away.

The doctrine that where land on opposite sides of a navigable stream is owned by different proprietors, and the river gradually encroaches on one side and forms accretions on the other, the accretions belong to the owner to whose land they are formed, although they cover some of the area originally covered by the land of the owner on the opposite side of the river, is applied in Hempstead v. Lawrence (1911) 147 App. Div. 624, 132 N. Y. Supp. 615, reversing (1910) 70 Misc. 52, 127 N. Y. Supp. 949. Reargument was denied in (1912) 149 App. Div. 922, 133 N. Y. Supp. 1146. In this case the so-called river was formed by the ocean's breaking through an outer beach, which was separated from the mainland by a shallow channel. This passage or river, which became navigable, was originally entirely on the land of one proprietor, but by erosion and accretion at the rate of about 400 feet a year, it extended over the land of an adjoining owner. It was held that the accretions belonged to the owner of the land to which they formed, although they extended over the old division line.

In Wallace v. Driver (1896) 61 Ark. 429, 31 L.R.A. 317, 38 S. W. 641, a portion of an owner's land bordering on the Mississippi river caved into the stream, and twenty-five years later an island formed in the river in front of the mainland, and in the place where the land had been washed away. It was held that the island did not belong to the owner of the mainland unless the washing away was sudden and perceptible and the limits of the change of channel of banks could be determined, or unless the formation of the island was made by accretions beginning at the water line of the remaining land.

And rights to accretions which, under the law, as interpreted in Wallace v. Driver (Ark.) supra, had vested, were held in Bush v. Alexander (1918) 134 Ark. 307, 203 S. W. 1028, not affected by the subsequent enactment of a statute providing that all land which had formed, or might thereafter form, in the navigable waters of the state and within the original boundaries of a former owner of land bordering upon navigable streams, should belong to the former owner or his successor in interest.

In Minton v. Steele (1894) 125 Mo. 181, 28 S. W. 746, a riparian owner recovered land reformed upon a place formerly occupied by lands washed away, as against the claims of an adjoining owner, who insisted that the formation commenced against his land, but the decision turned upon the finding of the jury that the accretions were to the land of the former owner, rather than upon the law involved.

To an effect somewhat similar to the reported case (YEASLEY v. GIPPLE, ante, 636), supporting the rule therein laid down that, if land becomes riparian by the washing away of adjoining lands, the owner is entitled to the right of a riparian owner to accretions, even though they extend beyond the original boundary line of his land, are: Welles v. Bailey (1887) 55 Conn. 292, 3 Am. St. Rep. 48, 10 Atl. 565; Peuker v. Canter (1901) 62 Kan. 368, 68 Pac. 617, and Widdecombe v. Chiles (1908) 173 Mo. 195, 61 L.R.A. 309, 96 Am. St. Rep. 507, 73 S. W. 444.

In Peuker v. Canter (1901) 62 Kan. 368, 68 Pac. 617, supra, where a non-riparian owner of land near the Missouri river became a riparian owner by the gradual washing away of a part of the intervening land, and the river then receded, forming alluvion from the line of contact with such owner's land within the original surveyed line of the former riparian land, it was held that the owner whose land had become riparian was entitled not only to such alluvion as formed within his original lines, but also to an equitable proportion of that formed beyond his original boundary line.

And in Welles v. Bailey (1887) 55 Conn. 292, 3 Am. St. Rep. 48, 10 Atl. 565, supra, it was held that when a river has gradually washed away all of the tract belonging to one person, and continues to change in that direction until it has worked so far into the land of an adjoining owner that all of the land of the former and part of that of the latter is now on the other side of the river, the title of the latter will not stop at the place of his old division line, but he will continue to follow the river, and will remain a riparian owner, although by so doing he absorbs land formerly belonging to the other owner. The court said: "If a particular tract was entirely cut off from a river by an intervening tract, and that intervening tract should be gradually washed away until the remoter tract was reached by the river, the latter tract would become riparian as much as if it had been originally such. . . . If, after washing away the intervening lot, it should encroach upon the remoter lot, and should then begin to change its movement in the other direction, gradually restoring what it had taken from the remoter lot, and finally all that it had taken from the intervening lot, the whole by the law of accretion would belong to the remoter but now proximate lot. Having become riparian, it has all riparian rights."

Where a small strip of land which lies between a government grant and a river is washed away so that the granted land becomes riparian, and then accretions to the granted land carry the river boundary far beyond its old location, they will belong to the grantee, and no title will vest in the government which it can grant to a third person. Widdecombe v. Chiles (1903) 173 Mo. 195, 61 L.R.A. 309, 96 Am. St. Rep. 507, 73 S. W. 444, supra.

But in Allard v. Curran (1918) — S. D. —, 168 N. W. 761, it was held that an owner of land which, by the gradual washing away of land between it and the Missouri river, extended to the river, was not entitled to follow accretions across the former boundary line when the river thereafter receded, and the intervening land was restored. The court referred to Welles v. Bailey (Conn.) and Peuker v. Canter (Kan.) supra, but declined to follow these cases, and followed rather the decision in Ocean City Asso. v. Shriver (N. J.) infra. It was said regarding the rule as declared by the Connecticut and Kansas courts: "This rule appears, as is indicated by some of the above-quoted language, to have sprung from the fact that, when the riparian estate is destroyed and carried away, the boundary line between that and the adjacent estate is obliterated and lost, and that, in case of restoration by accretion or reliction, there is no way of identifying the original estate, and therefore it is deemed to have been entirely destroyed and lost. But no such reason exists in this case. The boundary line between the lands of appellant and respondent was a government section line, and of course can be re-established without difficulty. In the absence of the reason, there is no justification for the rule. Without holding that, in all cases where land has been carried away or submerged by the action of the water in a lake or river and afterward restored by the action of such water, such land belongs to the original owner thereof, we can see no reason, in justice or equity, why the land involved in this case, after it had been restored by the river, should be given to respondent merely because the river had at some time touched her land. After her land had been fully restored to her, she had all that she was entitled to or in good conscience could demand. . . . We believe that, after appellant's land had been restored by the action of the river, being capable of identification, it belonged to appellant and should be treated as though it had never been submerged at all."

So, in Stockley v. Cissna (1902) 56 C. C. A. 324, 119 Fed. 812, it was contended that the washing away of land bordering on the Mississippi river, until the river reached the land of an adjoining owner, operated as a complete destruction of the title to the submerged land, and that the adjoining owner, as a riparian proprietor, was entitled to accretions thereafter formed, although they occupied the site of the land which had been washed away. But the court held that the accretions occupying the situs of the old land which had been submerged inured to the benefit of the former owner of that land. The court said it could not be pretended that because the surface of the land had been washed away the owner lost beyond recovery his title to the land so submerged; that land lost by erosion or submergence is regained to the original owner of the fee when by reliction or accretion the water disappears and the land emerges, and that the new land inured to the former owner by virtue of his title to the bed upon which the accretion deposited. And the court followed the rule that an owner of land adjoining the sea does not lose his right thereto by the fact that it is for a time submerged, if upon being restored it can be identified. It will be observed that this conclusion was reached, although the title to land bordering on the river was held to extend only to low-water mark.

It is stated also in Van Deventer v. Lott (1909) 172 Fed. 574, affirmed in (1910) 103 C. C. A. 524, 180 Fed. 373, that property reformed by the sea, after having once been taken away, is to be considered as restored, rather than as a growth or addition to different property to which the actual accretion may have attached. But this statement may apparently be regarded as obiter, in view of the fact that it was found that the accretions in question were not within the former boundaries of the claimant.

And in other cases, where the stream or water's edge was not the boundary, the doctrine that the owner of land to which accretions formed may follow them across the former boundary line and over the place formerly occupied by land of another has not been applied.

Thus, where a plat is made of upland and land beneath the water, and land is sold with reference to the plat, the fact that the shore is washed away until interior land becomes riparian will not give it the riparian right of reclaiming the land lying beneath the water, and sold to third parties according to the plat. Gilbert v. Eldridge (1891) 47 Minn. 210, 13 L.R.A. 411, 49 N. W. 679.

The same principle was applied in Ocean City Asso. v. Shriver (1900) 64 N. J. L. 550, 51 L.R.A. 426, 46 Atl. 690, where the owner of a lot which had been deeded with reference to a plat showing separation from the ocean by a street and other intervening land claimed the right to follow accretions to the lot across the former boundary, where the ocean had encroached upon the lot, making it, as he claimed, riparian, and then receded. It was held that the owner of the lot had no equity beyond the restoration by accretions to the limit of his lot, and that beyond that boundary the accretions belonged to the grantor, although the lot owner was a remote grantee, and at the time he acquired title the ordinary high water came up to the lot. The court quoted and applied the common-law rule as stated in Lord Hale's De Jure Maris, to the effect that if a subject hath land adjoining the sea, and the violence of the sea swallow it up, the subject will not lose his property if there are reasonable marks to continue the notice of it, or if its extent can be ascertained.

Ocean City Asso. v. Shriver (N. J.) supra, was distinguished in Dewey Land Co. v. Stevens (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 814, 90 Atl. 1040, concurring opinion in (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 656, 91 Atl. 934, where the contest was between the grantee in a riparian grant from the state and one who claimed under a deed from the former owner of the submerged land after it had been restored. The court held that as the land was bounded by the ocean and not by fixed lines, as in the former case, the grantor had lost the title to his land by its submergence, and that his grant after the restoration conveyed no interest. There were, however, special circumstances in the case, and the right to follow accretions was not directly involved.

It has been held that where the bank of a river is suddenly washed away, its owner does not lose his title to the locus in quo, but if subsequently land is formed in the stream over the place where the land formerly was, he will have the title to it, and such title cannot be claimed by the owner of an island on the opposite side of the river in another state, by the mere fact that the land is attached by accretion to such island in the process of formation. St. Louis v. Rutz (1890) 138 U. S. 226, 34 L. ed. 941, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337, affirming (1888) 85 Fed. 188. But in that case it appeared that the island was a mere mass of alluvial deposits, and had traveled for more than a mile from one state into another; and the court said that in such a case the law of title by accretion can have no application, for its progress is not imperceptible in a legal sense.

The court in St. Louis v. Rutz (U. S.) supra, said that the right to accretions to an island in a river cannot be so extended lengthwise of the river as to exclude riparian proprietors above or below the island from access to the river.

And in Mulry v. Norton (1885) 100 N. Y. 424, 53 Am. Rep. 206, 3 N. E. 581, affirming (1883) 29 Hun, 660, it is said that, however accretions may be commenced or continued, the right of one owner of uplands to follow and appropriate them ceases when the formation passes laterally the line of his coterminous neighbor. In that case a bar, separated from the mainland by a lagoon, was claimed as an accretion by the owner of the portion of the bar where the formation began. It appeared that the bar merely replaced a formation which had been in part washed away, and the court said that the owner of the nucleus of the bar could not, even if the process of its enlargement and extension was effected by accretion, claim beyond the point where such accretion began to be adjacent to the property of adjoining owners.

Also in Crandall v. Allen (1898) 118 Mo. 408, 22 L.R.A. 591, 24 S. W. 172, it was held that where land is so situated on a river bend that the current washes away a portion of it until former nonriparian land becomes riparian, and then, beginning on the shore of the latter, the land reforms until it extends across the former line, the nonriparian owner will not be entitled to claim the whole of it, but can follow it only to the former division line between the two estates, if the effect of such division will be to give the former riparian owner his original water front.

The reason that the authorities on the present question are not agreed in their conclusions seems to be due, in part at least, to the confusion of the common-law rule above referred to, as to the title to submerged land on its reappearance, with the rule as to the right of a riparian owner to accretions. It will be observed that the annotation does not cover such cases as Chicago v. Ward (1897) 169 Ill. 392, 38 L.R.A. 849, 61 Am. St. Rep. 185, 48 N. E. 927; Randolph v. Hinck (1917) 277 Ill. 11, 115 N. E. 182; Chicago Real Estate Bd. v. Mullenbach (1918) 184 Ill. App. 487, and Hughes v. Birney (1902) 107 La. 664, 32 So. 30, which present the question of the ownership of land on its reappearance after it has been submerged, but do not involve the question of the right to follow accretions over former boundary lines.

And the rule that a riparian owner whose land is in part washed away is entitled to new land forming in the same place, only if such land is formed by accretions to the shore line of his remaining land; is supported by some cases not within the scope of the present annotation. For example, see Frank v. Goddin (1906) 193 Mo. 390, 112 Am. St. Rep. 493, 91 S. W. 1057, holding that a riparian owner on a navigable stream, whose title extends only to low-water mark, is not entitled to an island subsequently formed within the old boundaries after a part of his land has washed away. To a similar effect, see Cox v. Arnold (1895) 129 Mo. 337, 50 Am. St. Rep. 450, 31 S. W. 592.

W. H. JOHNSON, Individually and as Guardian of Roy Henry Anderson.

(— Okla. —, 186 Pac. 212.)

Section 4969, Rev. Laws 1910, authorizes and empowers the district court in a divorce action, where the wife sues the husband for divorce, the custody of their minor child, and for permanent alimony, and where the wife is granted a divorce on account of the aggression of the husband, and awarded the exclusive custody of their minor child, and the court awarded to the wife as permanent alimony the undivided one-half interest of the husband in a tract of land owned by them jointly for the support of herself and the minor child, held, that the wife took all the title of the husband in and to said land, and her deed to the same, made to the plaintiffs after said decree became final, conveyed the land to the plaintiffs free from all claims of said minor child for support and maintenance.

ERROR to the District Court for McClain County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Shartel, Dudley, & Shartel, for plaintiffs in error:

The divorce decree entered nunc pro tunc in the case of Anderson v. Anderson vested absolute title in the wife to the real estate referred to therein, and their minor child has no interest therein.

Derritt v. Derritt, — Okla. —, 168 Pac. 455; Warne v. Warne, 36 S. D. 573, 156 N. W. 60; Poloke v. Poloke, 37 Okla. 70, 180 Pac. 535, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 793; Davis v. Davis, — Okla. —, 161 Pac. 190; Simpson v. Simpson, 80 Cal. 237, 22 Pac. 167; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1009; Greenwood v. Greenwood, 96 Kan. 591, 152 Pac. 657.

Johnson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error commenced this proceeding against the defendant in error to reverse the following judgment rendered in the district court of McClain county on the 4th day of March, 1916: "Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that defendant, W. H. Johnson, as guardian of the estate of Roy Henry Anderson, minor child of Della May Anderson, is entitled to the possession of the 4 acres of land sued for herein, and, as guardian of the estate of said minor child, is entitled to the rents and profits on the undivided one-half interest of said lands awarded to Della May Anderson, for the support of herself and minor child, as shown by the order nunc pro tunc ordered on the 17th day of February, 1916, until said minor child reaches the age of twenty-one years, and there is a lien hereby declared to exist on that portion of land in controversy, which the court in said divorce action awarded to said Della May Anderson, for the rents and profits from said land, for the support of said minor child until said child has reached the age of twenty-one years. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that plaintiffs herein pay the costs of this case."

The parties will hereinafter be referred to as plaintiff and defendant as they respectively appeared in the trial court.

The judgment was rendered upon an agreed statement of facts. The essential facts are that the plaintiffs purchased the land in controversy from one Alta Trautwein; that the latter purchased the same from one Della May Anderson, who was at the time the divorced wife of Nels Anderson, and about sixteen months after being divorced; that the Andersons, while husband and wife, acquired title to the land, a deed to which was taken to them jointly.

Mrs. Anderson sued her husband in the district court of McClain county for divorce, for the care and custody of their minor child, and for permanent alimony. In that action the plaintiff was granted an absolute divorce, awarded the custody of the minor child, and a decree for permanent alimony; the same being the land in controversy. That case was docketed in said court as follows: "Della May Anderson, Plaintiff, v. Nels Anderson, Defendant. No. 1108."

On October 24, 1913, the following proceedings were had in said cause:

"At this time the court grants decree of divorce, custody of minor child, injunction against defendant, and gives plaintiff farm in McClain county, grants plaintiff's attorneys judgment against defendant in the sum of $200 attorneys' fees.

"Recorded in Journal 4, page 176, October 24, 1913. W. A. Wilcoxson, Clerk, District Court."

On February 15, 1915, a journal entry in said cause, though not signed by the trial judge, granting the plaintiff an absolute divorce from the defendant, awarding to her exclusive custody of the minor child, Roy Henry Anderson, and perpetually enjoining the defendant from interfering with her in such custody, and after making findings that the defendant was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the land in controversy and that the plaintiff was the owner of the other undivided one-half interest, and that the same was mortgaged for $2,500 in favor of the Alliance Trust Company, made the following order and decree: "It is further considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the defendant's undivided one-half interest in and to the above-described real estate be, and the same hereby is, set aside to and vested in the plaintiff herein, as her own individual property as permanent alimony, and that the defendant be, and he hereby is, divested of any right, title, interest, lien, or estate whatever therein or thereto, and that said defendant be and he hereby is, perpetually enjoined and restrained from claiming or asserting any right, title, interest, lien, or estate in and to said premises or any part thereof adverse to the plaintiff; and it is further considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the plaintiff have judgment against said defendant for the sum of $150 attorneys' fees and for costs of this action."

And thereafter, on March 2, 1916, another journal entry of judgment was filed in said cause wherein the court made findings that the defendant was owner of an undivided one-half interest in the land in controversy, and that the plaintiff was owner of the other undivided one-half interest therein, and that there was a mortgage upon the premises for $2,500 in favor of the Alliance Trust Company, and that the plaintiff was entitled to permanent alimony, an order and decree granting the plaintiff absolute divorce and awarding her the custody of the minor child, and enjoining the defendant from interfering with such custody, and wherein it was further ordered and decreed as follows: "It is further considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the defendant's undivided one-half interest in and to the above-described real estate be, and the same is hereby, set aside to and vested in the plaintiff herein for the support of plaintiff and her minor child, as permanent alimony, and that the defendant be, and he hereby is, divested of any right, title, interest, lien, or estate whatever therein or thereto, and that said defendant be, and hereby is, perpetually enjoined and restrained from claiming or asserting any right, title, interest, lien, or estate in and to said premises, or any part thereof, adverse to the plaintiff; and it is further considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the plaintiff have judgment against said defendant for the sum of $150 attorneys' fees and for costs of this action. And it appearing that through mistake and error said order was not entered of record in the office of the clerk of the district court of said county on the 24th day of February, 1913, and was not contained in the minutes of the judge of said district court on the 24th day of October, 1913, and it appearing to the court that said judgment of the court should be entered of record in the office of the clerk of the district court of McClain county, Oklahoma, as of the 24th day of October, 1913, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the judgment of said court as above set forth, and found by this court now to be the judgment of the said court, be recorded as the judgment of said court as of the 24th day of October, 1913, and that the said record be corrected to and in all things show the rendition, filing, and recording of said judgment of the court as above set forth on the 24th day of October, 1913, the same as if said order as above set forth had been reduced to writing and recorded in full in the office of said district court clerk on the said 24th day of October, 1913. To which judgment of the court applicants James B. Seward and Mary Seward except. Exceptions allowed by the court. James B. Seward and Mary Seward are hereby given ninety days to prepare and serve case made, and W. H. Johnson, guardian, is given ten days to suggest amendments thereto; case to be settled on five days' notice. Supersedeas bond fixed at $100, and forty-five days given in which to give same. F. B. Swank Judge."

From which judgment and decree an appeal was lodged in this court and is still pending, the number of said case upon the docket of this court being No. 8,535. See Seward v. Anderson, — Okla. —, 186 Pac. 215.

The plaintiffs in their brief make eight assignments of error as follows:

"(1) Irregularity in the proceedings of the court, by reason of which plaintiffs in error were prevented from having a fair trial.

"(2) That the judgment and findings of the court were not sustained by the evidence.

"(3) Errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by plaintiffs in error.

"(4) The findings and judgment of the court were contrary to law.

"(5) Were contrary to the evidence.

"(6) Judgment not supported by the evidence.

"(7) Court erred in not rendering judgment for plaintiff.

"(8) The court erred in overruling motion of plaintiff in error for a new trial."

All of which were discussed under one proposition, which is stated as follows: "That the divorce and decree entered nunc pro tunc in the cause of Anderson v. Anderson vested absolute title in the wife to the real estate referred to therein, and their minor child has no interest therein."

In support thereof they say: "In a divorce proceeding, where an absolute decree of divorce is granted the wife on account of the fault of the husband, the court may, under § 4969, Rev. Laws 1910, set aside to vest in the wife as permanent alimony specific real property of the husband and divest him of any interest therein. The correctness of this rule is unchallenged in this proceeding."

Counsel for plaintiffs in error state the controversy involved as follows: "Anderson and wife jointly owned the real estate and premises in controversy at the time of the commencement of the divorce suit hereinbefore referred to, and it is the contention of the plaintiffs in error that by virtue of the divorce decree entered nunc pro tunc the wife was vested with the husband's interest in this property, and that she has a perfect right to convey the same, and her conveyance passed absolute title, whereas, upon the other hand, it is the contention of the defendants in error that under this decree the child has an interest in the rents and profits from this property during its minority; so the sole question presented is the proper construction of the nunc pro tunc decree."

Counsel for the defendants' statement of the controversy involved, as contained in their brief, is substantially the same, as follows: "The principal question involved in this case is whether or not alimony awarded to a wife in a divorce proceeding for the support of herself and minor child can be assigned by the wife alone. Of course, if this court should decide that property awarded to a wife as alimony in a divorce proceeding for the support of herself and minor child is assignable, then this case should be decided in favor of plaintiffs in error, but, on the other hand, if this court should take the view that such property is not assignable, then we take it that it will be the duty of the court to decide this case in favor of defendants in error. This case comes to this court upon agreed statement of facts, and we assume that the court can render such judgment as is proper in the case."

The authority of the trial court in a divorce proceeding to award permanent alimony to the wife out of the property of the husband is by virtue of § 4969, Rev. Laws 1910, which is as follows: "When a divorce shall be granted by reason of the fault or aggression of the husband, the wife shall be restored to her maiden name if she so desires, and also to all the property, lands, tenements, hereditaments owned by her before her marriage or acquired by her in her own right after such marriage, and not previously disposed of, and shall be allowed such alimony out of the husband's real and personal property as the court shall think reasonable, having due regard to the value of his real and personal estate at the time of said divorce; which alimony may be allowed to her in real or personal property, or both, or by decreeing to her such sum of money, payable either in gross or in instalments, as the court may deem just and equitable. As to such property, whether real or personal, as shall have been acquired by the parties jointly during their marriage, whether the title thereto be in either or both of said parties, the court shall make such division between the parties, respectively, as may appear just and reasonable, by a division of the property in kind, or by setting the same apart to one of the parties, and requiring the other thereof to pay such sum as may be just and proper to effect a fair and just division thereof."

This statute has frequently been construed by this court to the effect that it meant what it said. In the case of Johnson v. Johnson, — Okla. —, 179 Pac. 599, wherein the same question as here was involved, the court said: "We think that at the time the judgment was rendered the plaintiff was the equitable owner in fee of the 40 acres of land in controversy, and as such owner had the power to alienate or encumber the same at will, and that the trial court had the power to decree the same to the defendant as permanent alimony and future support for herself and the minor children. Germania Nat. Bank v. Duncan, — Okla. —, 161 Pac. 1077; Jones v. Jones, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917E, 921, 164 Pac. 463; Davis v. Davis,

We think it is clear that, where an award for permanent alimony is made to the wife from the real estate owned by the husband, the entire estate in the land owned by the husband is conveyed to the wife, and that the statute supra does not confer upon the court the power to convey the real estate of the husband to their children. The court, however, by virtue of another section of the statute, has the power to provide for the guardianship, custody, support, and education of the minor children of the marriage, either before or after final judgment in a divorce action. Section 4968 of the statute, supra.

The precise question here involved is: Where such an award for permanent alimony was made to the wife for the support of herself and minor child from the land of the husband, after such judgment has become final, had the wife the power to sell and convey the land? Counsel for the defendant say in their brief: "We do not know of any decisions of the supreme court of Oklahoma that has decided this question."

They take the position that the land is nonalienable by the wife. They cite the case of Fournier v. Clutton, 146 Mich. 298, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 117 Am. St. Rep. 638, 109 N. W. 425, 10 Ann. Cas. 392, as sustaining their contention. In that case the court had ordered that the husband give to the wife as permanent alimony the sum of $1,000, and awarded to her the custody of the minor children. The wife sold the judgment for $200, and afterwards she brought suit, joined by the children, to recover from the party the amount of the award on the ground that decree for alimony is nonassignable. The supreme court of Michigan upheld her contention, and in an opinion by Carpenter, Ch. J., after stating the contention made in the case, said: "The briefs of counsel and my own research have enabled me to find but two cases touching the question of the assign-ability of decrees for alimony, viz.: Re Robinson, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 160, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 986, 51 L. T. N. S. 787, 33 Week. Rep. 17, and Kempster v. Evans, 81 Wis. 247, 15 L.R.A. 391, 51 N. W. 327. Each of these cases holds that such a decree is not assignable. In each of them the alimony assigned was an annuity not yet due. While the circumstances distinguish these decisions from the case at bar, it cannot be said that the reasoning upon which they rest is altogether inapplicable to this case."

Further on in the opinion, and as a basis therefor, the learned judge said: "It is based on the ground, as heretofore stated, that the existence of the right to assign frustrates the purpose of the law that alimony shall be used for the maintenance of the wife, or of the wife and children."

The supreme court of that state, in the case of Greenwood v. Greenwood, 97 Kan. 380, 155 Pac. 807, syl. 2 thereof, stated as follows: "A divorce decree providing that 'there is hereby set apart' to plaintiff 'as her separate estate as and for her alimony,' certain realty to be held by her 'in trust' for her two children until the younger child became of age, 'and at the expiration of said time, or upon the death of both of said children before said time, the title of said property shall vest' in plaintiff 'absolutely and in fee,' being utterly barren of any description of the nature and purpose of the trust, failed to meet the requirements of a declaration of trust."

In that case the supreme court of California is quoted with approval in the case of Simpson v. Simpson, 80 Cal. 237, 22 Pac. 167, wherein it was said: "When, upon a decree of divorce in favor of the wife for extreme cruelty and habitual drunkenness of the husband, the homestead property is awarded to the wife, and the decree declares that the property so awarded to her is to 'be held . . . in trust for her support, and for that of the children of the parties,' no definite or certain trust is created, but an absolute and unlimited estate in the homestead property is transferred to the wife."

A statute of Ohio on the subject is almost identical with ours, and the supreme court of that state, in the case of Herron v. Herron, 47 Ohio St. 544, 9 L.R.A. 667, 21 Am. St. Rep. 854, 25 N. E. 420, construing the statute, wherein the facts are similar to the facts in the instant case, said: "The legal effect upon the allowance was to grant to the wife the entire interest of the husband in the land. It was not necessary that a conveyance should be made, because the decree itself operated as a conveyance, and the title passed to the wife eo instanti. This transfer of title was not by any act of the husband, but by the fiat of the court. Hence it is to the purpose of the court we must look, and not to the purpose of the husband. The decree is not difficult of construction. It explains itself. The title received by the wife was as full and ample as though a conveyance from the husband had been made, and she took a title in fee simple.

. . . We are of the opinion that the decree gives the wife title to the land as a purchaser, and that she stands in regard to the crop of wheat in the attitude of a vendee receiving title and possession from a vendor, without reservation as to the growing crop, and hence the husband had no interest in the crop after the decree, and no right to enter upon the land to gather it."

The agreed statement of facts sets out the chain of title of the land in controversy, showing that the parties claim the same from a common source, and contains the following stipulations: "That the above suit is brought by plaintiffs to recover possession of said 4 or 5 acres of land, the possession of which is held by said W. H. Johnson, and against the will of plaintiffs James B. Seward and Mary Seward; that plaintiffs rely upon their rights to the possession of and title to said land by virtue of their deed from Alta Trautwein, above set forth, and by virtue of a deed executed by Della May Anderson, as above set forth, and by virtue of the orders of the court as above set forth in this stipulation; that W. H. Johnson claims a right to the possession of and title in said land by virtue of being the guardian of said Roy Henry Anderson, a minor, and by virtue of the orders of the court as above set forth. It is further agreed that said W. H. Johnson held possession of said 4 or 5 acres of land as above set forth, adversely, and against the will of plaintiffs herein at the time this suit was filed, and has ever since held said possession. Prior to the commencement of this action plaintiffs demanded possession of said land of defendant, and same was refused."

We think it is clear from a careful examination of the entire record that, by virtue of the orders of the court awarding her as permanent alimony for the support of herself and her minor child, all the husband's interest in the land was conveyed to the wife, and that the trial court erred in the judgment rendered herein decreeing the possession of the 4 acres of land sued for to the defendant, W. H. Johnson, as guardian of the estate of Roy Henry Anderson, and in awarding to the said defendant the rents and profits on the undivided one-half interest of said land, and decreeing a lien upon the same in favor of the defendant until the minor reached the age of twenty-one years.

The cause is therefore reversed, and judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, quieting their title to the land in controversy and for all costs incurred herein.

ANNOTATION.

Right of wife to dispose of property awarded to her as support for herself and child.

Whether a wife may legally dispose of property awarded to her by a decree for alimony, as support for herself and child, depends entirely on the terms of the decree. The question has arisen in but a few cases, and, since the form of the decree has varied in each instance passed on, it is impossible to lay down a general rule.

In Simpson v. Simpson (1889) 80 Cal. 287, 22 Pac. 167, the decision depended on the construction of a decree by which it was ordered that "homestead property hereby awarded to the plaintiff be held by her in trust for her support and for that of the children of the parties to this action." It was held that the court, in rendering the decree, did not intend to create a trust, or to limit or qualify the absolute assignment of the property to the wife. The court said: "Another consideration tending to support the construction here given to the decree is that the law did not authorize the court to assign the homestead or any equitable interest in it to the children, nor to the wife in trust for any purpose; and in the absence of a reasonably clear expression to the contrary, the court must be presumed to have intended to act within the scope of its authority, and not to exceed it. The authority of the court, in actions for divorce, to transfer the property of either party to the other, or otherwise to dispose of it, is purely statutory; and the statute did not authorize the court to create a trust in the homestead or community property, but only to assign it directly to the innocent party 'absolutely or for a limited period.'"

A like construction was, in Greenwood v. Greenwood (1915) 96 Kan. 591, 152 Pac. 657, rehearing denied in (1916) 97 Kan. 380, 155 Pac. 807, given to a divorce decree which provided that the wife should have the custody, maintenance, and education of two minor children, and stipulated that there should be set apart to her as her separate estate, as and for her alimony, a certain described tract of land, to be held by her in trust for her two minor children until the younger should attain her majority, at which time, or on the death of both children before this time, the title to the property should vest in the wife absolutely and in fee. It was held that the decree failed to meet the requirements of a declaration of trust, since the nature and quantity of the children's interests were not defined, and the manner in which the trust was to be performed was not described, and that accordingly the wife had a power of disposal. The court said: "The divorce decree was very indefinite respecting the interests the children were to have in the land. The nature and quantity of their interests were not defined, and the manner in which the trust was to be performed was not described. These are necessary elements in the declaration of a trust, and when the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that they are left in uncertainty, the trust fails."

The same result was reached in Coffey v. Cross (1913) 185 Ala. 86, 64 So. 95, wherein it appeared that the complainant in a divorce proceeding was allowed the value of $5,000 out of the real estate of her husband, "to be laid off and set apart as hereinafter directed, for the maintenance of herself during her natural life, or until she marries again, and for the support of her said child born of the wedlock of complainant and defendant, and, in the event of her death or marriage, the title in said land shall vest in said boy child of complainant and defendant, and in the event of his death, should he die after the death or marriage of his mother, it shall revert to complainant." It was held that by the terms of the decree the wife was vested with the fee-simple title to the land, on condition that, if she died or married before her son's death, the son should take a life estate with remainder to the mother. Likewise in the reported case (SEWARD v. JOHNSON, ante, 645), it is held that a divorce decree providing that the husband's interest in certain land was "vested in the plaintiff herein for the support of plaintiff and her minor child, as permanent alimony," gave a fee to the wife so that her grantee was not chargeable with a claim of the minor for support.

But a contrary view was taken in Arnold v. Arnold (1910) 83 Kan. 539, 112 Pac. 163, rehearing denied in 113 Pac. 147, with respect to a decree of divorce which granted the control and custody of the minor children to the wife during their minority, and further provided that the legal title to the homestead real estate should be vested in the wife "in trust for and to the use and benefit of said children and any that may be hereafter born unto the plaintiff and defendant, or the survivors of them, until the youngest of said children of the survivor shall come to the age of maturity, to be held and used as the home of the plaintiff and the said children until said children or the youngest survivor of them shall come to his majority." It was held that this judgment did not give the title to the mother in fee simple, but gave only the use of the property. The court said: The language of the decree is clear and leaves no room for construction; it vests the legal title in her as trustee for the use and benefit of the children until the youngest shall come to the age of maturity, to be used as a home for her and her children until that time. The trust,

In Bittier v. Myers (1908) 33 Ky. L. Rep. 380, 109 S. W. 1181, it appeared that in a divorce suit the husband was ordered by the decree to convey to the wife for life, with remainder to the children, certain described property. Except by inference, it did not appear that the judgment was agreed to by the parties. At a subsequent term a consent judgment provided for the conveyance of the property to the wife in fee on condition that she release her interest in certain life insurance, the husband agreeing to maintain a certain amount of insurance for the benefit of the children. It was held that the children did not receive a vested interest in the property under the terms of the first judgment, since, under statute, the court did not have the power to make an order for alimony, or for the care and maintenance of the infant children, which, in effect, would divest the husband of the fee-simple title to the property, but that a conveyance by the husband to the wife, pursuant to the consent judgment, vested the fee in the wife; and the minor children, having received no vested interest under the first judgment, and having obtained a greater interest in the life insurance by reason of the consent judgment, which greater interest equaled their interest in the real property, had no valid objection.

The right to assign a money decree for alimony is not within the scope of this note. W. F. F.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Howard O. Durk, for appellant:

The evidence was insufficient to show attempted grand larceny.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was accused by information of the crime of larceny, and upon a trial before a jury was convicted of an attempt to commit the crime of larceny. From the judgment and sentence pronounced upon the verdict she appeals.

The evidence tended to show the following facts: On December 24, 1918, some woman called by telephone the merchandise store of McDougall & Southwick in the city of Seattle, and, representing herself to be Mrs. Edgar Ames, a person whom the employees of the store knew to be the wife of a member of a shipbuilding company of the city named and a credit customer of the store, stated that she desired to purchase and have sent to the wife of a sick employee of the shipbuilding company certain merchandise as a Christmas present. She further stated that the person for whom the goods were intended lived out of the city of Seattle near the town of Kent, and inquired whether delivery could be made to her there. She was informed that the delivery wagons of the store did not go to Kent, but as a special favor to her, if she desired it, a wagon would be sent out to make the delivery on Christmas morning. The woman speaking then said that there was a Miss Ellenberger employed in the office of the shipbuilding company who lived at Kent, and that she thought possibly she might induce her to take the package out to Kent, and would call the store up later and let them know. She then inquired the name of the person speaking, and being given the name, closed the telephone. Later on she again called the store and inquired for the person with whom she had previously talked. On being put in communication with him she informed him that Miss Ellenberger had consented to take the package and would receive it at the interurban depot at 4 o'clock. The person answering for the store was the superintendent, and he desired her to give the place and number of the telephone at which she then was, also her home address, saying he would later put her in communication with the mail order department of the store, from which her order could be more conveniently given attention. She gave her then location as the Y. M. C. A. building, the telephone number of the place from which she was speaking, and the telephone number of her home, but stated that she objected to waiting, as she was very busy and desired to give the order immediately. The superintendent at once recognized that the numbers given were not the numbers of the telephones at the places indicated, but nevertheless put her in communication with another employee of the store, where an order was given for merchandise appropriate for women's wear amounting to $26.10. Both the superintendent and the employee taking the order reached the conclusion that it was not Mrs. Ames who had given the order, and later on Mrs. Ames was called, when the fact was positively ascertained. The goods ordered were packed, and at the appropriate time sent to the depot named by a young man connected with the delivery department of the store. In the meantime the police department of the city was communicated with, and detectives were sent to the depot to arrest the person who should receive the package. When the messenger reached the depot he sought to deliver the package to the station agent. The agent declined to receive it, when the appellant approached the counter, and, to paraphrase the language of the messenger, snatched the package out of his hand. Just then the appellant discovered the presence of the city detectives, when she dropped the package and walked back to a seat in the depot. She was then arrested and taken to the police station. The evidence also goes somewhat minutely into the conduct of the appellant after her arrest, both at the depot and at the police station. This we shall not detail. Its tendency was to connect the appellant with knowledge of the telephone messages given the employees in the store earlier in the day.

It is the appellant's first contention that the evidence fails to connect the appellant with the person who ordered the merchandise over the telephone. There was no direct evidence of the fact, it is true, but the indirect evidence to our minds hardly leaves the matter in doubt. Her conduct at the time of the attempted delivery to the station agent, her subsequent explanations, and her behavior generally, all tended to show that she was either the person who telephoned, or that she had intimate knowledge of the

in name of another.

act and the purpose
sought to be accomplished thereby.

Either conclusion would justify the verdict of the jury.

A further contention is that the facts shown do not constitute an attempt to commit a crime. The argument is that, since the employees of the store were not deceived by the false pretense, and since they did not part with the goods because thereof, there would have been no crime of larceny had the appellant procured the goods from the messenger and carried them away, and that the rule is there can be no attempted crime in cases where there could be no crime if the attempt had been successful. But this argument overlooks the fact that the attempt to deceive by the telephone order is as much a part of the offense as was the attempted taking and asportation of the goods at the depot. Had the ruse succeeded in its entirety, there would have been a consummated offense, and it does not follow from the fact that the employees of the merchandise house were not deceived there is taken away from the transaction the element of attempt to deceive.

failure to deceive owner—
effect.

A further contention is that the court erred in admitting evidence of the telephone conversations, and erred in refusing to strike the evidence on a subsequent motion made to that effect. The objection is that the appellant was in no way connected with the conversations. Our conclusion to the effect that the evidence does sufficiently connect the appellant with the conversations is probably a sufficient answer to the objection, but the evidence was properly admitted in any event. It was a part of the circumstances of the transaction, necessary to an understanding thereof, and as much entitled to be shown as any other circumstances connected therewith. Its probative effect to establish the appellant's guilt depended upon the evidence connecting her therewith, but it was admissible regardless of this question.

As explanatory of the case as a whole it may be proper to add that the offense of obtaining money or property by false pretenses is now denominated larceny by the Criminal Code (Rem. § 2801), and that under the express provisions of the same Code a person informed against for a consummated offense may be convicted of an attempt to commit the offense (id. § 2263).

The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Conversation by telephone as false pretense.

Apparently there is but one case in addition to the reported case wherein a prosecution for obtaining money or property by false pretenses was based on statements alleged to have been made by the accused over the telephone, both cases applying the general rule (see 1 R. C. L. p. 477) that communications made by telephone stand on the same footing as those made face to face provided the identity of the person sought to be charged is shown.

In People v. Ward (1885) 3 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 488, the defendant was charged with fraudulently obtaining by means of false pretense the certification of a bank check. The former cashier of the bank was called as a witness and testified that he called the defendant on the telephone at his office, and over objection he was allowed to relate the substance of the conversation, in which were made the statements on which the prosecution was based. The witness testified that he had conversed over the telephone with the defendant several times before the conversation in question, that he was able to recognize distinctly the defendant's voice, and did recognize it on this occasion. On appeal it was held that this testimony was properly admitted.

To the same effect is the reported case (STATE v. PETERSON, ante, 652), where the defendant was accused of the crime of larceny and was convicted of an attempt. It appeared that she ordered by telephone goods in the name of a credit customer of the store. An employee of the store was allowed to testify to the substance of the telephone conversation, and it is held on appeal that this testimony was admissible, but that its probative force to establish the defendant's guilt depended on the other evidence connecting her with the conversation.

Closely related to the subject under discussion is the case of People v. Andre (1909) 157 Mich. 362, 122 N. W. 98, a prosecution for obtaining goods by false pretenses, wherein the question arose as to the admissibility in evidence of a telephone conversation between the complaining witness and another. It appeared that the defendant had made a false bank statement as to his assets and liabilities, and thereafter referred the complaining witness, from whom he had purchased a bill of goods on credit, to the bank for information. The complaining witness was allowed to relate a conversation which he had over the telephone with a person who represented himself to be the cashier of the bank, in which conversation the complaining witness was informed of the statement made by the defendant to the bank. It was held that this conversation was not admissible to prove that the bank statement had been made, but was competent to prove that the complaining witness received information from an apparently authentic source which might well have influenced his action in selling the goods to the defendant. STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, Respt.,

Homicide — justifiable — prevention of elopement.

1. A man and his son have the right to stop the attempted carrying out of a conspiracy to steal his infant daughter for the purpose of marrying her to a man objectionable to him.

Evidence — homicide — surrounding circumstances.

2. Upon prosecution for homicide, where the defense is that deceased conspired to steal the infant daughter of accused for the purpose of marriage, evidence is admissible as to who brought on the difficulty, the mental attitude of the parties towards each other, and the general circumstances surrounding the killing, showing the conspiracy and that deceased was at the place of the difficulty to carry out the conspiracy.

Homicide — right to prevent interference with elopement.

3. One accompanying an expedition to carry out a conspiracy to steal an infant for the purpose of marrying her to a man objectionable to her father has no right to interfere with members of the family who attempt to prevent the wrongful act.

— defense of son.

4. A man may take life in defense of his son.

[See 18 R. C. L. 836.]

— reasonable doubt.

5. One accused of homicide is entitled to every reasonable doubt on the whole case.

[See 8 R. C. L. 218; 13 R. C. L. 908.]

Jury — placing witness in charge.

6. A witness should not be put in charge of the jury in a criminal case.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Sessions Circuit Court for Orangeburg County (Bowman, J.) convicting them respectively of murder and manslaughter. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wolfe & Berry and Brantley & Zeigler, for appellants:

It is competent to show a conspiracy between one or more parties, whether under indictment or not, if reasonably connected in point of time and place, for the purpose of laying a foundation for the admission of testimony establishing or tending to establish any necessary allegation in the indictment or in the plea.

5 R. C. L. 1087; State v. Ruck, 5 Ann. Cas. 976, note; State v. Thraikill, 71 S. C. 140, 50 S. E. 551; State v. McDaniel, 68 S. C. 304, 102 Am. St. Rep. 661, 47 S. E. 384; State v. Adams, 68 S. The jury should be instructed that, while the plea of self-defense must be made out by a preponderance of the testimony, yet if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt upon the whole testimony, considering both that of the state and of the defense, whether or not such plea has been established by such required preponderance, the defendant must be allowed the benefit of such doubt.

Messrs. Thomas M. Raysor and Adam H. Moss, for respondent:

Testimony of Donnie Barrs was incompetent to establish a conspiracy, and was properly rejected.

The judge is only required to charge the law applicable to the case as made.

State v. Lee, 29 S. C. 118, 7 S. E. 44.

And the judge is not bound to charge the jury all the law which might under any circumstances be applicable, but only such principles as are applicable under the evidence.

State v. Dawkins, 32 S. C. 17, 10 S. E. 772; State v. Hutto, 66 S. C. 449, 45 S. E. 13; State v. Murrell, 33 S. C. 83, 11 S. E. 682; State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 582, 12 S. E. 556.

Even if requests, specifically submitted, presented correct propositions of law, there is no error in refusing to charge them, where the same principles have already been presented to the jury in a general charge.

Mr. E. C. Mann also for respondent.

Watts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were indicted for murder and tried before Judge Bowman and a jury at the May term of the court, 1919, for Orangeburg county. The trial resulted in a verdict of guilty with recommendation to mercy as to Elijah Douglas, and guilty of manslaughter as to Otis Douglas.

After sentence both appealed. The exceptions, 11 in number, raise four questions: First, exclusion of competent testimony. The appellants impute error in excluding the evidence of Donnie Barrs offered on the part of the defendants. The theory of the defense was there was a conspiracy between Sanford and Segrest to "steal" the daughter of Douglas for the purpose of marriage. The evidence shows this daughter was under eighteen years of age, and should have obtained the consent of her father to marry, and was not entitled to obtain a marriage license without his consent. The defendants had the right to have the evidence of this witness, in order that the jury might determine homicide—surrounding cir-

the question as to who brought on the difficulty, and whether or not the defendants were without fault in bringing it on, and as to the mental attitude of the parties one to the other, and to throw light on the general circumstances surrounding the killing, as to whether or not the deceased was engaged in a conspiracy and acting in concert with Sanford, by a prearranged plan, to take the daughter of Douglas away from her father's home in order that she might marry a man whom her father objected to, and to ascertain whether the deceased was casually or designedly at the place where the difficulty occurred, whether he just happened to be there, or whether he was there by prearrangement, all of which the defendants were entitled to have before the jury, to throw light on the general circumstances surrounding the circumstances.

If the deceased was engaged in carrying out an unlawful act by prearrangement and design on his part, acting in concert with the others, going to the house, or near it, after dark, for the purpose of assisting in the elopement of the daughter, under eighteen years of age, for the purpose of marrying her to a man objectionable to the father and without his consent, then the father and son were clearly within their rights in going out to stop it and prevent its accomplishment. It was for the jury to say whether the defendants went out for this purpose and whether or not the deceased stopped them or obstructed them. The evidence shows deceased was beating the son.

From all the evidence in the case no other inference can be drawn; that they did not meet by accident. It was for the jury to say whether or not the deceased was not there by a preconceived agreement with another or others, to assist in an unlawful act. If the son went out to prevent his sister from eloping, and not to raise a row, then he was acting within his rights. If he was obstructed or stopped by the deceased, then it could not be inferred that he brought on the difficulty. He was engaged in a lawful act, and if deceased was there by a preconceived agreement, to assist in participating in an unlawful act, he had no right to obstruct or stop the defendants or either of them. Both defendants, father and son, had the right to prevent the elopement of daughter and sister, and were not to be prevented by strangers engaged in an unlawful act, and, if either were assaulted under the circumstances, they had the right to protect themselves and to protect each other. This exception is sustained.

The second group of exceptions complains of erroneous instructions to the jury, and third, of refusal to charge certain written requests.

The requests refused should have been charged. The jury were clearly entitled to consider the plea of self-defense. If Douglas shot in defense of his son, it is within the province of the jury to pass on that.

A father or son has the right to protect each other. If the son was without fault in bringing on the difficulty, and was assaulted under such circumstances as would justify a person of ordinary prudence and reason in believing he was in immediate danger of loss of life, or receiving serious bodily harm, from which he had no probable means of escape by retreat or otherwise, then, under circumstances of this sort, he has a right to take life. And under similar circumstances the son can kill to protect his father. The defendants were entitled to every reasonable doubt on the whole case, and the requests embodied this principle, and requests to charge were not covered by his Honor's general charge. These exceptions are sustained.

The fourth group of exceptions complains of error in failure to grant new trial because of improper conduct with the jury. We cannot say under all the facts, as brought out, that his Honor was in error. or that putting the witness in charge of the jury in this particular case was prejudicial to the defendants, but such practice generally is not to be commended, but to be condemned.

Jury—placing witness in charge.

In the trial of a case involving human life or any other felony the trial should be conducted in a manner free from wrongdoing, or even a suspicion of wrongdoing. This general rule should prevail. In this case the exceptions are overruled.

Judgment reversed.

Gary, Ch. J., and Gage, J., concur.

Hydrick, J., concurring:

I concur in the result. The first exception should be sustained and the eleventh should be overruled, and I think all the other exceptions should be overruled, because, when considered as a whole, there was no error in the charge which was prejudicial to appellants. Some of the requests were properly refused because they were faulty in statement of the law; others merely restated, in different words, propositions that had been given in requests that had been charged, or in the general charge, and they were properly refused, on the ground, stated by the court, that giving them would tend to confuse the jury.

Fraser, J., concurs.

ANNOTATION.

Homicide or assault in attempting to prevent elopement.

Search has failed to disclose any cases besides the reported case (STATE v. DOUGLAS, ante, 657) strictly within the scope of the title.

The following cases, however, have been cited for their analogy:

A brother has not only the right, but it is his duty, to resort to all reasonable means to prevent his sister, although she is of mature years, from having unlawful sexual intercourse with a man, provided he does not commit a breach of the peace in attempting to prevent them. He does not have the right to use physical force to prevent their cohabitation, unless in his presence and after he has protested. And even in that case he can only use such physical force as is reasonably necessary to prevent the act of sexual intercourse. But the mere fact that his protest or his conduct may be calculated to bring on a difficulty, and actually does have that effect, will not deprive him of the right of self-defense, in case he is in danger of losing his life or suffering serious bodily harm, nor is he bound to retreat, although the difficulty takes place on the land of the deceased. State v. Burdette (1919) — S. C. —, 101 S. E. 664.

A father may protect his minor female child from seduction or debauchery, and, if necessary to prevent the criminal act, may slay the wrongdoer.

If the killing of one man by another is necessary, or apparently so, to a reasonable person, to prevent sexual intercourse by the former with the latter's wife or daughter, the homicide is justifiable. Patterson v. State (1910) 134 Ga. 264, 67 S. E. 816.

In Alberty v. United States (1896) 162 U. S. 499, 40 L. ed. 1051, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864, where it appeared that, prior to the homicide, the deceased had been paying such attention to the defendant's wife that it caused them to separate, it was held that, if defendant found the deceased trying to obtain access to his wife's room in the nighttime, by opening a window, he had the right not only to remonstrate with deceased, but to employ such force as was necessary to prevent his doing so; and, if deceased threatened to kill him, and made a motion as if to do so, and put him in fear of his life, or of great bodily harm, he was not bound to retreat, but had the right to use such force as was necessary to repel the assault.

And it is held in Duncan v. State (1908) 171 Ind. 444, 86 N. E. 641, that a man has the right under the law to prevent by reasonable means, which include apparently physical force if necessary, illicit sexual intercourse with his wife.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of East Baton Rouge (Brunot, J.) in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin the seizure and sale of a certain steamship for taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. Jones Cross, for appellant:

The ship in question did not, by reason of its sinking in the port of Baton Rouge in 1912, and remaining partially submerged, but retaining her identity, become incorporated in the mass of the property of the state so as to become liable for state and local taxation for the years 1915-1917.

Messrs. A. V. Coco, Attorney General, A. J. Thomas, W. Carruth Jones, and Harry P. Sneed for appellees.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, domiciled and residing in St. Louis, Missouri, enjoins the seizure and sale of the steamship Gut Heil for taxes for 1915, 1916, and 1917. The vessel had been rammed and sunk in 1912, and has been lying partially submerged in the Mississippi river since that time, within the parish of East Baton Rouge. Plaintiff became the owner in November, 1916.

Plaintiff claims exemption from taxation for his property under the Federal and state Constitutions, and he alleges irregularities in the assessments thereof.

There was judgment in favor of the defendants, dissolving the preliminary injunction, and the suit was dismissed. Plaintiff has appealed.

The Constitution provides for the taxing of all property, and the revenue statute imposes taxes upon all vessels for which taxes have not been paid at their domicils.

The Gut Heil ceased to be engaged in overseas trade in 1912, when she was rammed and sunk in the Mississippi river. At that time, she became valuable wreckage, owned by German citizens, who subsequently sold her to others; and she finally became the property of the plaintiff.

As the vessel was not engaged in overseas trade at the time it was assessed for taxation, and as it is not alleged or shown that she was registered at any port whatever, or that taxes had been paid thereon in any place, the action of the defendant in assessing the property is not violative of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. The assessment and taxation of her is not an interference with interstate or foreign commerce to any extent.

Until the vessel has been raised and she is engaged in interstate or overseas trade and commerce, which may now be her true condition, she was not exempt from taxation under the amendment of the state Constitution. Act No. 253, p. 38, Ex. Sess. 1917. Only ships engaged in overseas trade and commerce, and domiciled in a Louisiana port, are exempted from taxation under the amendment.

The Gut Heil has not been engaged in commerce since 1912; she has not been a vessel incidentally or temporarily detained in the parish of East Baton Rouge for any cause. Her owners took or sent her there for the purpose of commerce; but after she was sunk and had become a wreck they abandoned their intention of engaging her further in commerce, and they sold the wreck. The present owner bought a wrecked vessel, perhaps with the intention of raising her and engaging her in overseas commerce; but as such wreckage she is subject to taxation, until she is engaged in overseas trade and commerce.

In argument, it was stated that the assessments were supplemental, and that they had been made in the name of an unknown owner for two of the three years, and for all three years on the roll, instead of on separate rolls in 1917. But these matters were not alleged in the petition, and there was no evidence on these points, except, in answer to the question by the counsel for the defendant, "Did you know, at the time she was assessed to unknown owners, who her owner was?" the assessor answered, "I did not."

It is alleged in the petition that the defendant, the tax assessor, "assessed said steamship for the years of 1915, 1916, and 1917, at a valuation of $100,000 for each of said years. . . . That the assessment and levy of said taxes upon said ship are illegal, null, and void because, under the manner in which said assessment and levy have been made by the assessor of the said parish of East Baton Rouge, no review of said assessment had been had; the owner had no opportunity or means of inspection and correction of said assessment and levy; and, particularly, had not published a notice in a newspaper published in this parish that the listing of this property has been completed and the estimated valuation made therein by the assessor, and that said list shall be exposed in the office of the assessor," etc.

Plaintiff offered no evidence in support of these allegations, except to examine the assessor, as on cross-examination; and he testified that the property was listed and valued by him in April, and that the rolls were subsequently submitted to the police jury, sitting as a board of reviewers, who reviewed the assessment rolls for 1917 in his office. The assessor published a notice in the State-Times, a daily newspaper published in the city of Baton Rouge, on Wednesday, May 2, 1917, notifying "all persons liable to taxation" that the assessment rolls had been completed, and that the lists would be exposed in his office for inspection and correction, for a term of twenty days beginning next after ten days' notice shall have expired. All taxpayers were invited to examine the rolls and to test the correctness of the same in a manner prescribed by law.

A similar notice was published in the same paper August 22, 1917, stating that a board of state affairs had officially passed on the assessments for state purposes, and that the rolls were in the assessor's office and open for inspection for twenty days; and taxpayers were notified to examine their assessments prior to meeting of the police jury, sitting as a board of review, the meeting to be held September 11, 1917.

The irregularities in the assessments as set forth in the plaintiff's petition were disproved by the above-referred-to evidence, and the assessments must therefore stand.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed, at appellant's cost.

O'Niell, J., takes no part, having been absent during the argument.

Provesty, J., absent on account of illness, takes no part.

Dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, November 17, 1919 (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 65) — U. S. —, 64 L. ed. —, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 55.

ANNOTATION.

Where wrecked vessel taxable.

The reported case (THOMPSON v. DAY, ante, 660) seems to have been the only one to have determined the situs of a wrecked vessel for purposes of taxation, but the decision therein to the effect that a vessel owned in a foreign country and engaged in transatlantic trade ceased to be a seagoing vessel when wrecked and sunk in Louisiana waters and sold to a local party, but then is simply valuable wreckage which is subject to taxation as the property of the purchaser in the state, is in accord with the general rule that property is taxable in a state when it becomes a part of the mass of property thereof. Likewise, the holding conflicts in no way with the rule that a vessel may acquire an actual situs apart from the place of enrolment and registration or residence of the owner. G. J. C.

Sale — duty to defend action against vendee.

1. The defendant traded a stallion to plaintiff and warranted the animal to be sound. The plaintiff, relying upon defendant's representations and warranty, traded the stallion to a third person, giving his subvendee the same sort of warranty as he had received from defendant. The third party sued the plaintiff for breach of warranty. Plaintiff notified defendant of the suit and requested him to take charge of the defense. Defendant declined. Plaintiff was subjected to a judgment, and in this action seeks recoupment against the defendant. Held, that the defendant was not bound to defend in the action of the third party against the plaintiff, nor is he concluded by its result; his warranty to plaintiff was personal; and he may defend against an alleged breach of his warranty without regard to the consequences which flowed from the suit of the third party on a similar alleged breach of warranty made by plaintiff to his subvendee.

Dawson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action grows out of an alleged breach of warranty in a horse trade.

The plaintiff, Booth, traded a stallion, "Cranmore King," and gave $550 in cash to the defendant Scheer, for a stallion, "Nig," and a breeding jack.

Plaintiff alleged that defendant represented to him that the stallion "Nig" was sound and healthy and suitable for breeding purposes, and that plaintiff relied thereon, but that such representation was false and fraudulent, and that defendant made such statement knowingly and for the purpose of cheating the plaintiff. He further alleged that three days after making this trade, plaintiff, still believing and relying on Scheer's representations, traded "Nig" to one Earl Walters for an agreed value of $400, and in that trade he represented that "Nig" was in good health and sound physical condition. He alleged that "Nig" was not a sound and healthy horse, that he was a windbroken "whistler" of little or no value, and soon thereafter Walters sued the plaintiff for damages on account of the false representation made to him by the plaintiff Booth, and Booth notified defendant of that action and requested him to appear and take charge of the defense. This Scheer failed to do, and Booth hired a lawyer and made a defense, but was defeated, and judgment was entered against him for $250 and interest. Plaintiff prayed for recoupment against Scheer.

Defendant admitted the trade, but denied the misrepresentation, and set up a cross claim for damages on account of alleged false representations of Booth touching the soundness of "Cranmore King."

The jury returned a verdict for $1 in defendant's favor, and answered certain questions:

(1) Was there any change in the condition of health and soundness of the stallion traded by the defendant Scheer, to the plaintiff Booth, from the time the defendant traded such stallion to plaintiff until the plaintiff traded him to Earl Walters?

Answer: No.

(2) Did the defendant represent to plaintiff that the stallion which defendant traded to plaintiff was sound when such trade was made?

Answer: Yes.

(3) Did the plaintiff believe and rely upon such representation as being true when he traded for such stallion?

Answer: Yes.

(4) What, if any sum, do you allow to the defendant by reason of any alleged unsoundness of the horse, "Cranmore King?"

Answer: Nothing.

Special questions submitted by defendant:

(1) Was the wind of the stallion "Nig" sound at the time defendant traded him to plaintiff?

Answer: Yes.

(2) If the wind of said stallion "Nig" was unsound at the time of the trade, did the defendant know it?

Answer: No.

Plaintiff's motion non obstante for judgment on the special findings and admitted facts was sustained, and judgment was entered for plaintiff for the sum he had to pay Earl Walters in the action which Scheer had declined to defend. Defendant's motion for judgment on the verdict was denied.

The defendant appeals. He complains of various matters, but his chief contention is that a warranty of a vendor of personalty does not run with the property, and therefore he was not bound by the judgment which Walters recovered against plaintiff.

The question presented by appellant has not heretofore required much attention in this jurisdiction. In Thisler v. Keith, 7 Kan. App. 363, 52 Pac. 619, Thisler and Schneider sold a stallion to Coder and warranted it to be sound. Coder sold the horse to Keith upon the same warranty. The horse proved to be unsound. Coder assigned to Thisler and Schneider certain notes given by Keith for the horse. They sued Keith on the notes, and he brought a cross action against them for a breach of the warranty which they had given to Coder, and which in similar terms Coder had given to Keith. Keith prevailed three times before a jury, and the late court of appeals summarily ended the controversy, so far as the cross action was concerned, by holding, without discussion, that Thisler and Schneider were not liable to Keith on the warranty of the horse which they had given to Coder.

The general doctrine contended for by appellant seems to be settled in this country.

With certain exceptions like warranties in the sale of staple or trademarked goods (Nixa Canning Co. v. Lehmann-Higginson Grocer Co. 70 Kan. 664, 70 L.R.A. 653, 79 Pac. 141; Roberts v. Anheuser Busch Brewing Asso. 211 Mass. 449, 98 N. E. 95; Conestoga Cigar Co. v. Finke, 144 Pa. 159, 13 L.R.A. 438, 22 Atl. 868; Mazetti v. Armour & Co. 75 Wash. 622, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, 135 Pac. 633, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 140— and some of these cases sound more in tort than in breach of warranty), the rule that warranties run with the property, like covenants concerning real estate or like indorsements on negotiable paper, does not apply in successive sales of ordinary chattel property. See note in 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1111. There is no privity of contract between the vendor in one sale and the subvendees of the same property in subsequent sales. Although the warranty may be couched in the same terms in each successive sale, the obligation of the warrantor in each sale is personal to his own vendee, and it is no concern of the warranting vendor that his vendee may have been subjected to liability by a reiteration of the same warranty in a later sale of the property. Each seller is liable for his own contract and to the extent thereof, but that alone will not determine his prior vendor's obligation to him. Every succeeding vendor takes the chances on his own warranty; and he may, without having those chances foreclosed, decline to concern himself with litigation which arises between his vendee on a similar independent warranty given by the latter to a subsequent vendee. Smith v. Moore, 7 S. C. 209, 24 Am. Rep. 479; Smith v. Williams, 117 Ga. 782, 97 Am. St. Rep. 220, 45 S. E. 394. On the general doctrine that a warranty upon the sale of personal property does not run with the property, but that each reiteration of the warranty is a merely personal, independent obligation between each warrantor and his personal vendee, and creates no obligation on the part of the original warrantor to subsequent vendees, see Nelson v. Armour Packing Co. 76 Ark. 352, 90 S. W. 288, 6 Ann. Cas. 237; Van Winkle v. Wilkins, 81 Ga. 93, 105, 12 Am. St. Rep. 299, 7 S. E. 644, 24 R. C. L. 159, 161.

Sale—warranty
mote grantee.

In 35 Cyc. 370, the rule is stated: "Ordinarily a warranty is addressed to some particular person, and the buyer alone can avail himself thereof. A warranty on the sale of personalty does not run with the property, and assignees of or purchasers from the buyer cannot avail themselves thereof as against the original seller, unless the assignee or purchaser assumes payment of the original purchase price, or the warranty is specifically assigned to the second purchaser, or by a usage of the trade a warranty inures to the benefit of subsequent purchasers."

In our examination of the law of this case we have noted traces of a doctrine that a warranty of title sometimes runs with personal property (Boyd v. Whitfield, 19 Ark. 447, and citations therein; 23 Cyc. 1272), but we have not pursued that inquiry, as we have only to consider a warranty of soundness.

The soundness of a horse is so much a matter of opinion, and is so easily affected by change of care, or change of work, or of feed, water, or weather,—surely this does not yet need to be elaborated, for the generation of lawyers and judges who are also experienced horsemen has not yet vanished,—that it would never do to extend or apply the doctrine of warranties of title, if that doctrine be well founded, to warranties of soundness to run with so changeable a form of property as a stallion.

From the foregoing it is clear that the fact that the plaintiff was subjected to a liability on his personal, independent warranty to his sub-vendee is not a controlling circumstance in this action against the defendant, on the warranty of the latter to plaintiff. The jury's special findings show that the stallion "Nig" was sound at the time defendant traded it to plaintiff; consequently defendant's personal warranty to plaintiff was not breached, and hence defendant has incurred no liability. That another jury, in another case, on facts which were presumably the same, came to a different conclusion as to the soundness of the stallion, is one of the mischances which attend the affairs of a workaday world where men do not always see alike.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment for defendant.

Mason, J., concurring specially:

I agree that a warranty of quality given by the vendor on a sale of chattels does not run with the property. That is, a buyer from the vendee cannot recover from the original vendor on such warranty, whether or not he received a similar warranty from his immediate vendor. But that does not seem to me to decide the question in controversy.

A warranty of title to personal property does not run with the property. 24 R. C. L. 159. That is, a buyer from the vendee cannot successfully sue the original vendor on his warranty, whether or not he received a similar warranty from the person from whom he purchased. But the recognized rule appears to be that, if the buyer of personalty under such a warranty is sued by one claiming a superior title, and loses, the vendor is concluded by the judgment, if he was given notice and an opportunity to defend. 23 Cyc. 1272, 1273; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 743; 24 R. C. L. 233; 15 R. C. L. 1019. The only reason that I find given by courts for not following the same practice with respect to warranties of quality is that a change in that respect might have taken place between the two sales. Smith v. Moore, 7 S. C. 209, 24 Am. Rep. 479, cited in the opinion, and Morgan v. Winston, 2 Swan, 472. In the present case, however, it was specifically found that there had been no such change. It may be that the fact that ordinarily a change of condition would be involved is a sufficient reason for not applying the rule at all in this situation; or the reason may be that in the nature of things it is only in regard to title and related matters that a warranty implies an obligation to defend. I concur in the result with some doubt, but cannot see that the problem is solved by saying that the warranty does not run with the property.

ANNOTATION.

Judgment against seller of chattels for breach of warranty as conclusive upon prior warrantor.

In general.

It is a general rule that warranties relating to the quality, condition, or soundness of chattels or goods do not inure to the benefit of subsequent purchasers of the property, but they are personal to the warrantee. Cases of this character are not within the scope of the note, and it is not exhaustive of such cases. The following are referred to as supporting this rule:

Warranty of soundness, condition, quality, etc.

It follows that since warranties of soundness, condition, quality, etc., of goods or chattels are personal to the warrantee, if he subsequently sells the property and gives a similar warranty, and is sued for a breach thereof, he cannot cast the burden of the defense upon his warrantor, and if judgment is rendered against him in such action it is not conclusive against the warrantor, and the latter may show that at the time the property left his possession it complied with the warranty. This is the holding of the reported case (BOOTH v. SCHEER, ante, 663).

It is also the holding of Morgan v. Winston (1852) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 472, a case very similar as to facts to the preceding case. The case involved a warranty of the soundness of a slave. The purchaser having sold the slave with a similar warranty, a judgment was rendered against him for the breach of this latter warranty. In a subsequent action upon the original warranty, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to introduce in evidence the record of the judgment recovered against him. The court said that evidence of this judgment was not evidence against the defendant to prove that the slave was unsound at the date of the warranty; nor, that fact appearing by proof aliunde, was it the measure of damage to which the plaintiff was entitled. For the disease at those different periods of time might not have been the same, or continuous, and if it were, the defendant was not notified and required to defend. It will be noted that this case goes further in extending the rule than the BOOTH CASE, which merely holds that the judgment against the original purchaser was not conclusive in an action by the original buyer against the person from whom he purchased the property. The Morgan Case holds that the judgment rendered against the original purchaser upon the subsequent warranty which he gave when he sold the property was not admissible in evidence in his behalf, in an action by him for a breach of the warranty given when he purchased.

In Ft. Worth Grain & Elevator Co. v. Walker Grain Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 168 S. W. 470, it appeared that a car of grain was sold under a warranty as to quality; the seller purchased a car with a similar warranty, to fulfil the sale. Upon being sued for a breach of this warranty, he set up these facts, and asked that the person from whom he purchased be made a party thereto, and that, if judgment were rendered against him on the subsequent warranty, judgment be rendered over against such additional party on the original warranty; the additional defendant, or interpleaded defendant, appeared in the action and made a defense; judgment was, however, rendered against both defendants, the judgment being separate as to each warranty. The original buyer having settled by compromise with the person to whom he sold, the original seller, having refused to enter into the compromise and having appealed from the judgment against him, and being cast upon this appeal, was held not entitled to the benefit of the favorable compromise made by the purchaser, but to be liable for the entire amount of the judgment originally awarded against him, with interest, costs, etc.

Warranty of title.

It has been held that the seller of personal property is bound to make good to the purchaser his losses resulting from breach of the implied warranty of title; hence, if the purchaser of any subsequent vendee is sued in replevin or trover, or in any action involving the question of title, and he gives notice to his vendor of the pendency of the action and its nature, a judgment rendered against the original purchaser is conclusive evidence against him. If, however, no notice is given, it is not conclusive against him, and he may show that the original purchaser, in a suit against him on his warranty, ought not to recover the amount paid, because the previous case was not properly defended, and judgment was suffered unnecessarily. Thurston v. Spratt (1863) 52 Me. 202. The court said: "It can make no difference that there are intermediate purchasers and that the suit is against the last one, if the question of title is the sole matter in controversy. . . . The law will not tolerate a succession of long lawsuits to determine, as in this case, the title to a single horse, in all of which precisely the same issue is to be tried, when all the parties have had due notice and an opportunity to defend. It requires that every warrantor who is notified shall act at once in defending himself, or in aiding the party sued to defend the action. This is the rule in real actions. . . . Where there is a succession of transfers, and judgment against the last holder, and notices to all the vendors, it may be competent for the first, or any seller, to show that the defect in the title arose after he sold the property, and that therefore he had no interest in the determination of the question tried. However this may be, the defect in the case before us was in the title of the defendant. That was the only question in issue. He was notified and did nothing to aid in the defense. This case illustrates the wisdom of the rule. After being notified, he stands by and keeps to himself the facts which he now says would show a right in him to sell the property. If he had disclosed them or testified to them at the trial, the result might have been different. He allows a final judgment to pass, by which the other innocent purchasers lose the property and damages and costs, and now asks to be allowed to prove them, when it is too late for his vendee to use them in his defense."

A case, which may be of some interest in this connection, although it was a sale of standing timber, is Rust Land & Lumber Co. v. Wheeler (1911) 111 C. C. A. 53, 189 Fed. 321. In this case the purchaser notified the seller of a suit against him, involving the title to the timber, and requested him to defend the suit. This request was acceded to, but the defense was unsuccessful, and judgment was rendered against the purchaser. Under these circumstances it was held that the judgment against the purchaser was conclusive upon the seller in a subsequent action by the purchaser against him upon his warranty of title. A. G. S.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County, in Chancery (Chester, J.) dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendant from building a garage upon the rear of certain premises alleged to have been leased to plaintiff, and from further interfering with plaintiff's rights as tenant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Benjamin & Betzoldt, for appellant:

A description of premises in a lease of a building by the street number includes so much of the lot upon which the building is situated as is necessary to the complete enjoyment of the building for the purposes for which it was let, and nothing more.

If all the other tenants, occupants of the terrace, including defendant, were tenants in common of the entire land in the rear of the entire terrace, then no one of the cotenants would have the right to exclusively occupy any portion of the common property; neither would he have the right to erect any buildings or structures on any or part of the common property, without the consent of all the other cotenants.

Messrs. Lodge & Brown for appellee.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of complaint herein was filed to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from building a garage upon the rear of certain premises, alleged to be leased to the plaintiff; also, to restrain defendant from interfering with, molesting, or removing any wood or other materials that plaintiff might put on the premises involved, for his own personal use, that would not interfere with the use of said premises by other tenants. The plaintiff is the tenant and occupant of the house and premises known as 145 Harper avenue, Detroit, under and by virtue of a written lease for five years from the 1st day of April, 1916, wherein Walter W. Smith was the lessor and the plaintiff was lessee. The defendant has succeeded to the rights of Smith in the premises. The written lease contains the following by way of description of the premises: "The following described premises situated and being in the city of Detroit, county of Wayne, and state of Michigan, to wit: House No. 145 Harper avenue, . . . for the term of five years from and after the 1st day of April, 1916, on the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned, to be occupied for a rooming house."

"(8) Your petitioner further shows that for the purpose of his home, and in order to supply fuel for next winter, he has caused certain green wood to be piled up temporarily, to dry, along the easterly line of said premises, and east of the cement walk which your petitioner has to go to and from said alley, and that said William H. McCormick, the present owner, defendant herein, now claims that your petitioner has no right to leave said wood there, or to use the back yard of said premises, and has removed some of the wood of your petitioner from off the rear end of said lot, or court.

"(9) Your petitioner further shows that the said William H. McCormick, in derogation of your petitioner's rights as a tenant, has torn down the easterly and rear fence, has cut down certain shade trees, and, against the express objection and protests of your petitioner, is proceeding to build a large garage on the rear of said lot, which will occupy more than 400 square feet, and will thereby deprive your petitioner of the use of 400 square feet of said small back yard or court which now exists, and that if the said William H. McCormick is permitted to build said garage it will interfere with the quiet and peaceful possession of your petitioner, and will cut off the enjoyment of a large portion of the present back yard, to which he is lawfully entitled, which loss cannot be fully compensated in damages, and which would be irreparable."

The defendant, by his answer, virtually admits the acts above charged, but claims that the same were not in derogation of any of plaintiff's rights, and denies that plaintiff has acquired any rights by reason of said acts.

The testimony was taken in open court, and the bill of complaint was dismissed; the decree stating that the defendant have power and authority to proceed with the erection of the structure in said bill of complaint mentioned, allowing plaintiff access to the alley in the rear of said premises by the 4-foot way mentioned in said proofs.

A diagram of the premises, known as Exhibit 2, hereto appended, will aid in an understanding of the situation:

The house leased and occupied by plaintiff is on the easterly end of a terrace of houses situated on the corner of Brush street and Harper avenue, and there are three separate and distinct houses on the terrace facing on Harper avenue and one facing on Brush street. The width of the house, No. 145, is 30 feet. The other three houses in the terrace are occupied by the defendant for rooming-house purposes, and in the rear of No. 145 there is a cement walk that goes direct from the kitchen door to the alley on the north. This sidewalk is used exclusively by the plaintiff and the occupants of his house. There is another cement walk on Brush street that comes around the rear for the accommodation of the other three houses, including the one on Brush street. The other tenants in the terrace do not use any portion of the lot in the rear of the terrace east of the line, if it were extended 24 feet from the east line of the lot. Plaintiff has used exclusively the entire east 24 feet of the lot in the rear of No. 145 Harper avenue. He does not use the other portion of this lot west of the 24-foot line. Plaintiff's business is that of a cement paving contractor, and he had been in the habit of storing, for a short time, wheelbarrows, etc., on the rear of the lot, in what he claimed was his portion thereof. He also piled green wood on the rear end of the lot, between the sidewalk and fence on the east line, and would leave it there until it got dry, and then would put it in the basement of No. 145. Referring to the wood, plaintiff testified as follows: "This spring I had some wood piled on the rear end of this lot, between the sidewalk and the fence, a space of about 4 feet east of the sidewalk. It was green wood sawed in 2-foot lengths for the grate. I put it there until it got dry, and then I put it in the basement. While that wood was there, Dr. McCormick asked me to remove it. I did not remove it, and the doctor started some proceedings in the circuit court commissioners' court, and from that court it has been appealed to the circuit court."

He further testified that the defendant interfered with and removed some of the wood which the plaintiff had piled there. The full width of the rear end of the lot on the alley on the north is 24 feet. The defendant tore down the fence upon the alley upon the east side near the northeast corner of the premises, and had brought material, and had taken steps to erect a garage 20x20, intending to set it back some 8 or 10 feet from the alley line, and directly over the cement walk used by the plaintiff in carrying garbage to his garbage can, which was kept in the alley in the rear of the premises. As soon as the plaintiff found that the defendant had torn down the fence and put some building material upon the premises, preparatory to building the garage, this bill was filed, and a temporary injunction was obtained.

The defendant testified as follows: "My plans contemplate a garage 20x20 in the northeast corner of the lot. That will leave 4 feet up to my line on the west side of the garage. It is vacant beyond that to the side for 35 feet. Then I will have to set in a little from the alley because it is a narrow alley. I plan to deflect this cement walk where it comes to the garage, and build it around the front of the garage, and then at the side, so that the tenant in 145 will have access to the alley the same as before. The distance from the front of the garage to the back end of the house is 42 feet; that would leave the plaintiff still 42 feet of back yard for clotheslines."

He estimated that setting the garage back 8 feet from the alley would make the space occupied 28x20, or 560 square feet. The defendant testified that that would leave ample room between the garage and the back end of No. 145.

The plaintiff has appealed, and it is claimed that, both as to the interference with the wood which he had piled east of the cement walk, and with reference to the garage proposed to be built over the walk, he is entitled to injunctive relief, and that the court erred in dismissing the bill of complaint.

Counsel upon both sides of the case have cited numerous authorities from other jurisdictions. We are of the opinion that the law of the case is substantially settled by the recent case of Kuschinsky v. Flanigan, 170 Mich. 245, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 430, 136 N. W. 362, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1228. That was a case of leasing by the street number, and it was held that it included so much of the lot upon which the building was situated as was necessary to the complete enjoyment of the building for the purpose for which it was let, and nothing more.—citing 24 Cyc. 1044.

Upon the subject of description of premises, see also Nowicki v. Kopalczak, 195 Mich. 678, 162 N. W. 266.

It is the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff, having leased 145 Harper avenue, did not lease the building and its appurtenances, but only the house. He contends: "He therefore had no right to anything but the house, and he has not been denied any right in the occupancy of the house."

We think this is too narrow a view of the matter. There was testimony offered and received tending to show the understanding of the parties independent of the written lease. We think evidence could of the lease. The intent of the parties is to be found by an examination of the lease. There ought not to be much question about the law that should govern this case, for defendant's counsel say: "We accept counsel's statement of the law applicable to this case. The general rule is that a description of premises in a lease of the building by the street number includes so much of the lot upon which the building is situated, as is necessary to the complete enjoyment of the building for the purpose for which it was let, and nothing more."

Defendant's counsel contend, however, that a different rule should be applied to a rooming house from that of a dwelling house. It is very apparent that a rooming house in Michigan climate must be heated, as well as a dwelling house. We think the use of the portion of the back yard between the cement walk and the east line of the premises might lawfully be used by the plaintiff for the purpose of piling wood to be seasoned for use. That was, in our opinion, necessary to the complete enjoyment of the building for the purpose for which it was let.

We think that plaintiff was also entitled to the unobstructed use of the cement walk extending from the rear of No. 145 to the alley, for the purposes of ingress and egress, and for the purpose of removing garbage, and other like uses; and when the defendant proposed to build a garage over the cement walk, thus interfering with access to the alley, he encroached upon the plaintiff's rights as a tenant.

It is true that the defendant testified that he planned to deflect this cement walk where it comes to the garage, and built it around the front of the garage and then at the side, so that the tenant would have access to the alley the same as before. There is no claim by defendant that this has been done. We are of the opinion that the plaintiff will have no just cause to complain of the garage when such proposed cement walk is built around the south and west sides of the garage to the alley.

lord to use yard for garage.

Until that is done, the plaintiff has a right to have the defendant restrained. We think the decree below should be reversed; and instead of dismissing the bill, we think the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with, or molesting or moving, any wood that the plaintiff may put on the east side of the cement walk for the purposes described; and that such piling does not in any manner interfere with the use of said back yard or court by the other tenants in the terrace.

We are also of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from erecting the garage at the place mentioned, until such time as he shall have built upon the south and west sides of the proposed garage a walk to the alley. When that is done so that the plaintiff has access to the alley over the cement walk, we think the injunction as to the garage should be dissolved, as the same would not materially interfere with the covenant for peaceable possession contained in the lease.

The decree below will be reversed, and a decree prepared in accordance with this opinion, with costs of both courts to the plaintiff.

ANNOTATION.

Property included in a lease of premises described by street number.

Cases are not generally included in the present annotation, where, although there may have been a reference to the street number, there were other descriptive clauses which constituted the ground of the decision.

In accord with the reported case (MEREDITH v. McCORMICK, ante, 669), supporting the rule that a lease of a house by a street number includes only so much of the lot upon which the building stands as is necessary for the complete enjoyment of the building for the purpose for which it is let, are: Patterson v. Graham (1892) 140 Ill. 581, 30 N. E. 460; Hesher v. Hestermann (1895) 58 Ill. App. 265; and Kuschinsky v. Flanigan (1912) 170 8 A.L.R.—43.

In Patterson v. Graham (Ill.) supra, the lessee of a building by street number, for use as a music store, claimed the right to the use of a passageway in the rear of the building. It was held that, since the lease did not in terms convey any right to such use; nor give the tenant any right whatever to that part of the lot in the rear of the building, all that could be claimed was that, by construction, the lease conveyed so much of the lot on which the building stood as was necessary to the complete enjoyment thereof for the purpose for which it was rented; and that whether the passageway, or any part of the lot in the rear, was so necessary was a question of fact, as to which the decision of the lower court was final.

But a demise of premises, by street numbers of residences which form the main or principal feature of the lease, has been held to include stables situated in the rear of the lot on which the residences stand. Armstrong v. Crilly (1893) 51 Ill. App. 504, affirmed in (1894) 152 Ill. 646, 38 N. E. 936.

But the doctrine of the case last cited was held in Hosher v. Hestermann (1895) 58 Ill. App. 265, supra, not applicable to a corner lot in the business portion of a large city, occupying a considerable frontage on two streets and occupied by both business and dwelling houses separate and distinct from each other, and fronting on different streets. Under those circumstances, the rule first stated was held to apply. It was specifically held that a lease of a saloon building by street number, located on a corner lot, did not include an unoccupied structure formerly used as a blacksmith shop, separated by a few feet from the rear of the saloon, on the same lot but fronting on the other street, the shop never having been used in connection with the saloon, and being known by another number.

In Kuschinsky v. Flanigan (Mich.) supra, it was held that a lease of a dwelling house by a street number, standing on a lot on the rear of which was a barn, with no opening into the lot, but between which and the dwelling was a vacant space 40 by 30 feet, carried with it the vacant portion of the lot.

It was said in Houghton v. Moore (1886) 141 Mass. 437, 6 N. E. 517, that when a house or building is described in a lease by a number over the outside doors on a street, the inference is that a building is intended access to which is had by these doors from that street. In this case the lessor had acquired by separate deeds a parcel of land on a street corner, and another parcel adjoining it in the rear; before he bought these parcels a building had been erected on them with a solid brick partition wall on the lot line extending from cellar to roof, the entrance to and the numbers of the two portions of the building being on different streets; before granting the lease, he had removed the partition wall on the first floor, but otherwise the wall remained intact. It was held that the separate character of the two parts of the building above the first story remained unimpaired, and that a lease of the "building," described by the street number of the corner part, did not include the upper stories of the other part of the building, which were accessible only from the other street.

Although basing its decision on other grounds, the court in Chesebrough v. Pingree (1888) 72 Mich. 438, 1 L.R.A. 529, 40 N. W. 743, expressed the opinion that a lease which designates the property as a certain building, describing it by street and number, is a lease for the whole premises, and not for the building alone, where the building covers the land, and the exclusive possession of the land is necessary to the enjoyment of the demise.

And in the syllabus by the court in Snook & A. Furniture Co. v. Steiner (1903) 117 Ga. 363, 43 S. E. 775, it is said that where there is nothing to indicate an intention to limit the possession to buildings, the lessee of city premises described by street numbers takes an interest in the yard, garden, subjacent land, and appurtenances. Both this and the preceding case involved the question of the rights of the parties after the buildings were destroyed by fire.

A lease of "house No. 324" on a certain street was held in People ex rel. Murphy v. Gedney (1877) 10 Hun (N. Y.) 151, to be not limited merely to the land covered by the house, but to include an alleyway extending to a side entrance and to the rear, and separated from the adjoining lot by a fence. The court said: "The piece of ground constituting the alleyway was inclosed with the house by a high board fence, and was in the possession of [the lesser]; it was occupied in part by the stoop leading to the side door of the house, and by a walk of flagging extending to the gate on the street, and it appears without dispute to have been pointed out to the lessee as a part of the demised premises. There seems to be no doubt that, by the grant or demise of a house, the curtilage, or garden, will pass without the words, 'with the appurtenances,' added. The curtilage is the courtyard in the front or rear of a house or at its side, or any piece of ground lying near, inclosed and used with the house and necessary for the convenient occupation of the house. . . . It was competent to prove the statement of the landlord, made at the time of pointing out the demised premises, for the purpose of identifying the subject of the lease."

So in Okie v. Person (1904) 23 App. D. C. 170, where the lease was of "premises No. 3219 U street," it was held that, as the subject-matter of the lease was a dwelling house situated in the midst of a comparatively large tract of land, there was a latent ambiguity as to the extent of the premises, which parol evidence was admissible to explain.

And parol evidence was held admissible in Cary v. Thompson (1860) 1 Daly (N. Y.) 85, to show that a lease of houses by street number was intended by the parties to include a back yard on which woodsheds were erected. The situation is thus stated in the opinion: "In the rear of each of the houses was a small yard, extending back about 12 feet and running across the whole width of each lot, and in the rear of this, again, was another yard, extending back about 20 feet, and extending across the width of the lots. In the first yards the privies were placed; in the second, there were woodhouses and posts for clotheslines, and there was an open entrance or passageway between the first and second yards. The plaintiff offered to show that, before he leased the premises, the defendant pointed out to him the woodhouses in the second yard as used by the tenants or occupants of the houses which he afterwards leased." The court held this and other evidence to a similar effect admissible to show the intention of the parties as to the property included in the lease.

In Crabtree v. Miller (1907) 194

Mass. 123, 80 N. E. 225, holding that a covered "court" between a theater building and a hotel, situated on adjacent lots and belonging to the same owner, was not included in a lease of the hotel, the decision was based, not on any rule as to what property is included in a lease by street number, although the premises were so described, but upon the construction of the descriptive clause which followed the description by number.

So, the construction of other descriptive clauses in the lease, rather than the mere street number of the leased property, seems to have been the basis of the decision in Morris v. Kettle (1898) 56 N. J. Eq. 826, 34 Atl. 376, 42 Atl. 1117, where the lease was of the "house and premises" in a certain city, known or designated by a certain street number, and "all the buildings, outhouses, and premises of said place, with the appurtenances." The number given in the lease corresponded to a small lot on which a house had been built, covering practically the entire lot; west of it was another lot upon which were outhouses used by the occupants of the former lot; and east of the latter was a vacant lot,—all being the property of the lessor. In the absence of clear proof that the lessor intended to include the vacant lot to the east, the court refused to reform the lease so as to include it.

And where a corner store 15 by 45 feet, occupying part only of a building belonging to the lessor, was leased, but in addition to the street number the descriptive part of the lease stated that the store had a frontage of 15 feet "and a uniform depth of 75 feet," the question arose in Blair v. Wessinger (1919) — Cal. App. —, 178 Pac. 545, whether a store 15 by 15 feet in the rear of that described in the lease by street number, in the same building, but numbered on the other street, was included in the terms of the lease. It was held that there was an extrinsic ambiguity which might be explained by parol evidence; and that in this case the evidence supported a finding that the smaller store was not included in the lease.

Cases like Riddle v. Littlefield

(1873) 53 N. H. 503, 16 Am. Rep. 338, holding that the lease of a store by street number gave the lessee the right to control the use of the exterior wall, and that he, and not the lessor, might use it for advertising purposes, either to advertise his own goods or to hire it to others for the posting of bills, are not within the scope of the note.

Lowe v. Pioneer Threshing Co. 70 Fed. 646.

Matthias, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding in quo warranto was instituted in the court of appeals of Jefferson county. It was charged that the defendants usurped and lawfully held and exercised the offices of directors of the Bertram Coal Mining Company, and that they assumed to do and perform all and singular the duties pertaining to said offices, to the exclusion of Samuel C. Bigger, E. Rowland Cole, Isaac D. Barricklow, William Johnson, and Charles M. Barger, under the claim that they had been duly elected as such directors and as successors in office of the persons just named.

Issue of the validity of the election of said defendants as such directors was made by answer, and upon hearing was determined by the court of appeals favorably to the defendants, and plaintiff's petition was dismissed. This proceeding in error is prosecuted to reverse that judgment.

The Bertram Coal Mining Company is an Ohio corporation, having its principal office and place of business in the village of Smithfield, Jefferson county, Ohio. The regulations adopted by the stockholders designate the first Monday in October of each year, at 2 o'clock, as the time, and its office at Smithfield, Ohio, as the place, for the annual meeting of the stockholders, and authorize special meetings to be held upon the call of the board of directors, or by the stockholders. The regulations further provide that the number of directors shall be five, and the election thereof held annually at the annual meeting of the stockholders, or at a special meeting called for that purpose; that the term of office shall be one year, and the directors shall hold office until their successors are elected and qualified. They further provide that a written or printed notice of every regular or special meeting of the stockholders, stating the time and place thereof, and, in case of special meetings, the object thereof, shall be given to the stockholders by mailing the same to the last known address ten days before such meeting, "provided, however, no failure or irregularity of notice of any meetings shall invalidate the same or any proceeding thereat."

The persons above named were elected directors of the corporation in September, 1917, and because of no election being called or held in October, 1917, they continue to hold office.

On September 27, 1918, said board of directors adopted a resolution attempting to postpone the annual meeting of the company to October 28, 1918, and notified the stockholders thereof. Ignoring the action of the board of directors, stockholders representing a majority of the stock, and constituting a quorum as provided by the regulations of the corporation, met at the time and place provided by such regulations for the annual meeting, October 7, 1918, and elected the defendants as directors of said corporation. On October 28, 1918, the date to which the directors had attempted to postpone the annual meeting of the corporation, it is conceded that a quorum was not present, and no election of directors was had or attempted. It is claimed by the relator that failure to give notice of the annual election invalidated the election of the defendants as directors, and that because of the fact that no quorum was present on October 28th the old directors continue in office.

This action in quo warranto is based upon the contention that the election of the defendants as directors was illegal, because the annual meeting had been postponed to a subsequent date by resolution passed by the board of directors, and because a notice in writing was not given the stockholders that such election would be held at the time and place fixed therefor by the regulations of the company. Under the provisions of our statute (Gen. Code §§ 8701 et seq.), regulations for the government of corporations are adopted by the stockholders, and can be changed or amended only by the method prescribed. The directors of a corporation may adopt by-laws for their government, but they must be consistent with the regulations of the corporation. They have no power to amend those regulations. It follows that the resolution of the board of directors, whereby it was attempted to postpone the date of the annual meeting,

Corporations
—annual meeting—directors'
control over.

which was definitely fixed in the regulations adopted by the stockholders, and which conferred no authority upon the directors relative thereto, was wholly invalid, and the stockholders were therefore justified in disregarding it. The shareholders, not the board of directors, constitute the corporation.

As we have seen, the time and place of the annual meeting and the business to be transacted, to wit, the election of directors, was precisely fixed and stated in the regulations of the corporation, and, unless further action was required by the regulations, this was sufficient notice to the stockholders of such meeting and the purpose thereof. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 3d ed. § 594.

The regulations do make provision for notice, but also provide that "no failure or irregularity of notice of any meetings shall invalidate the same or any proceeding thereat." Hence the requirement as to notice was not mandatory, and where there is no claim or suggestion of fraud or deception the election of directors under circumstances such as are disclosed by the record will not be held invalid because no written notice was given, and that is especially true in view of the fact that the former directors, who owned substantially half of the outstanding stock, and in behalf of whom this action seems to have been instituted, had actual knowledge that the annual meeting and election was proceeding in accordance with the regulations which they had assumed authority to annul.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Power of directors to change time for regular meetings of stockholders.

The power of the directors of a corporation to change the time for the regular meetings of the stockholders is exhaustively discussed in 2 A.L.R. 558. With the exception of the reported case, no recent case appears to have considered this proposition.

In the reported case (STATE EX REL. CARPENTER v. KREUTZER, ante, 676) it appears that the regulations adopted by the stockholders of a corporation provided that the annual meeting of the stockholders should be held on the first Monday in October. Prior to the time for an annual meeting, the corporate directors notified the stockholders that the annual meeting would be postponed until October 28th. A majority of the stockholders, however, ignored this action of the directors, and on the day appointed by the corporate regulations elected the defendants as directors. An action in quo warranto was then brought, it being alleged that the election of the defendants was illegal, as the meeting had been postponed. The court holds that the board of directors had no power to postpone the annual meeting, and hence that the defendants were legally elected as directors. E. C. B.

v.

R. E. ODEN, Sheriff of Allen Parish.

(143 La. 718, 79 So. 287.)

Carrier — pass — public officer — policy.

1. It is against the public policy and the law of the state for public officers to accept or receive free passes, or discriminatory rates, from passenger, telegraph, and telephone companies.

Definition — free pass.

2. A "free pass," or discrimination in rates, is one for which a full consideration is not given, and the transportation paid for in the usual way, at the usual time, and at tariff rates; it "means the privilege of riding over a railroad without payment of the customary fare."

Carrier — contract by sheriff for pass.

3. A contract between a sheriff and a railroad corporation to perform legal services in suits where the company is a party in exchange for a free pass is contrary to morals, the law, and the public policy of the state, and it is null and void.

Officer — suit for forfeiture — proper plaintiff.

4. A suit against a sheriff for forfeiture of his office because he accepted, received, and used a free pass or free transportation, or accepted discriminatory passenger rates, is properly brought by the attorney general, or district attorney, under article 191 of the Constitution.

5. Article 191 provides that the forfeiture to office shall be "at the suit of the attorney general, or district attorney."

Headnotes by SOMMERVILLE, J.

(O'Niell, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Allen (Overton, J.) in favor of defendant, dismissing plaintiff's demand, in a suit to have the office of defendant declared forfeited. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. V. Coco, Attorney General, in propria persona.

Messrs. Cline & Bell and Thomas Arthur Edwards for appellee.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The attorney general, in his official capacity, brings this suit against R. E. Oden, sheriff of the parish of Allen in this state, to have the office of the latter declared forfeited, because defendant accepted from and used a free pass on, and accepted discriminating passenger rates from, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company in this state, during the incumbency of defendant in office.

Defendant excepted to the jurisdiction of the district court ratione

materiæ, which exception was properly overruled. He further excepted on the ground that article 191 of the Constitution, under which the proceeding was brought, is not self-enforcing or self-operative. This exception was also properly overruled. He then filed an exception of no cause of action, which was also overruled.

The law forbids the use of free passes by members of the general assembly and by public officers of the state; and the allegation that the defendant used a free pass states a sufficient cause of action for the forfeiture of his office. Defendant next excepted, that plaintiff is without power, authority, or right in law to institute and prosecute this suit in his own name and person, and that he is likewise without authority or right to stand in judgment herein; that said suit, under the law, should and must be brought in the name and on relation and on behalf of the state of Louisiana. This exception was also overruled.

The defendant then answered, denying that he had used a free pass, or had received any discrimination in rates from the railroad company mentioned in the petition, but specially answered "that all transportation solicited, received, or used by appearer on the line of said railway corporation was fully and legally paid for under a legal, valid, enforceable, and executory contract, with a legal, valid, and ample consideration, and that said transportation was neither free nor discriminatory; that to force a forfeiture of appearer's office and the emoluments thereof for receiving and using such transportation under such contract will be to deprive him of his liberty of contract and rights of property without due process of law, in violation of article 5 of the Federal Constitution, and in violation of article 2 of the Constitution of the state of Louisiana, and deprive him of the equal protection of the law in violation of Amendment 14 to the Constitution of the United States, and in contravention of the Constitution of the state of Louisiana."

Defendant asked for trial by jury, which request was granted. There was judgment in favor of defendant, dismissing plaintiff's demand, and plaintiff has appealed.

Article 191 of the Constitution under which the attorney general proceeded in this case is, in part, as follows:

"No member of the general assembly, or public officer, or person elected or appointed to a public office, under the laws of this state, shall directly or indirectly, ask, demand, accept, receive, or consent to receive, for his own use or benefit, or for the use or benefit of another, any free pass, free transportation, franking privilege, or discrimination in passenger, telegraph, or telephone rates, from any person or corporation, or make use of the same himself or in conjunction with another.

"Any person who violates any provision of this article shall forfeit his office, at the suit of the attorney general, or the district attorney, to be brought at the domicile of the defendant, and shall be subject to such further penalty as may be prescribed by law."

The authorization of the attorney general to sue for the forfeiture of the title to office of the persons named in the article is clear. It is not therein intimated that the proceeding should be in the name of the state, or on behalf of the state.

The exception filed to the right of the attorney general to proceed against defendant seems to be based on the theory that the suit should have been filed under Rev. Stat. § 2593, which provides for suits against usurpers and intruders into office, in which case it appears to be provided that the suit must be brought in the name of the state. But this is not a suit against a usurper or an intruder into office. It is a suit to destitute an officer of his office, and it was properly brought by the attorney general under article 191. The attorney general has literally complied with the article in bringing the suit. He expressly states that the suit is instituted under authority of the article of the Constitution providing for "forfeiture of office," and, if the state should be a party to the suit, it has been made so, impliedly, by the attorney general proceeding in the manner in which he has done.

The house of representatives has the sole power of impeachment of the governor and other named officers (art. 218), and, under article 222, the impeachment of other officers must be sued for in court. As the state is mentioned in the last article as a party to such suit, it is necessary that the state should be made a party in the impeachment of such officers.

The exception to the right of the attorney general to file the suit was properly overruled.

The exception to article 191, not being self-operative, is without merit. It provides in terms for the forfeiture of office on the commission of certain offenses against the law therein stated, and it provides the remedy. "The suit of the attorney general or the district attorney" must be brought in the courts of the state, and may not be brought elsewhere, at the domicile of the defendant. The article is self-operative.

The admission of the defendant in his answer, and the evidence introduced at the trial of the case on the merits, is conclusive that defendant accepted and used a free pass from the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company in the years 1915-16, during his incumbency in office as sheriff of the parish of Allen. He therefore violated the law of the state, which forbade the acceptance and use of such free pass.

The defense that the defendant entered into a contract with the railroad company whereby the pass accepted by him from the railroad company was to be full consideration for all sheriff's fees which might be incurred by said railroad company in suits in the court of which defendant was sheriff is absolutely without merit. It was incompetent on the part of the sheriff to charge any other fees than those fixed in the fee bill, and which were to be charged to all litigants and collected from them in cash by the sheriff. It was not competent for the sheriff to make the contract alleged to have been made. And the pass which he received from the railroad company in consideration of such fees was a free pass, and there was discrimination in passenger rates in his favor under such illegal, null, and void contract.

A free pass or discrimination in rates is one for which a full consideration is not given, and the transportation is not paid for in the usual way, at the usual time, and at tariff rates.

"A 'free pass' means the privilege of riding over" a railroad "without payment of the customary fare." Perkins v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 196, 203, 82 Am. Dec. 281; Words & Phrases, p. 2967.

The contract set up by the defendant is contra bonos mores, it is immoral, and it is against the public policy of the state.

The law forbids the acceptance of a free pass for use by an officer of this state, and defendant has forfeited his office by the acceptance and use of such pass.

Defendant has moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that this court is without jurisdiction. There was an admission on the trial of the case "that the emoluments of office of sheriff for the unexpired term in this case are worth over $2,000, as fixed by statute." There is more than the right to office therefore involved. The right to the fees of the office, which exceed $2,000, is involved, and the court has jurisdiction.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the verdict of the jury and the judgment based thereon be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and it is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be judgment in favor of plaintiff and against R. E. Oden, sheriff of Allen parish, declaring the office of sheriff held by him to be forfeited and vacated, and that he be dispossessed thereof.

O'Neill, J., is of the opinion the proceeding should have been brought in the name of the state, by or on the relation of the attorney general, or district attorney, and, therefore, he respectfully dissents.

Petition for a writ of certiorari dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, April 14, 1919, 249 U. S. 587, 63 L. ed. 790, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 386.

ANNOTATION.

Carriers: free passes to public officials or employees.

In some states statutes or constitutional provisions prohibit public officers from accepting or using a free railroad pass. For instance, the Constitution of New York, effective in 1895, provides that "no public officer, or person elected or appointed to a public office, under the laws of this state, shall directly or indirectly ask, demand, accept, receive or consent to receive for his own use or benefit, or for the use or benefit of another, any free pass, free transportation, franking privilege or discrimination in passenger, telegraph or telephone rates from any person or corporation, or make use of the same himself or in conjunction with another."

This constitutional provision, it has been held, applies to notaries public, who are appointed by the governor and take an official oath, and whose term of office, powers, and duties are fixed by law. People v. Rathbone (1895) 145 N. Y. 484, 28 L.R.A. 384, 40 N. E. 395; People v. Wadhams (1908) 176 N. Y. 9, 68 N. E. 65. In the latter case, it was held that a notary public who paid his railroad fare, but used a pass entitling him to ride in a sleeping car without charge, violated the above constitutional provision, and might for such act be ousted from office.

It applies also to a railroad policeman appointed under the Railroad Law by the governor to protect railroad property, although he is employed and paid by the railroad company. Dempsey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1895) 146 N. Y. 290, 40 N. E. 867. But while holding the policeman a public officer within the constitutional provision, the court held that he was not prohibited from accepting a pass from the railroad company where he had been commissioned several years prior to the enactment of the provision, in order to carry out a contract made between him and the railroad company by which he agreed to perform services for it in preventing depredations on its property, in consideration of a monthly salary and the delivery to him of an annual pass for transportation on the railroad, to be used by him whether engaged on business of the railroad or on his private affairs, since such a pass was not a "free pass."

The provision of the New York Constitution above cited was held in Re Railroad Comrs. (1895) 11 Misc. 103, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1115, not to prohibit the transportation of members of the state Railroad Commission on free passes, under a statute previously enacted providing that in the discharge of the duties of their office such commissioners should be transported over the railroads of the state free of charge, on passes signed by the secretary of state. The court said: "The office of the word 'own,' when following a possessive pronoun, is to emphasize or intensify the idea of peculiar or personal interest. It suggests, what was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of this constitutional provision, that the practice of giving passes to public officers for their individual use, and to save them from personal expense, should be stopped, but the power of the legislature to provide for the necessary traveling and other expenses of public officers while engaged in public business should not be abridged. This provision of the Constitution must not only be construed in the light of existing public statutes, but it will be presumed that it was drafted with full recognition of them." And the court referred to a provision of the general railroad law that the railroad commissioners should not accept or receive any pass for themselves or for any other person, while another section of the law declared that such officers, in the discharge of their official duties, should be transported over the railroads of the state free of charge.

The reported case (COCO v. ODEN, ante, 679) holds that a contract between a sheriff and a railroad company to perform legal services in suits in which the company is a party, in exchange for a free pass, is contrary to morals and the public policy of the state, as well as statute, and is void; and that an officer who, in violation of a statute permitting the acceptance of a free pass by officers, accepted and used such a pass, forfeited his office by such act.

It was held in Oklahoma City v. Oklahoma R. Co. (1907) 20 Okla. 1, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 651, 93 Pac. 48, that it is not against public policy for a municipality, in granting a street railway franchise, to contract for the free transportation by the railway company of policemen, firemen, and mail carriers, and that such a contract was not abrogated by a constitutional provision prohibiting railway companies from issuing free passes except in certain specified cases, such as to employees and to persons engaged in charitable or religious work. The court said that the free transportation did not come from the railway company, but from the municipality, which was not prohibited by the constitutional provision from granting free transportation.

The provision of the New Jersey Railroad Law of 1910 requiring railroad companies to carry the secretary to the governor free of charge was held unconstitutional in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Herrmann (1916) 89 N. J. L. 582, 99 Atl. 404, reversing (1916) 88 N. J. L. 526, 96 Atl. 665.

The same conclusion was reached in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Public Utilities Comrs. (1913) 85 N. J. L. 28, 88 Atl. 849, as to a member of the State Water Supply Commission, it being held that the statute constituted a taking of property without due process of law.

It was held in Pfister v. Central P. R. Co. (1886) 70 Cal. 169, 59 Am. Rep. 404, 11 Pac. 686, that a county treasurer en route to the state capitol with public funds for delivery to the state treasurer was not a "public messenger" within the meaning of the statute requiring the carriage free of charge of certain classes of persons including "public messengers."

In Wilson v. United Traction Co. (1902) 72 App. Div. 233, 76 N. Y. Supp. 203, a statute authorizing the mayor of a city or incorporated village to issue to a policeman a certificate of his official position, and making it the duty of street railway companies to carry him free upon his presenting such certificate, was held to be unconstitutional and void on the ground that it deprived companies of their property without due process of law.

But the opposite view was taken in State v. Sutton (1912) 83 N. J. L. 46, 84 Atl. 1057, where the court referred to Wilson v. United Traction Co. (N. Y.) supra, but declined to follow it, holding that it was within the power of the legislature to require street railway companies to transport, free, members of the police force, when on duty. The court said: "It is not strictly accurate to say that the company receives no compensation for carrying police officers if they pay no fare. It may well be that there is an indirect compensation in the protection afforded by the mere presence of the officer, against pickpockets, or even against assaults on passengers by the company's own servants for which the company would be liable, . . . and in the help thus given to the company in the performance of its duty to its passengers. Indirect compensation of this character has been recognized as compensation within the meaning of the Constitution. . . . The Statute of 1912 may fairly be regarded as an exercise of the police power of the state. Policemen are frequently required to be on street cars in the execution of their duties to preserve the peace, to enforce ordinances, and to prevent or detect crime. It would be difficult to say that the mere presence of a police officer might not be of value for securing these objects, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish in principle between his right, for example, to be on a crowded car to arrest pickpockets and his right to be on a car not crowded to enforce the ordinance against spitting. If he has the right to be there for these purposes, it is impossible to say that his services may not at any time be required to prevent violations of law; at any rate, the legislature might reasonably think so, and legalize his presence on the car without payment of fare." The decision was affirmed in (1915) 87 N. J. L. 192, L.R.A.1917E, 1176, 94 Atl. 788, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 91, on the ground that the statute was a constitutional exercise of the police power, although the court was of the opinion that it could not be sustained on the ground of indirect compensation to the railway company. The decision of the New Jersey court of appeals is affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in (1916) 244 U. S. 258, 61 L. ed. 1117, P.U.R.1917E, 682, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508, in which the court said: "Freedom to come and go upon the street cars without the obstacle or discouragement incident to payment of fares may well have been deemed by the legislature essential to efficient and pervasive performance of the police duty. Increased protection may thereby inure to both the company and the general public. without imposing upon the former an appreciable burden. If any evidence of the reasonableness of the provision were needed, it could be found in the fact that such officers had been voluntarily carried free by the company and its predecessors for at least eighteen years prior to July 4, 1910, when the practice was prohibited by the Public Utilities Act." And the Supreme Court also held specifically that the requirement that city detectives not in uniform be carried free on the street cars, when in the discharge of their duties, was not an arbitrary or unreasonable exercise of the police power.

In an action against a street railway company for alleged negligent killing of a policeman who was riding on a pass at the time the injury occurred, it was held in Marshall v. Nashville R. & Light Co. (1907) 118 Tenn. 254, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1246, 101 S. W. 419, 12 Ann. Cas. 675, that the possibility that the presence of police officers on street cars might tend to preserve peace and good order was not sufficient to constitute a valuable consideration for the pass given by the carriers to the officer, so as to constitute the policeman a passenger for hire.

In Bradburn v. Whatcom County R. & Light Co. (1907) 45 Wash. 582, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 526, 88 Pac. 1020, an action for injury to a policeman while riding on a street car, it was contended that the provisions of the ordinance granting the franchise by which the company agreed to carry policemen free of charge was in violation of a provision of the state Constitution, prohibiting public officers from accepting or using a pass on a railroad, as well as against public policy, but the court found it unnecessary to determine the validity of the franchise, holding that the carrier could not escape liability for negligently injuring one whom it had accepted as a passenger, although he claimed transportation under a contract which violated the constitutional provision against free passes.

Although not directly in point with the present annotation, attention is called to Re Maine C. R. Co. (1915; Me.) P.U.R.1915A, 135, where the Maine Commission held that a railroad company could not grant free transportation to members of the staff of the Maine agricultural experiment station, supported by state and Federal aid, under the statute authorizing transportation of property of the state or Federal government free or at reduced rates.

v.

KLOCK PRODUCE COMPANY, Respt.

Judgment — right to recover compensation for storage.

1. A judgment against a storage warehouse for damages for injury to the stored property is not conclusive against a right to recover compensation for storage services which was not set up as a set-off or counterclaim in that action.

— res judicata — judgment denying lien — effect on right to compensation.

2. Merely setting up a lien for storage in an action for conversion of property stored does not render a judgment denying the lien res judicata of the right to recover compensation for the storage.

[See 15 R. C. L. 977.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County (Mackintosh, J.) dismissing an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due for storage charges. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James B. Howe and A. J. Falknor, for appellant:

A judgment in a former action between the same parties is not res judicata as to a set-off or counterclaim which defendant might have pleaded, but did not.

Deaver v. Trahey, 98 Wash. 63, 167 Pac. 68; 23 Cyc. 1202; Minnaugh v. Partlin, 67 Mich. 391, 34 N. W. 717; Kennedy v. Davisson, 46 W. Va. 433, 33 S. E. 291; Shankle v. Whitley, 131 N. C. 168, 42 S. Mr. Samuel H. Steele for respondent.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Diamond Ice & Storage Company, seeks recovery of the sum of $402 claimed as a balance due it from the defendant, Klock Produce Company, for the storage of cheese, butter, and eggs, between March 20, 1914, and April 23, 1915. The case was disposed of by the superior court upon the pleas of res judicata, pleaded in the defendant's second and third affirmative defenses, and plaintiff's reply thereto. The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's reply, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and, the plaintiff having elected to stand upon its reply and not plead further, judgment of dismissal was rendered against it, from which it has appealed to this court.

The questions here to be determined are: (1) Does plaintiff's reply negative the defendant's plea that the claim of appellant here sued upon was actually put in issue by the defendant and adjudicated in either of the two prior actions mentioned in the second and third affirmative defenses? and (2) does appellant's reply negative the defendant's plea that the claim of appellant here sued upon was in any event, in legal effect, adjudicated in either of these actions, because of the fact that it was so closely related to the issue therein involved as to estop appellant from asserting that it was not adjudicated by the judgment rendered therein? To avoid confusion we shall refer to appellant as the storage company, and to respondent as the produce company.

The complaint of the storage company in this action is in the simplest form, and contains only those allegations necessary in such cases. It does not specifically inform us whether the balance of $402, claimed as owing to the storage company by the produce company, is a balance due upon a single or upon several storage contracts. It does, however, inform us that the account sued upon consists of numerous separate charges for storage at different times, of different lots of produce.

It appears from the allegations of the produce company's second affirmative defense that on August 5, 1915, it commenced an action in the superior court for King county, seeking recovery from the storage company of the value of fifty-four cases of cheese, which it had in storage with the storage company and which it claimed that company had converted. We shall assume that the further allegations as to the issue tendered in that action and judgment rendered therein stated a good defense of res judicata in this action.

It appears from the denials, admissions, and allegations of the storage company's reply to this second affirmative defense as follows: The storage company in its answer in that action admitted that it had received the cheese in storage for the produce company, and that the contract of storage was evidenced by a negotiable warehouse receipt, and further pleaded as an affirmative defense therein as follows: "This defendant [the storage company] alleges that between March 20, 1914, and May 23, 1915, this plaintiff had in storage with the defendant various quantities of eggs, butter, and cheese, and that on April 23, 1915, and all times since there was due this defendant from the plaintiff for the storage of such eggs, butter, and cheese, the sum of four hundred and sixteen and 5/100 dollars ($416.05), no part of which has been paid. That this defendant, on the 22d day of April, 1915, refused to surrender and deliver said fifty-four (54) cases of cheese, being the only article of plaintiff's then, or since, in storage with the defendant, for the reason that the plaintiff failed and refused to pay the storage charges of four hundred and sixteen and 5/100 dollars ($416.05) due this defendant from the plaintiff on said 23d day of April, 1915, and at all times since due and unpaid. That this defendant stands ready and willing, and at all times has stood ready and willing, to deliver to the plaintiff, or the plaintiff's assignee, said fifty-four (54) cases of cheese upon the payment to this defendant of said storage charges of four hundred and sixteen and 5/100 dollars ($416.05), and that this defendant has not converted said cheese, or any part thereof, to the defendant's use, but holds the same solely by virtue of its warehouseman's lien."

The storage company in its answer in that action did not set up its claim of $416.05 as a set-off or counterclaim against the produce company's claim for the alleged conversion of the cheese, but set up that claim only as a justification for withholding the cheese and refusing to deliver it to the produce company upon the surrender of the negotiable warehouse receipt evidencing the contract of storage and the tender of payment of $6.61, claimed by the produce company to be all that was due to the storage company for the storage of the cheese under that contract of storage. The prayer of the storage company in its answer was simply that the action be dismissed and for its costs. It did not ask for recovery of the storage charges claimed by it for the storage of the other produce; but, on the trial of the cause upon the merits, the storage company moved for permission to amend its answer so as to ask for equitable relief, and that its claim for storage of the other produce, as well as the cheese in question, be declared a lien upon the cheese, and that it be sold to satisfy such lien. This amendment was permitted, and at the close of the case the trial court denied to the produce company recovery for conversion of the cheese, and awarded foreclosure of the claimed lien of the storage company as against the cheese. Thereupon the produce company appealed from that judgment to this court, and thereafter this court reversed the judgment so rendered, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the produce company against the storage company in the sum of $812.92, the value of the cheese retained and converted by it. It was pointed out in our decision that no set-off or counterclaim was pleaded as a defense in that action, and that "all that the defendant [the storage company] set up was that it had a right to retain the cheese under its lien." The theory of that decision was that the storage company did not have a lien upon the cheese in question for storing the other produce. See 90 Wash. 67, 155 Pac. 414. The denials in the storage company's reply to this second affirmative defense plainly negative the alleged adjudication, either actually or constructively, of the claim here sued upon.

It appears from the allegations of the produce company's third affirmative defense as follows: In October, 1915, the produce company commenced another action in the superior court for King county against the storage company, seeking recovery of damages, the depreciated value of 1,124 cases of eggs which it had stored with the storage company, claiming that the eggs had been spoiled by reason of improper storage. The trial of that action upon the merits resulted in the awarding of judgment in favor of the produce company against the storage company in the sum of $900, which action was pending in this court upon appeal at the time of the commencement of this action. We here note that the judgment rendered therein has since then been affirmed by this court. See 98 Wash. 676, 168 Pac. 476. The claim of the storage company here sued upon was in no way referred to or claimed as a defense by way of set-off or counterclaim as against the damage claim of the produce company in that action. That adjudication is pleaded in this action, however, as the produce company's third affirmative defense of res judicata, accompanied by allegations in an attempt to show that it was so closely related to the produce company's claim of damages in that action that it became in effect adjudicated by the judgment rendered therein, in the sense that the storage company is estopped thereby from now asserting that it was not so adjudicated.

It appears from the denials, admissions, and allegations of the storage company's reply to this third affirmative defense, as follows: The storage company denies all the allegations of this affirmative defense, except it admits that the issues determined by the judgment rendered in the action therein referred to were as shown by the pleadings therein, copies of which are made a part of its reply. Plainly, those pleadings do not show that the claim of the storage company here sued upon had any relation to the issues raised by the pleadings or determined by the judgment rendered in that action.

Assuming that the denials and allegations of the storage company's reply in this case are true, as we must assume for present purposes, we first inquire, Was the claim of the storage company actually put in issue and adjudicated upon as a set-off or counterclaim in its defense made in the first action? We have seen that according to the allegations of the storage company's reply to the produce company's affirmative defense in this action its storage claim was set up in that action only as a claimed lien for storage upon the cheese there in question, and as a justification for the refusal to deliver the cheese to the produce company; that no personal judgment upon the claim was sought against the produce company; and that it was finally decided in that action that the storage company had no enforceable lien against the cheese converted by it. The storage company's reply, in effect, goes further, and denies that its claim here sued upon was the claim sought to be enforced as a lien in that action. Plainly, the allegations of the storage company's reply negative the allegations of the produce company's second affirmative defense in so far as that defense pleads that the claim here sued upon was actually litigated therein. What the proof may show upon the trial of the issues in this action is another question. It follows that the storage company's reply to the produce company's second affirmative defense is good as against the produce company's demurrer. What we have already said calls for the same conclusion with reference to the storage company's reply to the produce company's third affirmative defense.

Was the claim of the storage company here sued upon so closely related to the issues determined in the two former actions that it was in legal effect adjudicated in either of those actions? It seems to us that it cannot be so determined from the pleadings in this action in view of the denials and allegations of the storage company's reply. What we have already said we think renders further notice of this question unnecessary.

Was the storage company bound to actually plead and put in issue in either of the former actions, as a set-off or counterclaim, its claim here sued upon, or be thereafter estopped from asserting it in this separate action? It is here so contended by counsel for the produce company, upon the theory that it was at the time of the commencement of the first of these actions a claim arising upon contract, then existing in favor of the storage company and against the produce company, between whom a several judgment might have been had in one or the other of those actions. This contention is rested upon the provisions of the following sections of Rem. Code:

"Sec. 264. The answer of the defendant must contain,—

"1. A general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief,

"2. A statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim, in ordinary and concise language without repetition."

"Sec. 265. . . . The counterclaim mentioned in the preceding section must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action:—

"1. A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action.

"2. In an action arising on contract, any other cause of action arising also on contract, and existing at the commencement of the action."

It is argued that the words, "the answer of the defendant must contain," as used at the beginning of § 264, rendered it mandatory upon the storage company, as defendant in the two former actions, that it actually plead and put in issue in one or other of those actions, as, a set-off or counterclaim against the claims therein sued upon, its claim here sued upon, even though this claim is one arising wholly independent of the claims therein asserted. Our recent decision in Deaver v. Trahey, 98 Wash. 63, 167 Pac. 68, seems to answer this contention. We there held that the note sued upon not having been actually set up as a counterclaim or set-off by way of defense in the former action, the judgment in which was pleaded as res judicata, the note having been given in settlement of a matter wholly independent of the matter involved in that action, and the holder of the note being the original payee, he was not estopped from thereafter suing thereon in an independent action. In our decision in that case we said: "This note constitutes a cause of action in favor of appellant and against respondent wholly independent of all matters drawn in question in that action. It being clear that this note was not in fact drawn in question in that action, either by pleadings or evidence, the question here is, Was it necessarily involved therein in the sense that the judgment to be rendered in that action would become res judicata of appellant's right to recover in this action upon the note? It seems settled by the great weight of authority, in the absence of statute, that a defendant, having a cause of action against a plaintiff wholly independent of the claim and relief sought by the plaintiff in the particular action, is not bound to set up such independent cause of action as a defense in the action, even though his cause of action is such that he may be permitted to do so, but may bring an independent action to enforce his claim without being subjected to the plea of another action pending, or of res judicata as a defense thereto."

argument in that case that § 264, above quoted, is mandatory in the sense here claimed by counsel for the produce company, but we think the holding in that case would have been the same had such argument been made therein. It will be noticed that the two subdivisions of § 264, stating what the answer must contain, are not joined by the conjunction "and," nor are they separated by the disjunctive "or." Reading the two sections as a whole, it seems quite clear to us that these two subdivisions of § 264 are merely alternatives, and that in answering a defendant may plead one or the other, and is not bound to plead as a defense any counterclaim or set-off which he may have against the plaintiff, and which is wholly unrelated to the claim of the plaintiff. This, we think, is in harmony with the overwhelming weight of authority. It seems to us that these sections of the statute do not evidence a legislative intent to make the law otherwise. In Bertles v. Hawkins Motor Car Co. 94 Wash. 680, 163 Pac. 3, observations are made quite in harmony with this view, though we do not cite that case as being exactly in point.

We have not lost sight of our decision in Perlus v. Silver, 71 Wash. 338, 128 Pac. 661, cited by counsel for the produce company, from which he quotes as follows: "It is the settled law of this state that, in an action between the same parties, a judgment therein is res judicata as to all points in issue, and also as to all points which might have been raised and adjudicated in such action."

This is but the statement of a general rule which it seems to us has always been subject to the exceptions noticed in Deaver v. Trahey, in the absence of a statute expressly providing otherwise. In Perlus v. Silver, however, the second action was brought upon a claim which was manifestly so closely related to the one adjudicated upon in the former action as to necessarily become res judicata by the judgment rendered therein; and the same may be said of all the cases decided by this court, cited as following the language above quoted from Perlus v. Silver.

We are of the opinion that, in view of the denials and allegations contained in the storage company's reply to the second and third affirmative defenses of the produce company in this action, it cannot be decided upon the pleading that the claim of the storage company here sued upon has been actually adjudicated in either of the former actions, or that it is such a claim that, at the commencement of either of those actions, the storage company was bound to plead or in any manner put it in issue as a set-off or counterclaim in either of those actions, or suffer estoppel from thereafter seeking recovery thereon in this independent action.

The judgment of dismissal is reversed and the action remanded to the Superior Court, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the storage company's reply to the produce company's second and third affirmative defenses, and for such further proceedings as shall not be inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

Main, Ch. J., and Fullerton, Tolman, and Mitchell, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The question whether a prior action in which a claim might have been asserted by counterclaim, set-off, or cross petition bars or abates a subsequent independent action thereon is treated in the annotation following SEAGER v. FOSTER, post, 694.

Election of remedies — injuries by collision.

1. A defendant in an action for damages for injuries arising out of an automobile collision is not bound, in order to protect his claim for injuries growing out of the collision, to set it up by way of set-off or counterclaim in that action, but may maintain an independent action to recover his damages.

Abatement — former action pending — counterclaim.

2. An action to recover damages for injuries growing out of an automobile collision cannot be abated by the pendency of a former action by the owner of the other car to recover the damages accruing to him from the collision.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — conflict with statute.

8. An ordinance prescribing which of two vehicles crossing intersecting streets shall have the right of way is not in conflict with a statute fixing the right of way in case of vehicles turning into one street from another.

Evidence — speed of automobile.

4. A witness cannot testify as to whether or not an automobile was traveling fast or slow.

— comparison of speed.

5. A witness cannot be permitted to state whether or not one automobile in collision was going faster than the other, but must state the speed of each and permit the jury to make the comparison.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Cedar Rapids County (Robbins, J.) overruling his plea in abatement and motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained in a collision alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Treichler & Treichler, for appellant:

Where two actions are pending for the recovery of damages sustained in an automobile collision, the action first begun will abate the second, notwithstanding that the parties in the two actions are reversed, for the reason that the evidence in both cases relating to the identical collision would necessarily be the same, and an adjustment in one case would adjudicate all the rights of either party growing out of said collision.

Peninsula Bark & Lumber Co. 171 Mich. 605, 137 N. W. 518; J. J. Smith Lumber Co. v. Sisters of Charity, 146 Iowa, 454, 125 N. W. 214.

Where the witness has fixed the speed of one car, it is error to refuse to permit witness to testify as to whether another car was at the time "going faster" than the car of which the speed had been fixed by the witness.

Livingstone v. Dole, — Iowa, —, 167 N. W. 639.

Plaintiff was guilty of negligence in not exercising due care in keeping a proper lookout for vehicles approaching the intersection, and in driving his car at an unlawful and negligent rate of speed, and a verdict of the jury for plaintiff is contrary to the evidence, and cannot, as a matter of law, be sustained.

Stearns v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 166 Iowa, 566, 148 N. W. 128.

Messrs. Barnes, Chamberlain, & Hanzlik, for appellee:

A second suit, in either the same or a different court, should not be abated by the first suit where the first suit will not necessarily determine all the issues between the parties.

It is not error to refuse to permit a witness to testify whether a car was going fast or slow in comparison with another object.

Livingstone v. Dole, — Iowa, —, 176 N. W. 639.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff drove his automobile, weighing about 800 pounds, along Bever avenue in an easterly direction, as the defendant with his car, weighing about 3,395 pounds, came northerly up Fourteenth street, which intersects Bever avenue. The plaintiff, as he approached the intersection, looked to the north and thereafter to the south, and testified that he did not observe defendant's car until about 16 feet west of the west curbing of Fourteenth street, and when defendant was about the same distance south of the intersection. He estimated his speed at about 12 miles an hour, and was unable to say whether he looked toward the south previously to observing the approach of defendant's car. Zook, who was riding with plaintiff, estimated the speed of the car at 15 miles per hour, and swore that it was about halfway between Third avenue and Fourteenth street, or about 60 feet from the west of the intersection, and defendant's car was then about 40 feet south therefrom, and that he called plaintiff's attention to the approach of defendant's car. On the other hand, defendant testified to having been about 50 feet south of the intersection when he looked as far west as the intersection of Bever avenue and Third avenue, but did not see the car until after looking to the east and when about 70 feet west of the intersection, and when he was about 40 feet south of it. Defendant's son, who sat in the back seat, testified that he saw the plaintiff's car at the intersection of the avenues, or about 117 feet west of the intersection, and that he immediately told his father. Defendant estimated the speed of his car at 12 miles per hour and that of plaintiff at 25 miles per hour, while his son thought plaintiff's car was moving at the rate of 14 or 15 miles per hour. The automobiles collided in the intersection, but somewhat south of the street railway track, and both cars were injured. Plaintiff claimed in his petition the expense of repairing his car as damages, and the defendant, putting in issue such claim, demanded judgment for the damages done his vehicle, and also pleaded by way of abatement another action pending.

I. This action was begun in the superior court of Cedar Rapids, December 21, 1916. Prior thereto, November 17, 1916, defendant began suit as plaintiff to recover in that action the damages claimed in his cross petition, and issue was joined thereon by plaintiff in this action, as defendant in that. The defendant in the action at bar pleaded the pendency of the suit begun November 17, 1916, in abatement, and the plea was denied. The plaintiff in this action had not, as defendant in the prior suit, asserted any claim to damages consequent on the collision, either by way of counterclaim, set-off, or cross petition, and was not required so to do in order to protect such claim. He might so have done, but was not bound to, for he might have elected whether he would assert his claim for damages in that action or proceed in an independent action to recover the damages, if any he had suffered. Jones v. Witousek, 114 Iowa, 14, 86 N. W. 59; Smeaton v. Cole, 120 Iowa, 368, 94 N. W. 909. Having elected to prosecute his claim for damages in another and independent action, as was his right, it might not be abated because of the pendency of defendant's suit previously brought. Osborn v. Cloud, 23 Iowa, 104, 92 Am. Dec. 413; Code, § 8440, 1 C. J. 83.

II. An ordinance of the city of Cedar Rapids, § 393, was received in evidence over objection that it was void because of being covered by paragraphs 11 and 12 of § 1571m18 of the Code Supplement (1913). The ordinance declares that "except as otherwise provided, vehicles traveling on thoroughfares running at right angles to the Cedar river, which are designated and known as 'avenues,' have the right of way over vehicles traveling on thoroughfares known as 'streets,' or other thoroughfares which intersect 'avenues.'"

The court instructed the jury: "You are instructed that such ordinance means that where drivers of vehicles, one being on an avenue and one on a street, approach an intersection where they must pass each other, wherever it intersects at the same moment, it is the duty of the person driving the vehicle upon the street to permit the vehicle driven on the avenue to pass in front of the vehicle on the street."

The contention is that this is invalid for that the subject is covered by paragraphs 11 and 12 of said § 1571m18 of the Code Supplement, which read:

"In cities and towns, motor vehicles turning to the right from one street into another shall have the right of way over vehicles traveling on the street into which same are turning.

"In cities and towns, motor vehicles turning to the left into another street shall give the right of way to vehicles traveling on the street into which same are turning."

It will be observed that these paragraphs do not cover the situation where the automobiles approach on different streets intersecting, as at right angles, without turning but continuing in their course, and the question presented is whether, this not having been touched by the paragraphs quoted, it was competent for the city council of Cedar Rapids to enact the ordinance with respect thereto. Section 755 conferred upon the city the power to regulate the driving of vehicles within the limits of the corporation, and surely rules defining which shall have the right of way in a situation like that involved in this case are within the terms of this statute, for it concerns the safety of drivers in passing on the intersection of the streets. Nothing to be found in § 1571m20 of the Code Supplement (1918) obviates this conclusion. The forepart of that section forbids the exaction of any fee, license, or permit for the use of public highways or exclusion for the free use thereof by local authorities with certain exceptions, and declares that "no ordinance, rule or regulation, contrary or in any wise inconsistent with the provisions of this act, now in force or hereinafter enacted, shall have any effect."

As seen, this ordinance is not in conflict with any provision in the act known as chapter 2-B of title 8. Therein appears no purpose on the part of the general assembly to withdraw the power to regulate the driving of automobiles as conferred by § 755 of the Code save as therein specified. We are of opinion that the enactment of the ordinance is within the authority of the city council of Cedar Rapids, and the instruction referred to in so saying to the jury has our approval.

III. Plaintiff, having testified that he could not judge the rate of speed at which defendant's car was moving, was asked: "In your opinion, was it going fast or slow?" Objection "as relative in form, and there is nothing to compare it with," was overruled, and the witness answered: "He was coming pretty fast." The ruling was erroneous, for there is no criterion that we know of by which to determine whether an automobile is moving fast or slow. Fifteen or 20 miles per hour seems quite fast to some folks, while others would deem a 40 or 50 mile rate scarcely to be denominated as fast driving. Plaintiff's ideas on this subject do not appear, and the jury derived no information from the answer given and could not have based a finding as to any definite speed from the answer given. By these reasons we are persuaded that the ruling, though erroneous, was without prejudice.

IV. Defendant's son swore that in his judgment the automobile in which he was riding was moving at a speed of 14 or 15 miles per hour, not over 15. "Q. Was it (the Ford) going faster than the car that you were in?"

An objection as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, as asking for a comparison, was sustained, and the witness was asked: "Was it going fast or slow?" And a like objection was sustained. Possibly a difference in the objection interposed to the last question and that propounded to plaintiff may explain the difference in the ruling.

At any rate, the court, as seen, was correct this time. The ruling on the first above question, however, is the one complained of. The question called for a conclusion arrived at by comparing the speed of one car with the other, and for this reason the objection should have been sustained, as the speed of the car should have been shown and the jury allowed to make the comparison.

V. The evidence was sufficient to carry the issue as to whether the defendant was negligent in not yielding the right of way to plaintiff. He observed the plaintiff's automobile approaching in ample time to enable him to have exercised ordinary care, in yielding the right of way, to have avoided the collision. As to whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence the evidence is closed; but we think, in view of the fact that he was entitled to the right of way, the jury might have found him without fault contributing to the injury.

that the plaintiff sought to recover on a claim which was available in a prior action against him by way of set-off, counterclaim, or cross petition, no little difficulty has been experienced in distinguishing between matter constituting the proper subject of set-off or counterclaim, and matter which existed solely as a defense to the prior action. Not infrequently actions have been brought to recover a payment made by a defendant which was not asserted in an action, on the claim on which the payment was made. This class of litigation, involving the right to recover a payment made, or to enforce its credit on a judgment rendered against the payer, has been excluded from consideration herein, since such a payment does not constitute the subject of a set-off, but is solely a defense. Thus, in Broughton v. McIntosh (1840) 1 Ala. 103; the court in discussing this matter said: "The charge of the circuit court seems to have been predicated on the supposition that the payment created a right of action which could be enforced as a set-off against the demand of the party to whom the payment was made. There is no question but it would be a good defense, in whole or in part, to the action; but the defense would bear no resemblance to a set-off, which may be used or omitted at the pleasure of the defendant."

Except those cases wherein the courts have held that matter to constitute a counterclaim, this note excludes that class of cases wherein judgments in favor of physicians for their services have been held to be a bar to action for damages for malpractice in the performance of such services. These cases proceed on the theory that the two claims cannot co-exist; so that, if the plaintiff was entitled to have his claim allowed, the defendant would be precluded from recovering. See 24 R. C. L. 883, § 92; also Schwinger v. Raymond (1880) 88 N. Y. 192, 38 Am. Rep. 415.

II. General rule.

a. Rule stated.

The general rule is that a defendant, having a claim available by way of set-off, counterclaim, or cross petition, has an election so to plead it, or to reserve it for a future independent action, and a prior action in which a claim might have been asserted as a set-off, counterclaim, or cross petition is no bar to a subsequent independent action thereon.

b. Application of rule.

1. Prior action on contract; claim on contract.

(a) In general.

In a leading case in New York, Brown v. Gallaudet (1880) 80 N. Y. 418, it appeared that the defendant had prevailed against the plaintiff in a prior action for money loaned, in which the plaintiff did not counterclaim for a money demand here made the basis of his action. The court held that he was not required so to do, but, at his option, could reserve his claim for an independent and subsequent action. It was said: "It is only by reason of the statute relating to actions in justices' courts that a defendant was required in those courts to avail himself of his offsets, and the cases cited by the respondent arose under that statute. No such rule existed before the Code, in actions in courts of record, and the Code did not change the law in this respect."

So, in Carlin v. Richardson (1888) 17 N. Y. S. R. 899, 1 N. Y. Supp. 772, the court held that the defendant in a prior action on a contract was not required to set up a cause of action by way of counterclaim for the unpaid balance of a sum due on the same contract; he might do so, or he could resort to a cross action to recover on his claim,—citing and following Brown v. Gallaudet (N. Y.) supra.

And in Cantoni v. Forster (1895) 12 Misc. 376, 33 N. Y. Supp. 654, affirmed without opinion in (1895) 146 N. Y. 405, 42 N. E. 543, citing Brown v. Gallaudet (N. Y.) supra, the court held that a defendant, having cause of action on an agreement which could be made the proper subject of a counterclaim in the pending action on the same agreement, was not bound so to use it, but could reserve his claim for a subsequent and independent action thereon, except in actions instituted in a court of a justice of the peace.

In Delahaussaye v. Judice (1827) 6 Mart. N. S. (La.) 251, wherein the plaintiff claimed as a creditor of her deceased husband's estate on an instrument purporting to be a donation, and it appeared that in a former action the claim was not set up by the present plaintiff as defendant therein, the court held that the failure to plead the same in set-off constituted no bar to the maintenance of a subsequent independent action to recover thereon.

In Ferguson v. Epperly (1905) 127 Iowa, 214, 103 N. W. 94, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as the vendee under a sale of real property, had neglected to set up a claim for rents and profits as a counterclaim in a prior action brought against him to recover a balance due on the purchase price of the property, the court held that his omission did not bar him from maintaining a separate original action to recover on his claim, saying: "There is no rule of law with which we are familiar that holds to the doctrine that a failure to plead an existing cause of action as a counterclaim, when presented with an opportunity to do so, operates ipso facto to cancel or satisfy such cause of action."

In Leask v. Dew (1906) 102 App. Div. 529, 92 N. Y. Supp. 891, affirmed in (1906) 184 N. Y. 599, 77 N. E. 1190, an action by the executors under the will of a deceased party against the defendant as the maker of a promissory note, the latter contended that the action could not be maintained, as the note in question was offered in evidence in a hearing on a claim prosecuted by the defendant against the testator's estate. The court held that in the prior proceeding the claim on the note was not presented as a counterclaim, but only offered in evidence to rebut the presumption that there was a large indebtedness in favor of the defendant against the testator, and consequently it was not discharged by any judgment or determination in that proceeding.

In Lignot v. Redding (1855) 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 285, an action for money lent, balance of account stated, and goods sold and delivered, the defense was that another action was pending in which the plaintiffs should have set off their demands. The court held that the plaintiffs were not required to plead their demands in the former suit as a counterclaim, but could elect to bring an action thereon independent of the pending proceedings.

In Brown v. Creekmore (1920) — Ark. —, 217 S. W. 774, it was held that an adjudication on the items embraced in a counterclaim, in an action to recover the balance on a note, was res judicata as to such items, but that a counterclaim for rent, not embraced in the counterclaim in the prior suit, was not barred by the judgment in that action, the court stating that the fact that the cause of action for rent was then existent, and might have been asserted with other items, did not bar the assertion of it in a subsequent action.

And in this case a statute providing that, where a defendant fails to plead as a set-off a claim against the plaintiff, he shall be "forever barred from recovering costs in any suit which he may thereafter institute," was held not to bar the right to assert the counterclaim itself.

In Notara v. De Kamalaris (1898) 22 Misc. 837, 49 N. Y. Supp. 216, an action against an agent by his employers for the conversion of stock assigned to him for the purpose of sale, it appeared that the defendant had instituted a prior action against the plaintiffs in a court of record, to recover the amount of commissions due him under the contract of employment, and the agent pleaded the pendency of that action as a bar to this proceeding. It was held that in the prior action in a court of record the then defendants were not required to plead a cause of action available as a counterclaim, but could, at their option, maintain a separate suit thereon.

In Kelly Furniture, Carpet & Hardware Co. v. Shelton (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 62 S. W. 794, it appeared that the plaintiff company, in a former action on contract against the defendant, did not plead in set-off a claim based on an unpaid balance of a judgment in its favor. An action having been brought to compel the set-off of the plaintiff's claim as against the judgment rendered in the defendant's action, the court held that the mere fact that the plaintiff failed to assert the claim in the former proceedings as a set-off or counterclaim was not sufficient ground to refuse the relief sought.

In Metcalf v. Gilmore (1884) 63 N. H. 174, it was held that a defendant having a claim in assumpsit by way of recoupment or set-off could elect to interpose it as such in the present action on contract, or reserve his cause of action for a subsequent independent suit, and, further, that where it appeared that the claim of a defendant in a prior action was divisible, he could plead as a set-off, or in recoupment, so much of it as would defeat the plaintiff's action, and could thereafter maintain an independent action to recover the balance.

An early case, Garrow v. Carpenter (1835) 1 Port. (Ala.) 359, declared the general rule in the following terms: "It has often been decided that a party is not compellable to plead what is strictly a set-off, and not a payment, in any case. It is optional with him to do so or not." In that case the plaintiff sued for moneys due under a contract to build certain stores for the defendant, since deceased, and here represented by his administrators. It appeared that the present plaintiff had not asserted his claim in a prior action brought against him by the deceased party to recover for a failure to perform within the time agreed upon.

In Halsey v. Carter. (1853) 1 Duer (N. Y.) 667, the court held that §§ 149 and 150 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure did not vary or affect the right of a defendant in an action on contract, to elect to set up a claim on contract in his favor as a counterclaim, set-off, or in recoupment, or to reserve his cause of action and maintain an independent action thereon.

And in Gordon v. Van Cott (1899) 38 App. Div. 564, 56 N. Y. Supp. 554, wherein it appeared that the defendants had asserted a part of their counterclaim for services rendered as a set-off in a former action on contract, the court held that they were not precluded from recovering the balance of their claim.

In Munson v. Baldwin (1916) 93 Wash. 36, 159 Pac. 1070, an action to recover for the rental of furniture, it appeared that a prior suit had been brought by the defendants against the plaintiff for the rental value of a certain apartment, which was furnished with the articles leased of the plaintiff, and in that action, the claim for rent of the furniture was not asserted. The court held that the judgment in the defendants' action was not an adjudication of the plaintiff's claim, saying: "When the facts relied upon in the subsequent action are neither inconsistent with nor in direct opposition to the facts involved in the former suit, but are facts which may be equally true with the former facts, then there is no bar."

In Himes v. Barnitz (1839) 8 Watts (Pa.) 39, it was held that the right to deduct from the plaintiff's claim on contract, the amount due by him to the defendant under the contract, was a privilege given by the act of assembly (Pa.) 1706, and afterwards by the English Statutes of Set-off; not an obligation.

The rule was well illustrated in Roach v. Privett (1899) 90 Ala. 391, 24 Am. St. Rep. 819; 7 So. 308, wherein it was held that a set-off in contract may or may not be pleaded in an action on contract, at the election of the defendant; and that, unless it is pleaded, the right to sue upon it as an independent cause of action, or to rely upon it in defense to another cause of action by the same plaintiff, is in no wise affected or impaired by a judgment against the defendant. The court stated this rule as the well-settled doctrine of the court, and as in harmony with the ruling in other jurisdictions, holding that the ruling in earlier cases, notably Crawford v. Simonton (1838) 7 Port. (Ala.) 110, is unsound in principle, and cannot be reconciled with later adjudications.

In Londes v. City Nat. Bank (1907) 79 Conn. 693, 66 Atl. 514, it was held that a defendant was not compelled to set off a claim for money due and owing against a plaintiff in a prior action on a contract, but could elect to reserve his cause of action for a subsequent independent suit, saying that "while the law encourages, it does not compel, the settlement of all controversies between the same parties by a single action."

In Galena & S. W. R. Co. v. Ennor (1886) 116 Ill. 55, 4 N. E. 762, wherein the plaintiff sought to set off a claim on a note held by him against a judgment rendered in a prior action on contract in favor of the defendant company, the latter claimed that the plaintiff should not be granted the relief he sought, as the set-off could have been interposed in the former action, and his failure to do so constituted a bar to any further proceedings thereon. The court held that although the claim could have been set up in the action at law, that was permissive only, and not compulsory on the defendant.

So, in Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. v. Field (1877) 86 Ill. 270, the court granted to the plaintiff relief in the nature of a set-off to a judgment rendered against him in a former proceeding on contract, wherein he neglected to set up his claim for an indebtedness, although it was the proper subject of a set-off.

In Morton v. Bailey (1835) 2 Ill. 213, 27 Am. Dec. 767, it was held that an administratrix, on the presentation of a claim on contract of a creditor of the decedent's estate, was not required to set off a demand for a debt that existed against the creditor and in favor of the estate, but could maintain a separate and original action on the claim, the court saying: "At common law a defendant could not set off his demand against the plaintiff's debts, and our Statute of Set-off is permissive, but not compulsory. According, then, to the general law of the land, a party defendant is not bound to set off his debt against the plaintiff's demand, except in suits before a justice of the peace. Is there a provision in the 'Act Relating to Wills and Testaments, Executors and Administrators, and the Settlement of Estates,' and the several acts amendatory thereof, requiring administrators, upon the exhibition by a creditor of his claim against the estate, to set off any debt or demand such estate may have against such creditor? The court have looked in vain for any such provision in the acts above enumerated, and are accordingly of opinion that the administratrix was not barred of her action by the proceedings before the judge of probate."

In Dewsnap v. Davidson (1892) 18 R. I. 98, 26 Atl. 902, the court held that the plaintiffs were not estopped from recovering on a breach of contract where it appeared that in a prior action against them to establish a mechanic's lien in favor of the present defendant, the claim sued on was not set up by way of recoupment. The court said: "The plaintiffs were not barred by the decree in the lien suit from bringing an action for the damages sustained by the failure of the defendant to comply with his contract. While they might have offered evidence in the lien suit to recoup the damages sustained, they were not bound to do so, but were at liberty to reserve their claim and to bring suit on it as they have done."

In Frost v. McGinnis (1889) 15 Daly, 113, 3 N. Y. Supp. 241, it appeared that the defendant contracted with a builder to erect certain buildings for him, and, in order to facilitate the completion of the property by the contractor, had made himself personally liable to persons furnishing the materials. It appeared, further, that in a prior action to foreclose certain mechanics' liens upon the buildings the defendant did not plead his demands held against the contractor as a set-off, but in this action brought by a receiver of the builder to recover for work, labor, and services, he attempted to assert the debt due him in set-off. The court held that he could properly do so, as he was not required to plead the claim as a set-off in the former action to foreclose the mechanics' liens, but could elect to reserve his claim for use in a future action as a set-off, or as the basis of an affirmative recovery.

In United States Bldg. & L. Asso. v. United States Bldg. & L. Asso. (1900) 108 Ky. 330, 56 S. W. 422, wherein it appeared that a loan association had suffered judgment in a prior action for usury paid to it by a shareholder, and the association had failed to set up a claim for the proportionate share of the losses and expenses of the concern owed by the shareholder, by way of set-off, the court held that the failure to assert the claim in the prior suit did not bar the association from setting off the amount of its claim in a subsequent action to recover on the judgment rendered in the original suit.

So, in Seiber v. Johnson Mercantile

Co. (1905) 40 Tex. Civ. App. 600, 90 S. W. 516, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's claim for moneys paid was the proper subject of a set-off, which he omitted to assert in a prior action on contract, brought against him by the defendant, the court held that nevertheless the plaintiff could recover, for a defendant in a prior action, having a claim which might be asserted as a set-off or counterclaim, was not obliged so to plead it, but could reserve it for a future suit.

So too, in Thornton v. M'Kewan (1862) 1 Hem. & M. 525, 71 Eng. Reprint, 230, 1 New Reports, 16, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 69, 11 Week. Rep. 140, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as a surety, could have filed his claim for a proportionate part of a dividend on the amount guaranteed as a set-off in a prior action instituted by the defendant on the contract, but failed to do so, the court held that he was not barred from recovering on the claim in an independent suit, for, if he had such independent right of action, he was not precluded from enforcing it merely because he did not choose to plead it as a set-off in the defendant's proceedings.

In Deaver v. Trahey (1917) 98 Wash. 63, 167 Pac. 68, the court held that the plaintiff was not estopped from recovering on a promissory note, by reason of his failure to assert the same as a set-off or counterclaim in a prior action brought against him by the defendant, wherein he might have so pleaded his claim. The court said: "It seems settled by the great weight of authority, in the absence of statute, that a defendant, having a cause of action against a plaintiff wholly independent of the claim and relief sought by the plaintiff in the particular action, is not bound to set up such independent cause of action as a defense in the action, even though his cause is such that he may be permitted to do so; but may bring an independent action to enforce his claim, without being subjected to the plea of another action pending, or of res judicata, as a defense thereto."

In Indiana Farmers' Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Stratton (1892) 4 Ind. App. 566, 31 N. E. 380, wherein it appeared that the defendant, as plaintiff had previously brought suit against the plaintiff in the case at bar, an insurance company, on a policy of insurance, and in that action the company had failed to assert, by way of set-off, a claim on a promissory note made by defendant, the court held that the failure to claim the set-off did not preclude the insurance company from maintaining this action to recover on the note.

In Carver v. Adams (1866) 38 Vt. 500, an action in the state of Vermont to recover on an account which the plaintiff had neglected to plead as a set-off when sued on contract in the state of New York, the court held that under the Vermont rule the plaintiff did not forfeit his right to maintain an independent suit on his claim, by failing to plead it as a set-off in the former action.

Also in Baker v. Alexander (1866) 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. (Eng.) 217, 12 Jur. N. S. 692, an action brought on an award decreed in a prior suit on contract against him, the defendant pleaded by way of set-off a claim on contract which he might have asserted in the original proceedings. The court held that the defendant's failure to assert his claim in the former action constituted no estoppel to his pleading the same as a set-off, for while he had a right to bring the matter in a set-off in the previous suit he was not required to do so.

In Dorsey v. Reese (1858) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 157, wherein the plaintiff sought to set off a note to a judgment rendered against him by default in a prior action on contract, the court held that under the Kentucky Code (§ 151), which provides that he "may set forth in his answer as many grounds of defense, counterclaim, and set-off, whether legal or equitable, as he shall have," the plaintiff was permitted, but not required, to assert his claim in the former action, and a judgment therein was no bar to the relief sought in this independent proceeding.

In La Fullett v. Mitchell (1902) 42 Or. 465, 95 Am. St. Rep. 780, 69 Pac. 916, the court held that the plaintiff, as defendant in a prior action on a contract brought against him by the defendant herein, was not required to set up in his defense a cause of action existing in his favor for a breach of the contract by the prior plaintiff, saying: "Where . . . the action, although between the same parties, is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as a bar or estoppel only as to those matters directly in issue, and not those collaterally litigated."

In Folsom v. Winch (1884) 63 Iowa, 477, 19 N. E. 805, wherein it appeared that the defendant, when sued in a prior action on contract in another state, had suffered judgment without asserting a counterclaim for an indebtedness which existed in his favor, the court held that his failure to set up his claim did not preclude him from asserting it in this action brought by the same plaintiff on the judgment obtained in the foreign jurisdiction.

In Inslie v. Hampton (1876) 8 Hun (N. Y.) 230, wherein it appeared that there was an action on contract pending, in which the present plaintiff was defendant, and the defendant herein plaintiff, and in which action the claim on contract here prosecuted could have been interposed as a counterclaim, the court held that the then defendant was not obliged to file his demands in set-off or counterclaim in the former proceeding, but, if he so elected, could maintain a separate action thereon; that the preclusion under the statute (2 Rev. Stat. 236, § 57) for failure to plead a cause of action as a set-off or counterclaim must be confined to cases, as specified therein, commenced in justices' courts.

In Distributing Corp. v. Perez (1919) 175 N. Y. Supp. 537, wherein it appeared that the defendant had interposed a counterclaim on contract, in an action for money had and received, but subsequently, and before judgment was rendered, withdrew the same, the court held that as the matter stood the defendant was entitled to bring an action on his claim.

defendant, in an action to recover an assessment for stock subscription, of a counterclaim for the amount of the subscription paid, was held not to preclude the bringing of another action to recover the amount of the subscription paid, where the main issue in the prior action was whether subscriptions to a certain amount had been obtained, so as to make the subscriptions binding.

In Goodman v. Benjamin Rutchik (1918) 171 N. Y. Supp. 152, the court held that the provisions of the New York Code of Civil Procedure relative to counterclaims included what was formerly known at common law as recoupment and set-off, and therefore, where it appeared that claims on contract made the basis of the suit at bar had been pleaded in set-off by the plaintiff as defendant in a prior action on contract, but without claiming affirmative relief thereon, it must be held that, the plaintiff having been unable to obtain a judgment in the prior action on his claims, the pendency of that action constituted no bar.

In John Douglass Co. v. Moler (1893) 3 Misc. 973, 22 N. Y. Supp. 1045, it was held that § 507 of the Code of Civil Procedure permitted, but did not compel, a defendant to assert a cause of action by way of counterclaim. The court held that there was no rule of law or practice that required a person having a claim on contract against another, to counterclaim for the same when sued on contract by the other party; but he could defend such action and, whether successful in his defense or not, still retain his right of action for such claim against such person.

In Norton v. Wochler (1903) 81 Tex. Civ. App. 522, 72 S. W. 1025, the court held that the plaintiff's omission to plead as counterclaim in a prior action brought against him on contract by the defendant, matters in contract comprising the basis of his present action, did not bar the plaintiff's right to recover, as the statute authorizing a defendant to plead a claim existing in his favor as a counterclaim was permissive only, and not mandatory.

Treadwell* (1864) 26 Cal. 294; Pollock v. Kinman (1912) 176 Ill. App. 361; Manchester F. Assur. Co. v. Koerner (1895) 13 Ind. App. 372, 55 Am. St. Rep. 231, 40 N. E. 1010, 41 N. (Pa.) 98; Providence-Washington Ins. Co. v. Owens (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 210 S. W. 558; Taggart v. Rice (1864) 37 Vt. 47; Hutchins v. George (1918) — Vt. —, 104 Atl. 108.

In Rauer's Law & Collection Co. v. Sheridan Proctor Co. (1919) — Cal. App. —, 181 Pac. 71, wherein it appeared that in a former action on contract, the defendant had pleaded as a counterclaim the claim on contract set up in the case at bar, but that at the time the claim had not accrued and was not pressed, the court held that the facts did not constitute res judicata, and the defendant was not barred from setting up his claim, as, to constitute a bar, it must be shown that the matter was adjudicated in the prior action.

So too, in Davis v. Bessemer City Cotton Mills (1910) 102 C. C. A. 232, 178 Fed. 784, the court held that setting up a counterclaim on contract in a subsequent action does not violate the well-settled principle that it is not open to a defendant to offer any matter of defense or objection which could have been interposed in the original action on contract, as a counterclaim is a cross action entirely independent of the plaintiff's cause of action, saying: "A defendant is not bound to assert a counterclaim in an action brought against him, nor will the plaintiff's recovery bar a subsequent action on a cause of action which he might have set up as a coun-terclaim,"—quoting from the decision of the court in Woody v. Jordan (1873) 69 N. C. 189, infra.

Also, in Jones v. Leopold (1904) 95 App. Div. 404, 88 N. Y. Supp. 568, it appeared that while an action on contract was pending, the defendants brought suit in another and inferior court on a similar cause of action which could have been interposed as a counterclaim in the pending suit. The court held that the action in the inferior court could not be stayed, as the defendants had a legal right to elect to enforce their claim in an independent action, rather than by counterclaim, especially as it appeared that full relief could not be granted them therein.

In Quick v. Lemon (1883) 105 Ill. 578, it was held that a defendant in an action on contract could elect to plead and prove a claim on contract as a set-off, or reserve the same until after judgment and sue the plaintiff in a separate action, except where the plaintiff's action was brought before a justice of the peace, in which case, the statute required a defendant to bring in all his demands against the plaintiff, unless they exceeded the jurisdiction of the justice, and a failure to do so constituted a bar to a subsequent action maintained thereon.

Where it appeared that a plaintiff attempted without the consent of the defendant, to apply a set-off consisting of a claim in contract existing in favor of the latter as against a claim on contract asserted by the plaintiff, the court held that the matter of pleading a set-off was optional with the defendant, and the plaintiff could not, without his consent, enforce its allowance, saying: "Set-off is only a defense, and may be made or not at the option of the defendant. If he choose, he can withhold it as a defense, and bring an independent action for its recovery. And the plaintiff in a suit, against whom this cross demand exists, has no power or option in the premises. He must submit to whatever course the defendant elects to pursue." Wharton v. King (1881) 69 Ala. 365.

Ala. 160, it was held that failure to plead a claim on contract as a set-off in a former action on contract constituted no bar to an independent and subsequent suit thereon, the court saying: "A defendant, having a right of set-off, or cross action, may, at his election, bring it forward in the suit against him, or bring an independent suit upon it. The rule that a judgment is conclusive, not only as to every matter determined, but as to every matter which might have been set up as a defense to the cause, does not include rights of set-off. A defendant is not bound to plead his set-off; though, if he pleads it, a decision against him is conclusive."

See also Bartlett v. Pearson (1848) 29 Me. 9, wherein there was dictum to the effect that the defendant in a prior action on contract might have set off a claim against the plaintiff arising out of their mutual dealings, but that he was not bound to do so, by law or equity, and could lawfully elect to commence an independent action on his claim.

And see Hendrickson v. Hinckley (1854) 17 How. (U. S.) 443, 15 L. ed. 123, wherein there was dictum to the effect that "there can be no doubt that a party sued at law has his election to set off his claim, or resort to his separate action." In that case, it appeared that the plaintiff purposely omitted to set off his claims arising out of a contract which was the basis of an action at law against him, and sought relief from the judgment granted therein, petitioning the court to try the claims as an offset to the judgment.

See also Collyer v. Collins (1864) 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 467, an action to recover an amount for extra work performed under a contract by the plaintiff to build a schooner for the defendants. It appeared that the defendants had previously brought action against the plaintiff in a foreign court on a breach of the contract, wherein the plaintiff did not plead his claim as a set-off or counterclaim, but in a later action on the judgment obtained in the foreign suit set up the same identical claim made in the case at bar as a counterclaim. The court held that the action on the judgment barred the plaintiff herein from recovering. But in a concurring opinion it was said: "But in a case where the defendant might set up his counterclaim or set-off in answer to the plaintiff's demand, he has his election whether he will do so or bring his cross action."

In Thoreson v. Minneapolis Harvester Works (1882) 29 Minn. 341, 13 N. W. 156, an action to recover damages for a breach of warranty under a contract to sell a chattel, it appeared that the plaintiff had been sued by the defendant in a previous action to recover the purchase price of the chattel, and in that action the claim for damages on the ground of breach of warranty had not been set up by way of defense, set-off, or counterclaim. The court held that the judgment recovered by the defendant in the former action constituted no bar to a recovery for breach of the contract of warranty.

Where, in an action by a vendee against the vendor under a contract of sale to recover damages for a breach of warranty, it appeared that the vendor had secured a judgment against the vendee as defendant, in a former action, and that the latter had not asserted his claim for a breach of warranty as a counterclaim, the court held that the prior judgment was no bar to the second suit, as the plaintiff therein, as defendant before, was not obliged to plead his cause of action in counterclaim but could elect to proceed in an independent action to recover on his claim. Barth v. Burt (1865) 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 628.

And in Bloom v. Arthur Walker & Co. (1919) 175 N. Y. Supp. 150, an action by the buyer of goods against his vendor for a breach of contract in failing to deliver the specified quantity of goods, it appeared that the defendant had sued the plaintiff in a prior action for the purchase price of goods delivered, and in that suit the alleged breach of contract was not pleaded as a counterclaim. The defendant, therefore, pleaded the prior judgment in abatement of this action. It was held that the plaintiff was not required to plead in counterclaim in the former action, but could elect to recover on his claim in an independent suit.

In Parker v. Roberts (1885) 63 N. H. 431, an action by the purchaser of goods to recover damages suffered by reason of a breach of warranty of the quality of the goods, it appeared that the plaintiff had suffered judgment by default in a prior suit brought against him by the defendant to recover the purchase price. The court held that the former judgment was no bar to the action, for if the plaintiff had appeared therein he would not have been obliged to set up the present cause of action as a counterclaim, but could have elected to reserve the claim for a subsequent action thereon.

So, in Bascom v. Manning (1872) 52 N. H. 132, wherein the circumstances were analogous to those stated in Parker v. Roberts (N. H.) supra, the court held that a judgment by default in a prior action to recover the purchase price of goods sold did not preclude a recovery by the purchaser in a subsequent independent action on a breach of warranty under the sale.

In Stillwell v. Hill (1918) 87 Or. 112, 169 Pac. 1174, an action to recover damages occasioned by the failure to deliver a specified quantity of hay to the plaintiff as vendee under a contract of sale, it appeared that the defendant vendor had brought a prior action against the vendee to recover upon the hay actually delivered, and in that action the present plaintiff, as defendant, defended on the ground that the vendor had not performed the contract in that he had not delivered the quantity of hay specified. The defendant pleaded the record and judgment in the former suit as a bar. The court held that the plaintiff's plea in the former action constituted an affirmative denial only, and was not in the nature of a counterclaim; and that, while he might have obtained damages in the previous action by pleading his cause of action as a counterclaim, yet he had an option to plead it as a counterclaim or maintain a separate action on it. See to the same effect: Crabtree v. Kile (1859) 21 Ill. 180; Morgan v. Powers (1867) 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 35; Perley v. Balch (1839) 23 Pick. (Mass.) 283, 34 Am. Dec. 56; Stevenson v. Klepinger (1836) 5 Watts (Pa.) 420; Standefer v. Aultman & T. Mach. Co. (1904) 34 Tex. Civ. App. 160, 78 S. W. 552.

In McKnight v. Devlin (1873) 52 N. Y. 399, 11 Am. Rep. 715, the court held that it was optional with the purchaser of a chattel to recoup his damages occasioned by a failure of title, in an action for the purchase price, or reserve his claim for a future independent proceeding thereon, saying: "It is optional with a defendant whether he will recoup his claim growing out of the same contract upon which the action is brought, or resort to an independent action; and this option is not defeated by a transfer of the claim, and the bringing of a suit in the name of the transferee, except in cases where an indorsee or transferee of negotiable paper acquires a title discharged of all equities, and valid against all defenses."

Where it appeared that the defendant had set up a cause of action for a breach of contract by way of counterclaim, but that in a former action in contract between the same parties, in the same capacities, the defendant had neglected to plead his claim, and judgment had been rendered against him and the plaintiff pleaded the former judgment as a bar to the counterclaim, the court held that while the general rule as to defenses was well settled that a judgment was conclusive as to all matters which might have been presented therein, counterclaims and set-offs were expressly excepted from the rule by the statute (Ky. Code 1902, § 17), and a defendant could elect to set up a claim in his favor either by way of set-off, counterclaim, or cross petition, or, at his option, waive the statutory privilege and subsequently assert the claim in another action, or maintain an independent and original proceed-

In Mason v. Summers (1887) 24 Mo. App. 174, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had interposed his claim for a breach of contract as a counterclaim in a prior action on the contract, but withdrew the same before judgment was rendered therein, the court held that the matter was not adjudicated in the former suit, and although the plaintiff, as defendant therein, might have pleaded by way of counterclaim, he was not bound so to plead, but could recover in a separate action.

In Anderson v. Rogge (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 28 S. W. 106, it appeared that the defendant had interposed the same counterclaim for breach of contract in a prior action on the contract brought against him by the plaintiffs, but in that proceeding he failed to appear at trial and prove the same. The court held that the judgment in the former action did not estop the defendant from asserting the counterclaim, saying: "As to this counterclaim, appellant was the plaintiff; and inasmuch as the record shows affirmatively that he was not present, prosecuting his suit, the only effect that should be given to that judgment, in reference thereto, is a dismissal for want of prosecution."

In Ogden v. Pioneer Iron Works (1904) 91 App. Div. 394, 86 N. Y. Supp. 955, the defendant asked for a stay of proceedings pending the determination of a prior action brought by him against the plaintiff in another court, to recover the unpaid purchase price due under a contract, wherein it was contended that plaintiff could have interposed the claim on contract here sued upon, as a counterclaim. The court refused the granting of the motion, holding that the plaintiff, as defendant before, could elect to enforce a claim by an action in the forum of his choice, rather than submit it by way of counterclaim in the suit of his opponent.

In Davidson Chemical Co. v. Andrew Miller Co. (1913) 122 Md. 134, 89 Atl. 401, it was held that a defendant in an action on contract, who had pleaded a claim for a breach of contract by way of set-off, could properly withdraw the plea before evidence was given thereon, and maintain a separate independent action to recover on the claim.

In Jones v. Charles Warner Co. (1912) 2 Boyce (Del.) 566, 83 Atl. 131, the court held that in actions on contract for goods sold and delivered, or for work, labor, and services performed under a contract, the defendant could, at his election, either avail himself of a breach of the contract by way of counterclaim, or sue in an independent action to recover the damages sustained; but an election to avail himself of one might preclude the subsequent use of the other.

See to the same effect: Barker v. Cleveland (1869) 19 Mich. 230; Kauffman v. Raeder (1901) 54 L.R.A. 257, 47 C. C. A. 278, 108 Fed. 171; McKinney v. Springer (1851) 3 Ind. 59, 54 Am. Dec. 470; Epperly v. Bailey (1851) 3 Ind. 72.

In Ives v. Van Epps (1839) 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 155, wherein it appeared that the defendant had a claim for a breach of contract in his favor against the plaintiff, the court held that he could elect to maintain an action on his claim, or set it up by way of recoupment in the present action on contract, saying: "Where a man brings an action for breach of a contract between him and the defendant, and the latter can show that some stipulation in the same contract was made by the plaintiff, which he has violated, the defendant may, if he choose, instead of suing in his turn, recoup his damages arising from the breach committed by the plaintiff, whether they be liquidated or not. The law will cut off so much of the plaintiff's claim as the cross damages may come to."

So, in Jones v. Witousek (1901) 114 Iowa, 14, 86 N. W. 59, wherein the plaintiff sued for a breach of guaranty which he had failed to assert by way of counterclaim in a prior action on contract brought against him, the court held that as the former action was in a justice's court, and the coun-terclaim exceeded the jurisdiction, the plaintiff could not have pleaded his cause therein (Iowa Code, § 4477); and in any event he was not obliged to do so under § 3440 of the Code, since a set-off or counterclaim may or may not be pleaded, as the defendant may elect, and unless pleaded the right to sue on it in a future action, or rely upon it as a defense, is not impaired by a prior judgment against the former defendant.

In Foster v. Milliner (1868) 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 385, the court held that where it appeared that, in a former action on a contract to repair brought against the plaintiff, his claim for a breach of the contract was set up by way of counterclaim, but was withdrawn before judgment under a stipulation between the parties, the judgment in the prior action constituted no bar to his suit brought to recover for the breach of contract.

In Mimnaugh v. Partlin (1887) 67 Mich. 391, 34 N. W. 717, an action to recover damages for imperfect work, it appeared that the plaintiff, when sued in a prior action to recover the value of the services, failed to plead his claim as a set-off. The court held that the contention of the defendant herein that the plaintiff was estopped from maintaining his action because of failure to assert the same as a set-off in the prior suit was erroneous, saying: "The defendant might have recouped the damages he recovered in his suit against Mimnaugh, but he was not obliged to do so or lose his claim. In case a party neglects to set off a claim when he has an opportunity to do so, he does not thereby preclude himself from recovering his demand, but he will not be allowed any costs in a suit to enforce such claim."

In Davenport v. Hubbard (1873) 46 Vt. 200, 14 Am. Rep. 620, an action to recover damages occasioned by the defendant's breach of contract to dig a cellar for the plaintiff within a specified time, the defendant pleaded a former judgment in his favor, in an action to recover the value of his services, as a bar to the plaintiff's suit. The court held that the judgment constituted no bar to the plaintiff's recovery, for, as defendant before, he could use his claim as a set-off, or forbear and use it as the basis for recovery in a separate action.

See to the same effect: Ornauer v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1912) 52 Colo. 632, 123 Pac. 650; Davis v. Hedges (1871) L. R. 6 Q. B. (Eng.) 687, 40 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 276, 25 L. T. N. S. 155, 20 Week. Rep. 60; Walkup v. Mesick (1905) 110 App. Div. 326, 97 N. Y. Supp. 142.

In Jennison Hardware Co. v. Godkin (1897) 112 Mich. 57, 70 N. W. 428, an action to recover for the value of goods sold and delivered, the court held that the omission of the plaintiff to assert his claim as a set-off in a prior action, brought by the defendant for damages on account of defects in the goods sold, constituted no bar to his maintaining an independent action on his claim.

In Kerr v. Blair (1909) 55 Tex. Civ. App. 349, 118 S. W. 791, an action for goods sold and delivered and services rendered, it appeared that, in a former action by the defendant against the plaintiff to recover for a breach of contract, plaintiff did not assert his claim as a set-off. The court held that he was not thereby precluded from recovering on the claim, since there was no obligation on him to plead it as a set-off in the former suit.

In Miller v. Baillard (1908) 124 App. Div. 555, 108 N. Y. Supp. 973, an action to recover money paid for the construction of a certain machine for the plaintiff by the defendant which it was alleged the defendant refused to deliver, the defendant merely interposed a defense, and subsequently instituted a separate action against the plaintiff for services rendered and materials furnished. The court refused to consolidate the actions, holding that, while the defendant might have interposed a counterclaim for his demands, he was not required to do so, but had a right to maintain a cross action thereon in a proper court of his own choosing.

In Riley v. Hale (1893) 158 Mass. 240, 33 N. E. 491, wherein it appeared that in a former action by a lessor against his lessee for rents under the lease, the lessee did not assert by way of recoupment a claim in his favor for a breach of the lessor's covenant of quiet enjoyment, the court held that his failure to assert his claim in the prior action did not bar him from maintaining a subsequent independent action to recover the damages arising under the claim, since the right to set up a claim in recoupment was a privilege which the defendant was not bound to avail himself of.

And see Reiner v. Jones (1899) 38 App. Div. 441, 56 N. Y. Supp. 423, wherein it was held that, in an action to recover rents due, the defendant tenant could elect to counterclaim for damages occasioned by the breach of a covenant to repair, resulting in a loss of rental value, or he could reserve his cause of action for an independent suit thereon. But in that case it appeared that the defendant counterclaimed for damages to stock caused by a leaky roof, which the court held was not a proper subject of counterclaim in a suit by a landlord to recover rents due.

So in New York v. Mabie (1855) 13 N. Y. 151, 64 Am. Dec. 538, the court held that in an action by a lessor for rent, the tenant under the lease could elect to recoup his damages occasioned by a breach of covenant in the demise, or bring a separate action thereon.

In Morgan v. Smith (1876) 7 Hun (N. Y.) 244, it was said that it was a privilege of a tenant, when sued for rents due under a lease, to counterclaim damages by reason of the plaintiff's failure to place the tenant in the possession of the light he was entitled to enjoy under the lease. But as the action was brought against the sureties on the lease, the court held that they could not set up the counterclaim unless it was shown that the tenant was insolvent.

In Parsons v. Crawford (1885) 64 N. H. 23, 3 Atl. 632, a former suit by the defendants as plaintiffs against the present plaintiffs, to recover damages for a breach of covenant under a contract to rent property, was held to be no bar to an action brought by the prior defendants in their capacity as lessors to recover the unpaid rental of the premises, the court holding, inferentially, that the claim sued on was not required to be pleaded in the prior action, and therefore the judgment rendered therein was not a bar.

Where it appeared that the lessor of property failed to counterclaim for rent due in an action brought against him by the lessee, the court held that the omission did not bar his right to subsequently recover the rent in an independent action, holding that the provision of the Code which bars a counterclaim, unless set up in an action brought against the party in whose favor it exists, refers only to a cause of action arising out of, or connected with, the same transaction set forth as the basis of the plaintiff's claim. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 488, subd. 1, § 439. Brosnan v. Kramer (1901) 135 Cal. 36, 66 Pac. 979.

In Fiske v. Steele (1890) 152 Mass. 260, 25 N. E. 291, an action on a judgment founded on a promissory note, the defendant filed a set-off consisting of items of account which had accrued before the judgment in the original action was rendered, but which the defendant had not asserted therein. The court held that the defendant's omission to plead his claim before judgment did not preclude him from asserting it in the action on the prior judgment.

In Dilley v. Ratcliff (1902) 29 Tex. Civ. App. 545, 69 S. W. 237, the plaintiff sued to recover damages occasioned by the failure of the defendants to deliver promptly certain machinery to be used in connection with the operation of a cotton gin. It appeared that the defendants had successfully maintained a prior action against plaintiff on a note given to secure the purchase price of the machinery, and in that action the present claim was not pleaded in set-off. The court held that while the plaintiff could have pleaded the damages for the breach of contract in set-off to the defendants' action on the note, he did not do so, and therefore his cause of action was not drawn into that suit; nor did his failure so to plead his claim estop him from recovering on the same in an independent action.

In Gillespie v. Torrance (1862) 25 N. Y. 306, 82 Am. Dec. 355, a much-quoted case in New York, the court reiterated and restated the rule, as laid down in former decisions, that where a defendant had a claim for a breach of warranty, which could have been asserted by way of set-off, recoupment, or counterclaim in a pending action against him on a promissory note, he was not obliged to interpose his claim as such, but had an election so to use it, or bring an independent action to recover thereon. The court said: "It has always been optional, as is suggested above, since the doctrine of recoupment has gained a foothold in the courts, with a party who has sustained damages by fraud or breach of warranty in the purchase of goods, when sued for their price, to set off or recoup such damages in that action, or to reserve his claim for a cross action."

In Gilmore v. Williams (1894) 162 Mass. 351, 38 N. E. 976, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had not availed himself of the privilege of setting up his claim of breach of warranty in a prior action brought against him on a promissory note, the court held that the judgment therein was no bar to his action, as the present plaintiff, as defendant in the former action, could elect to set up his claim as a recoupment or reserve the same for an independent suit for damages.

See to the same effect: De Sylva v. Henry (1836) 3 Port. (Ala.) 132; Hunt v. Brown (1888) 146 Mass. 253, 15 N. E. 587; McDonald v. Christie (1863) 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 36; J. S. May-

In North Baltimore Bottle Glass Co. v. Altpeter (1907) 133 Wis. 112, 113 N. W. 435, wherein the defendant interposed a counterclaim in a suit for damages occasioned by a breach of contract, which it appeared he had also used as a counterclaim in a prior suit on certain promissory notes, wherein judgment by default was granted to the plaintiff, the court held that the defendant's failure to appear in the former action amounted to a waiver of the counterclaim, which was not adjudicated therein, and as the counterclaim constituted an independent cause of action, which he was not compelled to present as a counterclaim, the failure so to plead it in the prior proceedings did not estop the defendant from interposing it in a separate suit.

Where a defendant interposed a cross demand for certain sums due and owing in an action in equity, which, although available as a set-off, he had omitted so to plead in a prior action on purchase-money notes at law, the court held that the omission did not preclude the setting off of the demand in the subsequent proceeding in equity, saying: "It is not compulsory on him to make it, and the judgment does not preclude its future introduction." Weaver v. Brown (1888) 87 Ala. 533, 6 So. 354.

In Wright v. Anderson (1889) 117 Ind. 349, 20 N. E. 247, it appeared that the plaintiff, as defendant in a prior action to recover on a promissory note, filed a counterclaim based on an equitable right, but failed to include therein a claim for money had and received. Subsequently he brought the suit at bar against the plaintiff in the prior proceeding, to enforce the legal right omitted in the former counterclaim. The court held that as all distinctions between law and equity were abolished by the Code of Practice, the plaintiff could have made his counterclaim in the prior action sufficiently broad to have included his legal remedy, but he was not required to do so, and, having failed to include that right, was not estopped from maintaining an original action thereon.

In Fairfield v. McNany (1873) 37 Iowa, 75, the court applied a statute (Iowa Rev. Stat. § 2621) which reads as follows: "Judgment obtained in an action by ordinary proceedings shall not be annulled or modified by any order in an action by equitable proceedings, except for a defense which has arisen or been discovered since the judgment was rendered. But such judgment does not prevent the recovery of any claim, though such claim might have been used by way of set-off, counterclaim, or cross demand in the action in which the judgment was recovered." It was held that the defendant was not barred by a judgment in default against him, on a note given in part payment for land, from bringing action upon a bond for title for a breach thereof, and therefore he was not obliged to pay a judgment obtained in that action, to the plaintiff, as a creditor of the judgment debtor.

See also Trautwein v. Twin City Iron Works (1893) 55 Minn. 264, 56 N. W. 750, wherein it was held that a judgment in a prior action on a breach of warranty under a contract was no bar to a subsequent suit by the judgment defendant to recover on a promissory note, given pursuant to the contract. In that case, however, it appeared that the defendant in the case at bar had brought suit in a former action to recover on a promissory note, in which suit the plaintiff in the case at bar had counterclaimed for breach of warranty; and, further, that before trial in the former action the plaintiff, by leave of the court, withdrew his cause of action, and judgment was given for the defendant on his counterclaim. This action being brought to recover on the judgment, the defendant interposed his claim on the promissory note as a counterclaim.

See also Fabbricotti v. Launitz (1851) 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 743, an action by a payee to recover on a note for the price of goods sold, wherein it appeared that the defendant set up by way of recoupment a claim for damages occasioned by the nondelivery of the goods, and it appeared further that the defendant had instituted a separate action to recover on his claim. The court held that the defendant must elect between his recoupment and the separate and independent action.

In Secor v. Siver (1914) 165 Iowa, 673, 146 N. W. 845, it was held that the recovery of the purchase price by the seller did not bar the buyer from thereafter bringing an action for damages for fraud in making the sale, unless, in a former action, he actually put the fraud in issue.

And in Linderman Mach. Co. v. Hiltenbrand Co. (1919) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 81, it was held that a failure to assert a counterclaim for fraud and deceit in inducing one to purchase a machine, in an action for the purchase price, did not preclude the assertion of the claim for fraud and deceit in a subsequent action.

In Kirven v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. (1907) 77 S. C. 493, 58 S. E. 424, an action for damages sustained by the plaintiff from the use of fertilizer manufactured and sold by the defendant, it appeared that the defendant had successfully maintained a prior action in a Federal court to recover on certain notes given by the plaintiff to secure the purchase price of the fertilizer, and in that action the plaintiff, as defendant therein, withdrew his defense based on the claim for damages. The court held that the cause of action for damages was not adjudicated in the former proceedings, nor was the plaintiff, as defendant therein, obliged to assert it.

In Sykes v. Bonner (1871) 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. (Ohio) 464, an action to recover damages for the alleged malpractice of a physician, wherein it appeared that the latter had recovered a judgment by default against the plaintiff for the value of his services, the court held that the question of malpractice was not in issue, and the prior judgment constituted no bar to the present action, for, although the plaintiff, as defendant in the former proceeding, could have pleaded her damages by way of counterclaim therein, she was not obliged to do so, since her damages exceeded the jurisdiction of the court, and the only penalty she could suffer for failing to appear therein would be the loss of costs in her subsequent action, as provided by the statute. Code, § 95, 2 Swan & C. 979, 1 Swan & C. 804, § 202.

So, in Hall v. Clark (1855) 21 Mo. 415, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was a vendee under a contract of sale, had suffered damages by reason of the fraudulent representations of the defendant, the vendor, but had failed to plead his damages in a former action brought against him to recover the purchase money under the contract. The court held that the prior judgment was no bar to the prosecution of the action based on the fraud, saying: "In cases in which the defendant is sued for the purchase money of property, and he has sustained injury by the fraudulent misrepresentations or misconduct of the plaintiff respecting the subject of the sale, pending its negotiation, he may, at his option, recoup his damages in an action against him to recover the purchase money, or he may bring a separate action for the deceit. Such a defense is of the nature of a set-off, which a party may use or not, at his election; and a failure to use it as a set-off will not debar him from his action for the fraud."

And see Sinclair v. Neill (1874) 1 Hun (N. Y.) 83, 3 Thomp. & C. 77, wherein it was said that a party, induced by fraudulent representations to purchase a store with its stock of goods and fixtures, could maintain an independent action for damages occasioned by the fraud, or he could make use of his right for the recovery of damages by way of recoupment, or counterclaim, in reduction of the seller's claim for the purchase price.

In Price v. Macomber (1914) 163 Iowa, 406, 144 N. W. 1020, it appeared that the defendant had suffered judgment in a foreign jurisdiction in an action on a contract. In an action on the judgment the defendant offered, by way of set-off, a claim for fraud, inducing him to enter into the contract. The plaintiff replied, pleading the defendant's failure to assert the set-off in the first action as a bar to its assertion in the second. The Iowa Code (§ 3440) provided as follows: "Judgment obtained in an action by ordinary proceedings shall not be annulled or modified by any order in an action by equitable proceedings, except for a defense which has arisen or been discovered since the judgment was rendered; but such judgment does not prevent the recovery of any claim, though such claim might have been used by way of counterclaim in the action on which the judgment was recovered." It was held that the cause of action in fraud was not lost by a failure to set it up as a defense, set-off, or counterclaim in the plaintiff's original action.

In McLane v. Miller (1847) 12 Ala. 643, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had not pleaded a claim in a former action on contract in which he was a defendant, for the wrongful taking of a slave, the court held that he was not barred from bringing an independent action to recover damages for injury caused by the trespass.

Also in Ward v. Fellers (1854) 3 Mich. 281, it was held that the defendant, in an action on contract, could elect to pursue his remedy for damages sustained by the plaintiff's negligence by way of recoupment in the original action, or institute a separate and independent suit to recover on his claim.

In Watson v. Cowdrey (1880) 23 Hun (N. Y.) 169, it appeared that in a former action to recover for services rendered, in which the plaintiff was defendant, and the defendant was the complainant, the present cause of action for conversion was set up as a counterclaim, but on motion of the former plaintiff was stricken out. The court held that the prior action constituted no bar to the later proceeding, as the matter herein claimed upon was not litigated or pleaded, and the party in whose favor it existed had the right to recover thereon in a separate action.

In DeGraaf v. Wyckoff (1889) 118

N. Y. 1, 22 N. E. 1118, the court held that a judgment in a prior suit on contract in which a claim in tort might have been, but was not, set up as a counterclaim, constituted no estoppel to a proceeding on the claim, as the defendant in the former action was not obliged to counterclaim on his cause of action, but could sue thereon independently.

In McCord-Collins Commerce Co. v. Levi (1899) 21 Tex. Civ. App. 109, 50 S. W. 606, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff did not plead his claim for damages occasioned by the defendant's fraudulent misrepresentations, as a counterclaim in a prior action on contract brought by the latter, the court held that the judgment rendered in that action was not a bar to a recovery by the former defendant, suing independently on his claim.

See also Schwinger v. Raymond (1880) 83 N. Y. 192, 38 Am. Rep. 415, to the effect that, in an action by a carrier against the shipper of goods for freight charges, the shipper could pay the freight and sue for damages occasioned by the negligence of the carrier, or, refusing to pay, submit to suit and set up his damages as a counterclaim, or bring an independent action thereon.

In Fitzhugh v. McKinney (1890) 43 Fed. 461, the proceeding was in equity to enjoin a judgment recovered against the plaintiff by the defendant in a former action, and allow a set-off and payment which the plaintiff had failed to assert therein. The court held that, while the statute (Tex. Rev. Stat. 1879 ed. title 21, arts. 649, 650) allowed the pleading of a set-off or counterclaim "founded on a cause of action arising out of, or incident to, the plaintiff's cause of action," the defendant in the prior suit was not required to do so, and his failure so to assert his claim would not preclude him from the relief sought in the case at bar; adding that the most that could be claimed on account of such a failure would be to charge him with costs of the subsequent action.

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hargus

(1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 99 S. W. 580, an action to cancel a policy of life insurance on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant's general agent, the court held that the pendency of an action by the agent against the insured to recover on a note given by the latter to secure a premium under the policy constituted no bar to the plaintiff's right to the relief sought, since he was not obliged to demand the cancelation of the policy in the former action.

In Jordan v. Underhill (1904) 91 App. Div. 124, 86 N. Y. Supp. 620, an action to compel an accounting by the defendant of his dealings and transactions as an agent of the plaintiffs, it appeared that the defendant had instituted a prior action to determine the amount of wages due him for services, and in that action the present plaintiffs had not interposed a counterclaim as they might have done. The court held that the first action constituted no bar, since it did not necessarily involve the matters made the basis of the second action; and that, while the present plaintiffs could have entered a counterclaim in the prior action, for the relief herein demanded, they were not obliged to do so.

So, in Wright v. Salisbury (1870) 46 Mo. 26, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as defendant in a prior action on a promissory note, had interposed a claim in equity by way of set-off, but, on the former action coming to trial, had abandoned it, the court held that the prior judgment did not conclude the enforcement of the plaintiff's equitable claim in an independent action, for, having been abandoned as a set-off in the former suit, it must be treated as though never having been raised therein, and, as the defendant had a right to elect to pursue his claim by set-off or in an independent action, his abandonment of the set-off showed an election to reserve the claim for a subsequent original action thereon.

In Judah v. Brandon (1841) 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 506, wherein the defendant contended that equitable claims set forth in the complainant's bill should have been pleaded as a set-off in a former action brought by the defendant to recover on a bond, and that the plaintiff, having failed to do so, was therefore concluded by the judgment in the former suit, the court held that the Statute of Set-off was passed for the benefit of defendants, and was not compulsory; that the right to set off a claim could be waived, and an independent action maintained thereon.

In Campbell's Gas Burner Co. v. Hammer (1915) 78 Or. 612, 153 Pac. 475, wherein it appeared that it was possible for the plaintiff corporation to have secured the equitable relief sought, by filing a cross bill in a former action on contract brought against it in a court of law, the court held that it was not essential that such a course should have been pursued, for, as defendant before, the corporation could safely rely on a legal defense without being precluded from asserting its equitable rights in an independent suit.

In Smith v. Fleischman (1897) 23 App. Div. 355, 48 N. Y. Supp. 234, an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the defendant contended that the action was barred by the pendency of a prior suit brought by him against the plaintiff to recover on a breach of the contract, wherein the plaintiff, as defendant, could have counterclaimed. The court held that while the plaintiff could have interposed his claim in the former action as a counterclaim, he was not obliged to do so, especially since it appeared that, the former action being in law, he would have been restricted to a judgment for money damages, and could not have foreclosed his lien.

In Betts v. Connecticut L. Ins. Co. (1905) 78 Conn. 442, 62 Atl. 345, wherein it appeared that the receiver of an insolvent corporation had recovered a judgment against an officer of the corporation for a neglect of duty, and in that proceeding the officer had neglected to claim a set-off for salary due him, the court held that he was entitled to the relief sought, viz., to have his claim set off against the judgment rendered in the prior proceeding.

So, in Perkins v. Oliver (1896) 110 Mich. 402, 68 N. W. 245, it was held that the judgment in a former action in tort, in which the present plaintiff was defendant, was not conclusive as to a subsequent action brought by the plaintiff on a claim on contract which he might have, but did not, put in litigation by setting up the same as a matter in set-off or recoupment.

In Smeaton v. Cole (1903) 120 Iowa, 368, 94 N. W. 909, it was held that, where the defendant in an action in tort had a claim for a debt due and owing from the plaintiff, he was not obliged to plead it as a set-off or counterclaim, but could elect to make it the subject of a separate and distinct action; and, therefore, the petitioner was not obliged, nor did he have a right, to assume that the defendant would interpose his claim by way of a set-off or counterclaim, rather than by a separate action, so as to oblige the petitioner to plead in anticipation of the defendant's claim.

In Sowden v. Murray (1909) 114 N. Y. Supp. 164, an action for work, labor, and services performed on a garment, the defendant pleaded in abatement a prior suit in tort brought by the defendant against the plaintiff to recover for damages to the garment while in the plaintiff's possession, on the ground that the plaintiff should have pleaded its claim as a cross demand in the former action. The court held that while the plaintiff might have so pleaded its cause of action in the defendant's suit, it was not required to do so, and could elect to reserve the claim for an independent action thereon.

So, in DIAMOND ICE & STORAGE CO. v. KLOCK PRODUCE CO. (reported herewith) ante, 685, an action to recover storage charges, it appeared that a prior action had been maintained by the defendant against the plaintiff to recover for the conversion of certain produce which it had stored with the latter, and in that action the present claim was not asserted as a set-off or counterclaim. The defendant having raised the question of the prior judgment as a bar to this action, the court held that it did not estop the plaintiff from recovering.

In an early case, Sintzenick v. Lucas (1793) 1 Esp. (Eng.) 44, an action to recover damages suffered by the unskilful performance of services by the defendant, the court held that the plaintiff was not precluded from recovering because of the fact that he had not pleaded his cause of action in a prior suit brought against him by the defendant to recover for the services rendered. See to the same effect, Rigge v. Burbidge (1846) 15 Mees. & W. 598, 153 Eng. Reprint, 988, 15 L. J. Exch. N. S. 309, 4 Dowl. & L. 1.

In Johnson v. Reeves (1901) 112 Ga. 690, 37 S. E. 980, the court held that a defendant having a claim on contract was not obliged to set it up by way of set-off in an action against him in tort, and held, further, that though both causes of action were on contract, or in tort, the court did not, by its decision, wish to be understood as intimating that the defendant would be obliged to set off his cause of action.

See also Powell v. Davis (1857) 19 Tex. 380, wherein the court said: "It would seem as matter of practice, if not of principle, that, to entitle the defendant to go behind the judgment to assert a claim for improvements, he ought to show some sufficient excuse for his failure to claim them in his answer to the prior action in trespass. If such excuse be shown, it is not perceived that there is anything in principle which would deny his right afterwards to assert the claim, as the right to pay for improvements is not dependent wholly upon the statute."

6. Prior action in tort; claim in tort.

In SEAGER v. FOSTER (reported herewith) ante, 690, an action to recover damages sustained in an automobile collision, it appeared that another action was pending in which the present plaintiff was being sued for damages sustained by the defendant by reason of the same accident. The defendant pleaded the pending action in abatement of the plaintiff's suit, contending that the plaintiff could have alleged his damages therein by way of set-off, counterclaim, or cross petition. The court held that although the plaintiff might so have set up his cause of action, he was not obliged to do so.

In Rabb v. Patterson (1894) 42 S. C. 528, 46 Am. St. Rep. 473, 20 S. E. 540, it appeared that the plaintiff, when sued by the defendant to establish a title to land, did not assert in that action a claim for rents and profits received by the defendant while in possession of the land. The court held that the failure to assert the claim constituted no bar to a recovery thereon in an independent action, saying: "When A. sues B. to recover a specific tract of land or a specific sum of money, B. may content himself with defending himself against the claim of A. as set up in his complaint; he need go no further, although he may go further if he chooses. Not so, however, with A.; he must exhaust himself in regard to the specific tract of land or specific sum of money sued for; afterwards, he cannot make as a cause of action against B. any claim he had as to the land or to the money."

In Jacobs v. Jacobs (1919) — Or. —, 180 Pac. 515, an action to recover the rents and profits of real estate, it appeared that in a former partition action the plaintiff, as defendant therein, did not set up her claims for rents and profits. The court held that she was not obliged to do so, and, as the complaint in the former proceeding did not bring in issue the question of rents and profits, the judgment rendered therein was not conclusive, nor did it constitute a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover.

In Stewart v. Turner (1917) 67 Pa. Super. Ct. 255, an action by an employer against his agent for a breach of contract to sell goods, it appeared that the agent had instituted prior proceedings in equity to restrain the employer from selling goods to others in his territory, and in that action the plaintiff had not set up the claim for damages based on the agent's breach. The court held that, notwithstanding the decree in the former proceedings, the plaintiff could maintain this action, as there was no legal obligation to assert the claim in the prior action.

Compare Rogers v. Wiggs (1851) 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 504, wherein the court held that a defendant in an action in equity to rescind a contract for the sale of land ought to have set up any claim which he had for rents in order that a complete equitable adjustment could have been made. The court said: "The rents and improvements were an equitable incident to the suit for rescission, peculiarly appropriate to the suit in chancery, and not having been adjusted in that suit, we are of opinion that a court of law does not afford a remedy to recover either." That case, however, seems to have been decided on the theory that the plaintiff sought relief in a forum that could not afford him a remedy, and not on the ground that the failure to assert the set-off constituted a bar. But if the latter was the controlling rationale for the decision, it must be held that this case has been overruled by the great weight of authority in the state.

In Ocean Shore Development Co. v. Hammond (1918) — Cal. App. —, 175 Pac. 706, it was claimed that, as instalments under a contract were due at a time when an action for the rescission of the contract was instituted by the defendant herein, the plaintiff, who was defendant in the former action, was obliged to set up his cause of action as a counterclaim, or lose the right to sue thereon. The court held that § 422 of the California Code of Civil Procedure is permissive only, and the plaintiff was not obliged to avail himself of the right to counterclaim, but could reserve his action for a future independent suit.

In Stauffer v. State Bank (1916) 201 Ill. App. 306, the court held that no statute in the state of Illinois required parties to an action for an accounting, begun in a circuit court, to plead a set-off or counterclaim on contract, and that an independent action could be brought thereon.

Following and quoting Roach v. Privett (1890) 90 Ala. 391, 24 Am. St. Rep. 819, 7 So. 808, set out supra, II. b, 1 (a), it was held in New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Fry (1904) 143 Ala. 637, 111 Am. St. Rep. 62, 42 So. 57, that the plaintiff was not required to plead an indebtedness as a set-off in a prior suit to partition real property, but could reserve her rights and sue in an independent action.

In Kennedy v. Davisson (1899) 46 W. Va. 433, 33 S. E. 291, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff omitted to plead his claim on a contractual agreement as a set-off in a prior action in equity, brought by the defendant, the court held that he was not thereby precluded from recovering upon the same in this action, as a set-off could be pleaded as such, or, at the defendant's election, the claim could be reserved for a separate suit.

So, in Weston v. Turner (1887) 8 N. Y. S. R. 296, the court held that a judgment in a prior action to settle partnership affairs, in which the defendant's claim on contract was not directly involved, was no bar to the present proceeding to have the claim allowed as a set-off against the judgment; that if the claim could have been interposed in the prior action as an equitable counterclaim, it was not incumbent on the defendant therein to do so.

In Harris v. Schrimper (1918) — Iowa, —, 169 N. W. 750, an action for damages for breach of covenants of warranty, the existence of a right of way by easement over the granted premises constituting the breach, it was held that a former action against the defendants to quiet title in real estate as against their claim of an easement by right of way in which they failed to appear, did not bar them from pleading a counterclaim in the case at bar, alleging that in the real agreement the easement was excepted from the covenants of warranty, but that by the mistake of the scrivener the exception was not written in the deed, and praying for a reformation of the instrument.

In Simmang v. Braunagel (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 27 S. W. 1032, an action by the plaintiff as indorsee on a note, the defendant contended that the plaintiff was barred from recovering by reason of the pendency of an action against him by the defendant, to cancel the note on the ground of lack of consideration. The court held that the pending action was no bar, since the plaintiff had no interest therein except to defend, and it was not incumbent or obligatory on him to ask for a judgment on the note, but he could elect to bring an independent suit for that purpose.

In Grady v. McCorkle (1874) 57 Mo. 172, 17 Am. Rep. 676, wherein it appeared that in a suit against a widow to compel the specific performance of a contract to convey land, the defendant did not assert her right of dower, the court held that the decree rendered in that action did not abate the widow's right, and that she was not precluded from maintaining an action to recover her dower, that question not having been raised, nor required to be put in issue by the defendant, in the former proceedings.

In Huntzicker v. Crocker (1908) 135 Wis. 38, 115 N. W. 340, 15 Ann. Cas. 444, wherein it appeared that in a prior action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of real estate, the plaintiff's right of dower was not raised by her, or litigated in any way, the court held that the prior decree was not res judicata as to the dower, and did not preclude the plaintiff from establishing that right.

So, in Malloney v. Horan (1872) 49 N. Y. 111, 10 Am. Rep. 335, an action by a widow to establish her dower right in lands belonging to her deceased husband, it appeared that in a former action brought by the creditors of the husband for a sale of the property, the wife was made a party defendant, but did not plead her right of dower. The court held that while she might have obtained relief in the creditor's action by way of a cross petition, she was not obliged to do so.

In an action to recover damages for fraudulent representations inducing the plaintiffs to enter into a partnership with the defendant, it appeared that a prior action was maintained for a dissolution of the partnership and an accounting. The court held that, conceding the plaintiffs might have interposed a counterclaim for the relief sought herein in the prior proceedings, they were not under any obligation to do so, but were entitled to reserve it to be sued on as a separate cause of action. Newgent v. Alsberg (1916) 173 App. Div. 878, 160 N. Y. Supp. 71.

In Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Field (1906) 132 Mo. App. 628, 97 S. W. 179, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as defendant in a similar prior action, could have secured the relief sought herein, viz., the enforcement of a tax lien, by filing a cross bill, the court held that the failure to plead and set up the claim in a cross bill did not deprive the plaintiff of his right to maintain an independent action to enforce his claim, especially as the matter was not involved in the former action in which the plaintiff, as defendant therein, had an election to plead his claim or reserve his rights for a future action.

And in Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Scutt (1884) 22 Fed. 710, the court held that the plaintiff was not bound to set up its cause of action for the enforcement of certain license contracts by a cross bill in a pending action for the rescission of the contracts, brought against it by the defendant, and the pendency of another action and failure to assert the claim therein constituted no bar to an independent proceeding to recover on the claim.

In Long v. Lackawanna Coal & I. Co. (1911) 233 Mo. 713, 136 S. W. 673, it was held that the plaintiff, as defendant in a prior suit in equity, was not obliged to set up in his answer in that action matters entitling him to affirmative equitable relief, but could reserve his claims for a separate action. The court said: "The defense of a prior suit pending applies only when the plaintiff in both suits is the same person, and both are commenced by himself, and not to cases where there are cross suits by a plaintiff in one suit, who is a defendant in the other, because it cannot be said that either is prosecuting two actions against the other within the rule in question."

In Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. v. Wisner (1899) 38 App. Div. 369, 56 N. Y. Supp. 723, an action to compel an accounting by the defendant for his acts as president of the plaintiff corporation, it appeared that the defendant had instituted a prior action against the corporation for an accounting for money due and owing to him. The court held that the prior action was no bar to the proceeding, since the corporation, as a defendant therein, could not have recovered affirmative relief except by joining issue and interposing a counterclaim, and this it was not obliged to do.

In Hobbs v. Duff (1863) 23 Cal. 596, wherein it appeared that the plaintiffs claimed in part on a claim for a balance due on a judgment for foreclosure, which, in a former action for specific performance, could have been asserted as a set-off, the court held that the failure so to use the same was no bar to a subsequent action thereon, saying: "It is clear that a party does not lose his right to bring a separate action for a demand which he might have pleaded as a set-off, but neglected to do."

And in Kaplan v. Coleman (1912) 180 Ala. 267, 60 So. 885, the general rule was succinctly stated and applied in the following terms: "It is the settled rule that an independent cross claim or right, not directly involved in the issues to be determined by the original suit, need not be there asserted, but its assertion and enforcement may be postponed for independent subsequent action." The court held that while a party might have filed a cross bill to an executor's suit, contesting the validity of a will, he was not required to do so, as the prior suit, which was maintained for a construction of the will, did not necessarily involve the issue of its validity.

In Blackwell Durham Tobacco Co. v. McElwee (1886) 94 N. C. 425, wherein it appeared and was contended that the equitable relief sought by the plaintiff could be obtained in a similar equitable action pending, in which the parties were reversed, the court held that there was no obligation imposed upon the plaintiff, as defendant in the pending action, to assert a claim by way of set-off, and, if he so elected, he could make it the subject of an independent action of his own. See to the same effect: Osborn v. Cloud (1867) 23 Iowa, 104, 92 Am. Dec. 413; Lloyd v. Reynolds (1868) 29 Ind. 299; Rapier v. Gulf City Paper Co. (1879) 64 Ala. 330.

In Axtel v. Chase (1882) 83 Ind. 546, it was contended that the plaintiff could have secured the relief sought by foreclosure in the case at bar, by interposing a cross complaint in a former action in equity, in which she was the defendant and the defendants herein the plaintiffs; and that, by failing to do so, her right of action was abated. The court held that a former suit concludes the parties only as to matters in issue in that suit, and that a defendant, in whose favor a claim exists against the plaintiff, can elect to reserve the cause of action for a future and independent proceeding thereon.

In Uppfalt v. Woermann (1890) 80 Neb. 189, 46 N. W. 419, an action to enforce specific performance of a contract, it appeared that in a former proceeding brought by the defendant to eject the plaintiff from the premises in question, the plaintiff did not plead the equities which were the basis of the suit at bar. The court held that he was not obliged to do so, but could elect to pursue his remedy in an independent action, saying: "Where he seeks affirmative relief by setting up a contract which will give him the right to demand specific performance, this must be done by answer in the nature of a counterclaim. In such case he becomes an actor in fact, and plaintiff in the matter therein set forth, and such counterclaim does not come under the term defense. In effect, it is a cross action in which the defendant seeks affirmative relief. He is not compelled to seek this relief in an action of ejectment, any more than he is required to set up a set-off or counterclaim in other cases."

In Olschewske v. King (1906) 43 Tex. Civ. App. 474, 96 S. W. 665, the court held that a party defendant in an action to determine the title to real property was not obliged to assert therein his right to rescind a sale of the property on the ground of fraud, and that his failure to do so did not estop him from maintaining an independent action to rescind, although the former suit was still pending.

In Witte v. Lockwood (1883) 39 Ohio St. 141, wherein it appeared that the matters set up as a basis of the plaintiff's equitable claim constituted a proper subject for a counterclaim, which he had omitted to assert in a prior action to obtain possession of property, brought against him by the defendant, the court held that the plaintiff was not precluded thereby from obtaining the relief sought, as the statute (Ohio Civ. Code, § 95; Rev. Stat. § 5073) only provides that a defendant who omits to set up a counterclaim or set-off cannot recover costs against the plaintiff in a subsequent action thereon.

So, in Hill v. Cooper (1876) 6 Or. 181, an action in equity to enforce the terms of an imperfect deed, it was contended by the defendant that the plaintiff had waived his right to equitable relief by failing to claim the same by way of a cross bill in a former action at law to recover the possession of the land, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff. The statute (Code 630, § 377) provided as follows: "Where the defendant is entitled to relief arising out of the facts, requiring the interposition of a court of equity and material for his defense, he may, upon filing his answer therein, also, as plaintiff, file a complaint in equity in the nature of a cross bill, which shall stay the proceedings at law." The court held that the statute did not make it incumbent on the plaintiff, as defendant before, to file his claim by way of a cross bill, or, failing to do so, be forever barred from obtaining relief in a subsequent action in equity, but was permissive in its nature, giving to him an election either to file a cross bill or to maintain an independent action.

In Levy v. Hohweisner (1905) 101 App. Div. 82, 91 N. Y. Supp. 552, an action for the replevin of a chattel, the court held that the omission of the defendants to pray judgment for a return did not preclude them from any subsequent action to regain possession of the chattel.

In Dedman v. Nally (1892) 14 Ky. L. Rep. 229, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was evicted from certain real estate under a judgment rendered in a prior action, in which he had omitted to claim for the value of certain improvements made by him on the premises, the court held that, while in the former proceedings the plaintiff could have counterclaimed for the value of the improvements, he was not obliged to do so, and that the judgment rendered therein was no bar to an independent action to recover on the claim.

In Stone v. Darnell (1860) 25 Tex. Supp. 430, 78 Am. Dec. 582, an action by the plaintiff to recover back money paid by him as the purchaser of premises at a sheriff's sale, it appeared that the defendant had previously maintained an action in ejectment against the plaintiff. The court held that while the plaintiff could have pleaded his demand in reconvention in the former action, he was not obliged to do so, and that he was not deprived of his right of action by his failure so to plead.

Proc. Rep. 81, 65 N. Y. Supp. 964, the court held that the failure to plead a counterclaim in an action by a landlord against his tenant for summary dispossession, did not preclude the tenant from asserting his cause by way of counterclaim in a subsequent action against him to recover rents due and unpaid, holding specifically that § 2244 of the Code of Civil Procedure could not be so construed as to require a defendant to plead and litigate in summary proceedings any counterclaim which he might have, arising out of the relation of landlord and tenant.

In Wright v. Broome (1896) 67 Mo. App. 32, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had rendered services in the training and feeding of certain race horses belonging to the defendant, the court held that he was entitled to a recovery on a quantum meruit, although in a former action against him to recover the possession of the horses he did not set up his claim for services rendered.

So, in Barclay v. Blackburn (1831) 6 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 115, it was held that a judgment in detinue, in an action wherein the defendant did not assert his claim for services in the keeping of a horse, the property distrained, was no bar to an independent action on that claim.

In Sheetz v. Baker (1890) 38 Ill. App. 349, wherein it appeared that in a distress proceeding brought by a landlord against his tenant certain property of the tenant was wrongfully converted, but that in the distress suit the tenant did not assert the conversion as a set-off, the court held that his failure to do so did not forfeit his right subsequently to maintain an independent action against the landlord for the conversion.

In Woody v. Jordan (1873) 69 N. C. 189, wherein the defendants pleaded that the plaintiff had a complete remedy available in a pending action brought by them against him to secure the possession of property, and in which he should plead his claim in tort by way of counterclaim, the court held that the pending action was no bar to the plaintiff's independent suit, saying: "It is not a general rule that a defendant is obliged to assert a set-off or counterclaim in an action against him whenever he may do so. If he does plead a counterclaim, he cannot, during the pendency of that action, have a separate action upon it, and he is bound by any adjudication on it. But he is not bound by the plaintiff's recovery as to any set-off or counterclaim which he did not plead."

In Morgan v. Tims (1906) 44 Tex. Civ. App. 308, 97 S. W. 882, the court held that it was optional with the defendant in distress proceedings to reconvene his damages occasioned by the unjust and illegal issuance of the distress warrant in those proceedings, or to bring a separate suit to recover therefor; and where it appeared that the defendant adopted the latter course, the judgment in the prior proceedings was held to constitute no bar to his right to recover.

In Collier v. Cunningham (1891) 2 Ind. App. 254, 28 N. E. 341, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was suing for the value of a certain crop of wheat alleged to have been converted by the defendant, was the assignee of a lease of land by the terms of which the former lessee was precluded from assigning the lease, but which the plaintiff took without knowledge of the prohibitory clause. The defendant, as the lessor of the premises, on learning of the assignment, immediately brought an action in ejectment against the plaintiff, and a judgment was rendered in his favor for the possession of the land, but in that action the question as to the right of ownership of a crop of wheat, raised and cut by the plaintiff before the action was brought, was not litigated. The court held that the plaintiff assignee was not required to raise the issue of ownership of the wheat in the ejectment suit, but could reserve that claim for an original action to recover for its conversion.

675, wherein it appeared that a mortgage debtor, relying on an agreement made with the mortgage creditor, omitted to assert certain claims for moneys advanced by way of set-off in an action on certain promissory notes and to foreclose a mortgage, brought by the creditor, the court held that the judgment rendered therein constituted no bar to an independent action brought by the debtor to recover on his claims, where it appeared that the creditor, after judgment rendered in the prior action in his favor, refused to carry out the terms of the agreement.

In Gregory v. Clabrough (1900) 129 Cal. 475, 62 Pac. 72, it appeared that the plaintiff, as the assignee of a claim for a sum of money paid by a mortgagor under a mistake of law to the defendant, a mortgagee, brought this action to recover thereon. The defendant claimed that the matter was a proper subject for a counterclaim in a prior foreclosure action, and therefore was barred under the provisions of § 439 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court held that the action to recover the sum paid by mistake was not connected with the subject of the foreclosure action, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was not barred by failure to assert his claim therein as a counterclaim.

17. Prior action for foreclosure; claim in equity.

In Shakespeare v. Caldwell Land & Lumber Co. (1907) 144 N. C. 516, 57 S. E. 213, wherein it appeared that the facts set up by the plaintiff might have been made the basis of an equitable counterclaim in a former action to foreclose a mortgage, in which the plaintiff, as defendant, did not plead, the court held that the judgment rendered in the prior action was not res judicata, as the defendant therein was not required to assert his counterclaim.

18. Prior action for divorce; claim for divorce.

In Cook v. Cook (1912) 159 N. C. 46, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 83, 74 S. E. 639, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1137, an action for divorce from bed and board brought by the plaintiff wife, the husband pleaded in abatement of the action a prior and pending suit for absolute divorce brought by him against his wife. The court denied the plea, holding that while the wife could have asserted her cause in a cross petition, which is in the nature of a counterclaim, she was not required to do so, but had a legal right to elect to maintain a separate and independent action.

In Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Kirven (1909) 215 U. S. 252, 54 L. ed. 179, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 78, affirming (1907) 77 S. C. 493, 53 S. E. 424, it was held that a statute (Code of Procedure of South Carolina, §§ 170, 171), while giving to a defendant the right to assert or set up a counterclaim in an action brought against him, was not so construed by the state courts as to require the defendant so to assert his claim, but if the matter was not pleaded as a defense a subsequent and independent action could be maintained thereon.

In Shankle v. Whitley (1902) 131 N. C. 168, 42 S. E. 574, the court held that the pleading of a counterclaim was optional, saying: "The defendant was not estopped to set up his counterclaim in this action, because he might, if he had chosen, have pleaded it in a former action against him by the plaintiff, brought for a different cause of action."

And in Livermore v. Bainbridge (1873) 44 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 361, it was held that the defendant was not obliged to set up by way of counterclaim a demand in his favor against the plaintiff, but was at liberty to institute a cross action for the same. But it appearing that the defendant elected to maintain a separate action, which action was still pending, the court held that he could not interpose the same claim as a counterclaim, as the law does not favor double vexation for the same cause of action.

In M'Credy v. Fey (1838) 7 Watts (Pa.) 496, wherein the court said, in construing the Act of Defalcation relative to the right of a plaintiff to a nonsuit, that there was nothing in the act requiring a defendant to plead a claim in his favor as a set-off; he could do so, or, at his option, bring an action against the plaintiff for it.

In Douglas v. First Nat. Bank (1871) 17 Minn. 35, Gil. 18, the court held that the provisions of a statute (Pub. Stat. § 72, chap. 60) which required the interposition of a claim, or, failing so to interpose, the cause of action would be abated, were no longer in force, and a judgment in an action in which a claim might have been, but was not, asserted by way of set-off or counterclaim, was no bar to a subsequent independent action to recover on the claim.

In Clement v. Clement (1904) 113 Tenn. 40, 81 S. W. 1249, an action by an executrix on a certificate of benefit issued by a benefit association, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff made certain beneficiaries parties defendant to her suit, the court held that, at their option, the defendants could assert claims in their favor by way of cross bill, or file an original bill to secure the amount of their claims.

In Connery v. Brooke (1873) 73 Pa. 80, an action to establish an easement over the defendant's premises, the court held that the judgment in a former action, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff to recover damages occasioned by the plaintiff's tearing down a gate erected by the owner of the premises across the alleged right of way, constituted no bar to the later action, as the two proceedings were different causes of action and the plaintiff, as defendant before, was not required to set up his claim in the prior action.

In Bishop v. Bishop (1915) 162 Ky. 769, 173 S. W. 180, wherein it appeared that the defendant, having a claim available as a set-off, had neglected to assert it in an action against him in a foreign jurisdiction, in which judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, the court held that under a statute (Kentucky Civil Code of Practice, § 17) the former judgment did not prevent the defendant from asserting any claim which was not, though it might have been, used as a defense or set-off in the former action.

And in Minor v. Walter (1821) 17 Mass. 237, it was held that the statute (Mass. Stat. 1817, chap. 185), permitting a defendant in an action to assert a claim by way of set-off, was not intended to compel anyone to plead a set-off, and the privilege could be waived at the defendant's election, and a separate action maintained by him to recover on the claim.

So, in Jefferson v. Western Nat. Bank (1911) 144 Ky. 62, 138 S. W. 308, the court construed § 17 of the Kentucky Code, which reads as follows: "A judgment obtained in an ordinary action shall not be annulled or modified by any order in an equitable action, except for a defense which arises, or is discovered, after the rendition of the judgment. But such judgment does not prevent the recovery of any claim which was not, though it might have been, used as a defense by way of set-off or counterclaim in the action." It was held that a party having a claim which could be set up by way of counterclaim or set-off could elect so to use it, or maintain a separate action thereon, and a failure to assert the claim as a set-off or counterclaim in a former action was no bar to a subsequent independent suit on the claim.

And in Tompkins v. Gerry (1892) 43 Ill. App. 255, it was held that the pendency of an action in which the claim of the plaintiff could have been asserted as a set-off did not bar an independent proceeding to recover on the same, since the statute (Practice Act, § 30) was permissive only, giving to a defendant the right to interpose a claim by way of set-off, but not compulsory so as to bar recovery in a subsequent action because of failure to assert the claim as a set-off.

In Gutchess v. Daniels (1872) 49 N. Y. 605, it appeared that the defendants had expressly agreed to waive their rights to a set-off, but subsequently, in an action brought against them, they attempted to assert a claim by way of set-off. The court held that they were bound by their agreement, as, having the right by law to elect to set off a claim or maintain an independent action thereon, they were not required to plead the claim in set-off, and were bound by an agreement not to do so.

In Green v. Law (1805) 2 Smith (Eng.) 668, it was held that there was no compulsion on a defendant to plead a set-off, and, at his option, he could institute and maintain an independent action on his claim, although such a procedure, unless warranted, was not countenanced by the courts, and parties so acting would incur the odium of being obstinate and litigious characters.

In Kezar v. Elkins (1879) 52 Vt. 119, wherein it appeared that a judgment was rendered against the plaintiff in a prior action wherein he was a defendant, but did not appear or set off his claim, the court held that the judgment did not conclude the plaintiff's claim, as he was not required to offset the same in the prior action.

In City Nat. Bank v. Gardner (1884) 5 Ky. L. Rep. 682, the decision is abstracted as follows: "A judgment at law does not affect the right of the defendant to recover on a claim which was not, although it might have been, pleaded as a set-off or counterclaim in the action."

In Rankin v. Harper (1853) 4 Ind. 585, the court held that a defendant could elect to assert a claim in his favor as a set-off in an action brought against him, or could maintain an action thereon independent of the plaintiff's suit.

In Manufacturers' Bottle Co. v. Taylor-Stites Glass Co. (1911) 208 Mass. 593, 95 N. E. 103, it appeared that the plaintiff's cause of action was pleaded by him as a set-off in a pending suit brought by the defendant. The court postponed a determination of the defendant's plea of abatement pending the hearing of a demurrer to the set-off, in the pending action, and, upon learning that the demurrer was sustained and the set-off dismissed, the court overruled the plea of abatement. However, the court said: "We are of opinion that it is more equitable, where a second action is brought for a cause that was made the foundation of a former suit which is defective in some essential particular, to allow the plaintiff to discontinue the former suit upon proper terms, and proceed with the later one, rather than to order an abatement of the last action, and compel him to begin anew after the termination of the first suit. In the present case it appears that the claim could not be maintained under the declaration in set-off, because it was unliquidated. Perhaps it would have been better to have compelled the plaintiff to elect between the two actions when the answer in abatement first came up for a hearing, . . . by an order for an abatement, unless the declaration in set-off was abandoned."

See also Carpenter v. Butterfield (1802) 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 146, wherein there is dictum as follows: "It is not compulsory on a party to set off his demand. He has a right, if he chooses, to waive a set-off and resort to his action." The matter involved in that action, however, was held not to constitute a proper subject of set-off, as the claim had not matured at the time the prior action was brought.

In Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Sargent (1875) 27 Ohio St. 233, the court held that a party defendant must present all his matters in defense, and, if he fails to do so, will not afterward be permitted to relitigate the matter. But the court expressly excepted from the effect of this ruling rights secured to parties by law, naming counterclaim, offset, or cross actions.

In Lawrence v. Bank of Republic (1865) 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 142, the court said by way of dictum: "And although counterclaims, which are not merely defenses, but admit of affirmative relief beyond dismissing the plaintiffs' complaint, are not lost by not being set up, nothing prevents their being set up if connected with the subject of action." And also: "Of course, where affirmative relief as a counterclaim is sought, although the Code does not expressly require that it should be asked for, it would seem more proper that it should be so in some way."

In Summet v. City Realty & Brokerage Co. (1907) 208 Mo. 501, 106 S. W. 614, the court said: "A party must try his entire cause of action or make his entire defense in the same action, and will not be permitted to split up the cause of action or defense into several parts and litigate each separately, when all the matters properly and naturally relate to the subject-matter in litigation and could properly and logically have been tried in the same cause; but this rule does not extend to matters which are wholly independent of and have no relation or connection with the subject of the litigation, such as set-off or counterclaim, without they are actually set up and adjudicated."

See also Ruppert v. Haug (1881) 87 N. Y. 141, wherein the court said, by way of dictum, that the defendant in an action in which a warrant for attachment was granted was not obliged to set up a claim in his favor as a counterclaim, and although judgment went against him it would be no bar to a future independent action to recover on the claim. The case, however, involved only the sufficiency of an affidavit for a warrant of attachment.

In Blodgett v. Berlin Mills Co. (1872) 52 N. H. 215, the court said, speaking of a claim for damages by way of recoupment: "The defendant has the election whether he will set up his claim in answer to the plaintiff's demand, or resort to a cross action; and, whatever may be the amount of his damages, he can only set them up by way of abatement, either in whole or in part, of the plaintiff's demand. He cannot, as in case of set-off, go beyond that, and have a balance certified in his favor." But the case did not involve a failure or omission to assert a claim in a prior action by way of set-off, recoupment, or counterclaim.

In Dunham v. Bower (1879) 77 N. Y. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 570, it was said: "Whenever recoupment is sought, the party entitled to it may interpose it as a defense or bring a cross action, and in general it is optional with him which course he will adopt. . . .

This proceeds upon the ground that recoupment is, in effect, the setting off of distinct causes of action." But the court held that the matter on which the plaintiff sought to recover should have been asserted as a defense in a prior action, and the rules relating to recoupment, therefore, did not govern.

In Franke v. Franke (1896) 15 Ind. App. 529, 43 N. E. 468, wherein the court said: "The defendant, in making his defense, cannot plead a part only of his defenses, and then, after judgment has been rendered, plead and have the benefit of those not interposed originally. He must interpose all of the defenses which he has, and as to them, whether pleaded or not, the judgment is conclusive; but it is not conclusive as to an affirmative right or cause of action which he may have against the plaintiff, and of which he could have taken advantage not by way of defense, but by way of cross action. His affirmative right is the subject of an independent action, and he may or not take advantage of it by way of cross action, as may to him seem best. He is not compelled to do so; neither will his rights with reference thereto be adjudged. But his failure to take advantage of the opportunity to set up such affirmative right by way of cross action is often detrimental to his interests."

And see Zinn v. Dawson (1899) 47 W. Va. 45, 81 Am. St. Rep. 772, 34 S. E. 784, wherein there was dictum as follows: "The satisfaction of a judgment may be wholly or partly produced by compelling the judgment creditor to accept in payment a judgment against him in favor of the judgment debtor, or, in other words, by setting off one judgment against another. This is usually brought about by a motion in behalf of the party who desires to have his judgment credited upon, or set off against, a judgment against him. The court, in a proper case, will grant the motion. Its power to do this cannot be traced to any particular statute, and exists only in virtue of its general equitable authority over its officers and suitors." In that case, however, it appeared that the plaintiffs sought relief by way of an injunction to restrain the defendants from collecting their judgment, obtained by default in a prior action, on the ground of the insolvency of the defendants, in order to allow the plea of a set-off existing in favor of the plaintiffs. The court held that this was not the proper remedy, stating the proper procedure to be as set forth in the foregoing dictum.

In Huntton v. Russell (1879) 41 Mich. 316, 2 N. W. 38, there was dictum to the following effect: "If the claim made had not consisted of payments, but had arisen in some other way, so as to have constituted a proper matter of set-off, then the only effect of defendant's not appearing, pleading, and proving the same would be that in an action thereafter brought to recover the same he could not recover costs under the statute."

See also Kafka v. Simon (1869) 3 Or. 555, wherein there is dictum to the following effect: "It is true, no doubt, that when there are mutual independent claims between two parties, that neither can sue the other and compel him to bring in his claim as a set-off or counterclaim."

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Bitner (1879) 15 W. Va. 455, 36 Am. Rep. 820, it was said that a party defendant should be left to his election to set up a claim in his favor as a recoupment to the plaintiff's action, or maintain a separate suit upon it. But in that case it did not appear that the claim was the proper subject of set-off or recoupment in a prior action. To the same effect, see: Cary v. Bancroft (1833) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 315, 25 Am. Dec. 393; Berry v. Henslee (1866) 38 Mo. 392; Emery v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. (1888) 77 Mo. 339; Francis v. Edwards (1877) 77 N. C. 271.

III. Limitation of rule.

a. Claim arising out of subject of former action.

It is now provided by statute in some states that a party defendant, having a claim or demand arising out of the transaction embodied in the complaint as the plaintiff's cause of action, or directly connected with the same, must interpose his claim as a set-off or counterclaim, and a failure so to plead it forever bars recovery in a separate action.

Thus, in Jeremy Fuel & Grain Co. v. Mellen (Utah) supra, wherein the counterclaim interposed by the defendant arose out of the transaction made the basis of a prior action by the plaintiff, in which the defendant failed to assert it, the court held that the omission to plead the counterclaim in the former suit barred the defendant from raising it under the provisions of a statute (Comp. Laws 1907, § 2970) which required the assertion as a counterclaim of a claim arising out of the transaction set forth in the plaintiff's complaint.

In Paulson v. Oregon Surety & Casualty Co. (1914) 70 Or. 175, 138 Pac. 838, wherein the plaintiff sought to charge the defendants with a trust in certain real property, it appeared that the defendants had successfully maintained a prior action against the plaintiff to foreclose the deeds to the property, which deeds were made the basis of this action. The court held that, as the plaintiff's claim arose out of the subject-matter which was made the cause of action in the prior proceedings, he was required to assert his claim therein, and could not relitigate

In Bartholomay Brewing Co. v. Haley (1897) 16 App. Div. 485, 44 N. Y. Supp. 915, an action by the plaintiff brewing company to recover the purchase price of a quantity of beer sold and delivered, the defendant pleaded in abatement a pending action for breach of contract brought by him against the plaintiff. The court held that the plea in abatement was good; that, the present cause of action being on the same contract and transaction as that involved in the prior and pending suit, the plaintiff should have asserted his cause of action as a counterclaim therein, and, failing to do this, the pending proceedings were a bar to his action.

Where, in an action on a judgment, the defendant asserted a counterclaim which arose out of the agreement which was part of the subject-matter of the action in which the judgment was rendered, and which he had failed to plead therein, the court held that the judgment was a bar to the subsequent assertion of the counterclaim in an action thereon. Calwon v. Watson (1887) 6 N. Y. S. R. 610.

In Ward v. Gore (1868) 37 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 119, an action to compel a partnership accounting, it appeared that the defendant had instituted a prior action which was still pending, for the same purpose. The court held that the second action could not be maintained, as it was based on the same transaction and asked for the same relief as in the pending action, and therefore any claim for relief set up by the plaintiff in the second action should have been asserted by counterclaim.

In Paccalona v. Peninsula Bark & Lumber Co. (1912) 171 Mich. 605, 137 N. W. 158, an action to recover credit for an amount of bark furnished under a contract, it appeared that the plaintiff had been sued in a prior action by the defendant, to recover an excess of payment under the contract. It appeared further that in that action the plaintiff's claim was not set up as a counterclaim or set-off, and on this ground the defendant pleaded the judgment in the prior suit in abatement of the suit at bar. The court held that the plaintiff was barred from recovery on his claim, as its substance was essential to the judgment in the prior action, having arisen from the same transaction, and therefore was adjudicated by the former decision.

In Stevens v. Home Sav. & L. Asso. (1898) 5 Idaho, 741, 51 Pac. 779, 986, the court held that where a defendant had a cause of action arising out of the same transaction set forth as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action, he was required to set up his claim by way of cross complaint, and a failure to do so abated the right to recover thereon in a subsequent action.

See also Scott v. Waggoner (1913) 48 Mont. 536, L.R.A.1916C, 491, 139 Pac. 454, wherein the court said that by statute (Mont. Rev. Codes, §§ 6540, 6541) a defendant is required to plead by way of counterclaim any cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, and if the defendant fails so to do, neither he nor his assignee can afterward maintain an action against the plaintiff thereon. But in that case it did not appear that the defendant omitted or failed to set up his cause by counterclaim.

As a general rule, a party cannot recover in an independent action on a claim which he failed to plead in a prior action by way of set-off or counterclaim, but which was necessarily adjudicated by the former judgment or decree.

Thus, in Blodgett & O. Co. v. George S. Lings & Co. (1912) 194 Fed. 569, the plaintiff attempted to recover on a cause of action which, in a prior suit brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, had been withdrawn or dismissed by consent. It appeared, however, that the substance of the present claim had been relied upon as a defense to the former action, and as such had not been withdrawn. The court held that, while the affirmative claim was dismissed in the previous suit, the substantial issue thereof, relied upon as a defense, was not withdrawn, and was necessarily adjudicated in the prior action, and that the judgment therein bound the plaintiff.

In Douglas v. Troxell (1918) 181 Ky. 623, 205 S. W. 683, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover on a cause of action which, it appeared, he had made the basis of a defense in a prior suit, the court held that the judgment in the prior action was res judicata as to the plaintiff's claim, and that he could not recover on the same in this action; nor was it possible for him to maintain his action under the statute (Code, § 17), since that section only made clear the right to recover on a claim which was not, though it might have been, used as a defense by way of counterclaim or set-off in the former action, and did not provide for cases where the claim was interposed purely in defense.

Where it appeared that a defendant in a former action had availed himself of part of a claim against the plaintiff, and had used the same as a matter of defense, but did not assert it as a counterclaim, the court held that he was barred from recovering on the claim in an independent action, saying: "But counsel for the plaintiff persuasively argues that . . . this case is not violative of the rule against splitting causes of action, because his client did not plead the failure of the bank to perform its covenant as a counterclaim, and did not claim any recovery on account of it in the action on the note, but interposed that breach and the damages from it in support of his defense that the consideration of his note had failed, and for that purpose only. But the same facts which constituted this defense to the note also constituted a counterclaim against the bank, upon which the vendee might have recovered, in his action upon the note, the judgment for $19,000 which he now seeks to obtain. If these facts had constituted matter purely defensive, it is conceded that he would have been barred from again presenting them if he had not interposed them in the action upon the note. But, as they established both a defense and an affirmative cause of action, he might have reserved them, and have permitted judgment against him upon the note, and that judgment would not have estopped him from subsequently maintaining his affirmative cause of action in an independent suit for the breach of the covenant of the bank." Watkins v. American Nat. Bank (1905) 67 C. C. A. 110, 134 Fed. 36.

So, in Thayer v. Kansas Loan & T.

Co. (1900) 41 C. C. A. 106, 100 Fed. 901, wherein it appeared that in a previous suit between the parties the plaintiff had availed himself of a claim on a contract of guaranty, and had set up the same as a matter of defense in reply to the defendant's cross complaint, the court held that, judgment having been rendered against him in the prior action, the plaintiff could not maintain this independent suit to recover on the same matter which he had previously used as a defense; that the judgment in the former suit in effect decided that the plaintiff could not recover from the defendants.

In Bryan v. Jones (1912) 133 Ga. 719, 75 S. E. 1117, the plaintiff, as defendant in a former action brought by the administrator of a deceased person to recover certain gold and currency held by the complainant, defended on the ground that the money was given to him in return for services rendered to the intestate, and judgment was rendered in his favor. In an action to recover the value of services rendered to the defendant's intestate, the court held that, while the plaintiff had not claimed affirmatively for the value of his services in the prior action, nevertheless the judgment rendered in his favor necessarily decided that he was paid therefor by the gift of currency and gold in full satisfaction of his claim.

In State v. McBride (1884) 76 Ala. 51, it appeared that a prior action was brought against a county tax collector and the sureties on his official bond to recover taxes collected, but not accounted for. In that proceeding judgment by default was rendered against the defendants, who sought in the case at bar to go behind the judgment and set off certain claims in favor of the collector. The court held that as the statute (Ala. Code 1876, §§ 414, 421) required the collector to make a final settlement with the auditor, in which he should state all claims existing in his favor, his failure to appear and make the proper defense precluded him and his codefendants from setting off the claims after judgment had been rendered, holding that the judgment was res judicata as to all such claims because they would have been necessarily involved, if the case had been litigated, and a failure to assert them constituted an estoppel against any right to present them in a subsequent proceeding.

Where in a prior foreclosure proceeding judgment was rendered against the defendant, by the terms of which every interest and claim in and to the premises which he then had were forever barred, the court held that the decree was conclusive as to his claim as plaintiff in the case at bar, to a right of easement in the premises. Springer v. Darlington (1902) 198 Ill. 121, 64 N. E. 709.

In L. Bucki & Son Lumber Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. (1901) 48 C. C. A. 455, 109 Fed. 411, it appeared that in a former action brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, the latter had interposed by way of recoupment one of a number of claims arising by way of breach of warranty in the same transaction. In an action to recover on the causes of action which were not set up in the former suit by way of counterclaim, the court held that when the contract was ended the claims of each party for alleged breaches, and damages therefor, constituted an indivisible demand; and when the same, or any part of the same, was pleaded and judgment rendered thereon, the judgment constituted a bar to demands which might have been litigated therein.

In Brown v. First Nat. Bank (1904) 66 C. C. A. 293, 132 Fed. 450, writ of certiorari denied in (1904) 196 U. S. 641, 49 L. ed. 631, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 796, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, who, as defendant in a prior action brought against him by the defendant, had used a portion of an indivisible cause of action as a defense, the court held that he thereby estopped himself from maintaining an independent action to recover on the claim, holding that a defendant has an election to use an affirmative claim as a defense in an instant action, or to reserve the same, and maintain an independent suit or cross action, and if he elects to reserve the same, the judgment in the action against him does not bar his right to subsequently maintain it; that, on the other hand, if he uses his claim or any part of it as a defense, he is estopped from thereafter recovering on it in an independent action.

Where in a prior partition suit of certain real estate the rights of the various parties were fully determined, including the claim of the defendant for rent due from the plaintiff, the court held that by the decree in the partition suit the defendant's set-off for rent due was barred, having been determined and adjudicated in the prior action. Barnes v. Huffman (1904) 113 Ill. App. 226.

So, in Hess v. Miller (1901) 99 Ill. App. 225, wherein it appeared that the appellant brought suit in replevin against the appellee for the recovery of a mare, and obtained judgment therein, and afterwards the appellee brought this action to recover the value of the mare, and obtained a judgment in the court below, it was held on appeal that the judgment below must be reversed, since the decision in the replevin suit necessarily decided the appellant's right to the property in question, and therefore constituted a bar to this proceeding to recover the value of the replevined property.

In Merriam v. Woodcock (1870) 104 Mass. 326, an action to recover damages for the negligent performance of services by the defendants, it appeared that in a former action, brought by the defendants to recover for services rendered, the plaintiff in the case at bar pleaded the negligent performance and the consequential damages as a defense, but did not claim the same by way of recoupment. The court held that the judgment in the former action was a bar to the present proceeding, and that the plaintiff could not recover, since the claim relied on was necessarily adjudicated in the prior suit.

In Nemetty v. Naylor (1882) 63 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 387, affirmed in (1885) 100 N. Y. 562, 3 N. E. 497, an action by a tenant to recover damages for an alleged breach of an agreement to make repair, it appeared that in a prior action summarily to dispossess the tenant, the latter did not claim in set-off or counterclaim for the breach of the agreement. The court held that while a defendant, under the general rule, has a right to elect to maintain a separate action on a claim existing in his favor, this right did not exist in the present case, as the judgment in the former action necessarily negated the facts alleged in the case at bar as the basis of a cause of action.

So, in Davis v. Tallcot (1854) 12 N. Y. 184, an action to recover for a breach of agreement by an improper performance under a contract to manufacture certain goods, it appeared that the defendants had successfully maintained a prior action on the same agreement, wherein the question of proper performance on their part became essential and controlling in the rendering of a decision. The court held that, irrespective of the question of the plaintiffs' failure to plead their claim by way of recoupment, they were barred from maintaining the present action by the prior judgment, for the subject-matter herein was necessarily involved and adjudicated in the former action.

In American Grocery Co. v. Pirk (1899) 25 Misc. 727, 55 N. Y. Supp. 606, an action to recover damages for a breach of specifications under a contract to perform work, labor, and service, and furnish materials, on the ground that the materials so supplied were defective, it appeared that the defendant had sued the plaintiff in a former action, to recover the value of services rendered and materials furnished under the contract, and in that action judgment was had against the plaintiff. The court held that plaintiff could not maintain the action, as the subject-matter thereof was necessarily involved and adjudicated in the prior suit.

In Bell v. Mutual Mach. Co. (1909) 150 N. C. 111, 63 S. E. 680, wherein it appeared that, in a prior action brought by the defendant against the plaintiffs to recover the value of services rendered under a contract to repair a boat owned by the plaintiffs, the defendant had recovered judgment, the court held that that judgment was an adjudication of the matter set up as the basis of plaintiffs' present action; and although the plaintiffs' claim might have been the subject of a counterclaim in the former action, nevertheless the judgment rendered therein took away its foundation as a subject for an independent suit.

In Rankin v. Hooks (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 81 S. W. 1005, the court held that a judgment against the plaintiff in a prior suit brought by the defendant for forcible detainer of certain premises was a bar to the recovery by the plaintiff of the value of the use of the premises for a term remaining after the former judgment, as a material issue in that suit was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the premises, and that matter was adjudicated against him.

So, in Cameron v. Hinton (1899) 92 Tex. 492, 49 S. W. 1047, affirming (1898) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 48 S. W. 24, an action by a mortgagor for the conversion of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee under replevin, it appeared that the mortgagee had maintained a prior suit for foreclosure, in which the property was replevied and sold. The court held that the judgment rendered in the mortgagee's foreclosure action was a bar to the mortgagor's right to recover upon the alleged conversion, for that matter was necessarily involved and adjudicated therein.

And in Murphy v. Wallace (1888) 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 509, the court held that the judgment rendered in a prior action brought against the plaintiff's assignor by the defendant necessarily involved the claim of the plaintiff, although it was not set up in the former action, and therefore the judgment in the prior action was an adjudication thereof. The court said: "The plea of res judicata applies not only to the points upon which the court was actually required to pronounce judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, by exercising reasonable dil-

1. Action to determine title to real property.

In several jurisdictions a judgment rendered in a prior action to determine the title to real property constitutes a bar to a subsequent action by a party to the former suit to recover on a claim which he neglected to interpose therein, since the nature of that action makes it imperative that all adverse claims should be presented therein in order to effect a complete settlement of the controversy.

Thus, in Green v. Glynn (1880) 71 Ind. 336, it was held that the statute relative to actions to recover possession of real estate, and the sections applicable to actions to quiet title in real estate (2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p.

254, §§ 612 et seq.), required a party against whom an action was brought to quiet title to, or recover possession of, real estate, to set forth all claims to the property which existed in his favor, and, failing to do this, he could not maintain a subsequent action on such claims. The court said: "If one brought into court, being not only allowed full opportunity to assert such claim as he may have, but directly challenged to do so, neglects to use this opportunity expressly afforded him, he has no right to again vex the courts or those claiming adversely to him by instituting a new and distinct action against the party who summoned him into court."

So, in Morarity v. Calloway (1893) 134 Ind. 503, 34 N. E. 226, it was held that a defendant in an action to quiet title in land was estopped from subsequently bringing an action to assert a lien in his favor on the land, where it appeared that in the prior action he had failed to set up the lien by way of cross complaint, and therefore was bound by the decree therein.

In Weinman v. Salit (1914) 85 Misc. 456, 147 N. Y. Supp. 758, it was said that if the plaintiff's claim was a counterclaim not inconsistent with the right of the defendant, as plaintiff in a prior action to foreclose a mortgage, to recover, there could be no legal objection to the plaintiff's maintaining an independent action thereon, although he had not pleaded it as a counterclaim in the foreclosure action; but since it appeared that the plaintiff's claim was inconsistent with the right of the defendant, as plaintiff before, to establish his mortgage in the prior suit, it was held that the claim should have been presented in that action, and that the judgment therein was res judicata as to all contrary claims, whether pleaded or not.

In Jasper v. Rozinski (1918) 182 App. Div. 365, 169 N. Y. Supp. 769, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was made a defendant in a foreclosure action instituted by the defendant during the pendency of the case at bar, and it further appeared that the plaintiff, as defendant therein, failed to appear and assert his claim in the property, which claim he made the basis of his subsequent action, the court held that the judgment in the foreclosure suit barred the plaintiff from recovering.

In Blair v. Hemphill (1900) 111 Iowa, 226, 82 N. W. 501, it was held that in a former action brought by the defendant under a statute (Code 1851, §§ 4223, 4224) to quiet title to real estate, the nature of the action required the plaintiff to set up in that suit all claims in the property existing in his favor against the defendant, and, having failed to assert the lien which was made the basis of his subsequent suit, he was barred by the decree rendered in the former action from recovering on his claim in a subsequent independent action.

So, in Weedman v. Fowler (1911) 84 Kan. 75, 113 Pac. 390, wherein it appeared that a former action to quiet title in real estate was brought against the plaintiff as the guardian of an insane person, the court held that, so long as the judgment rendered against the plaintiff in the prior action remained in full force and effect, it constituted a bar to any claim which he might attempt to assert in subsequent actions, as the nature of the former proceedings required him to claim therein all his interests and rights of action relative to the property.

In Steele v. Stevenson (1919) 104 Kan. 469, 179 Pac. 304, wherein it appeared that the defendants in a suit to quiet title in real estate had neglected to assert certain affirmative claims in their favor, the court held that because of their omission they were bound by the decree rendered in the prior proceeding, and could not press claims in this action which were available, and necessarily challenged, in the prior suit, saying: "In an action to quiet title to land, a general finding of title in the plaintiff, and consequently of no title in the defendants, is a conclusive and binding decision against the defendants on the question of title, from whatever source it may be derived, and forever estops them from asserting a claim of title which existed at the time of the finding and judgment."

In Anderson v. Anderson (1899) 89 Md. 1, 42 Atl. 207, it appeared that the plaintiff was a party to an original bill to sell the real property of his deceased father, and made no adverse claims of title to the property, but allowed the action to proceed to judgment. After many years, he brought an action setting up a claim in the premises. The court held that he could not maintain the action on the ground both of laches and of estoppel; that, having been a party to the original bill, he was required by the nature thereof to present all his claims and interests, and having failed to do so, and submitted to the decree of the court, he was barred from subsequently asserting his claim in the premises.

In Pierson v. Conley (1893) 95 Mich. 619, 55 N. W. 387, the defendant claimed that he was entitled to the value of certain improvements made on the premises in controversy, but, it appearing that he had neglected to assert this claim in a prior action to partition the property, the court held that he was precluded from recovering on the claim in this action.

Likewise, in Gaines v. Kennedy (1876) 53 Miss. 103, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as defendant in a prior suit in ejectment, had omitted to set up a claim for improvements made on the premises during his incumbency, the court held that he could not obtain relief by a bill to enjoin the execution of the judgment in ejectment, saying: "If he did not make his demand in the action at law coextensive with his right, he cannot be relieved in equity for what he omitted, for the opportunity was then offered to establish his full right, and that adjudication covers not only all that was proved in that issue, but all that might have been established."

In Doak v. Wiswell (1851) 33 Me. 355, it was held that, in an action against a party to recover the possession of land, judgment rendered therein was conclusive as to all claims the defendant might have asserted, and his subsequent action to recover for property in buildings erected on the land by him was barred by the decree in the prior proceeding and the possession taken under it.

In Bobb v. Graham (1886) 89 Mo. 200, 1 S. W. 90 (see also Bobb v. Gilmore (1888) — Mo. —, 7 S. W. 5, decided on the same facts), it was held that the plaintiff was barred from maintaining an action on an adverse claim of title to real estate, which, as defendant in a prior action to partition the property, he had failed to set up. The court said: "A judgment in a partition suit establishes the title to the land partitioned, and is conclusive upon any adverse claim of title or possession existing at the time of its rendition. The law requires the court to ascertain and determine the rights of the parties, and makes it the duty of the parties to disclose their adverse claims."

In Cowles v. Kyd (1912) 91 Neb. 274, 135 N. W. 1010, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, who was the purchaser of certain property under a delinquent tax sale, had failed to appear and file his claim in a prior action brought against him by another purchaser under a sale for taxes, to determine the title to the premises, the court held that the plaintiff, having failed to set up his claim and interest in the property in the former action, was forever barred from subsequently asserting his interest against the judgment rendered in that suit.

So, in Raymond v. Ross (1883) 40 Ohio St. 343, the court held that it was incumbent on a mortgagee of premises to assert all claims in his favor in an action to determine title to the realty, in which he was made a party defendant. And where it appeared that the mortgagee failed so to claim in the prior action, the court held that he could not successfully sustain his claims in an independent proceeding.

In Spring Hill Irrig. Co. v. Lake Irrig. Co. (1906) 42 Wash. 379, 85 Pac. 6, an action to assert the rights of the plaintiff to the use of a perennial stream, it appeared that a prior action had been instituted by the defendant to determine the rights of the parties to the use of the same stream. The court held that the prior action partook of the nature of an action to quiet title to real estate, and was governed by the same rules, and therefore the plaintiff was estopped from obtaining the relief sought for, as defendant in the prior action, all claims in its favor should have been asserted.

See also Jackman v. Gartin (1883) 4 Ky. L. Rep. 989, wherein it was said: "A vendee can [could] not maintain an action upon an alleged fraudulent warranty, after having been compelled to accept the title in an action against him for the purchase money, in which the want of title was relied upon."

2. Action for accounting or to settle partnership affairs.

Since an action for an accounting or to settle the affairs of a partnership is designed to adjust the respective demands of the parties, a claim which might have been asserted by the defendant in such an action cannot be made the subject of a subsequent action by him. Free v. Beatley (1893) 95 Mich. 426, 54 N. W. 910; Weiser v. Weiser (1899) 5 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 196, 53 N. Y. Supp. 578, affirmed in (1899) 38 App. Div. 266, 57 N. Y. Supp. 48; Hunter v. Stewart (1884) 23 W. Va. 549; Smith v. Johnson (1812) 15 East, 213, 104 Eng. Reprint, 824, 13 Revised Rep. 449, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 508.

Where it appeared that the widow of a deceased partner had omitted to claim her dower interest in a prior suit brought for an accounting of the partnership property, the court held that she could not thereafter successfully assert her claim as against an innocent purchaser of the property under the decree, for the purchaser had a right to assume that all claims were settled in the former proceeding, and the widow was made a party defendant therein for the sole purpose of ascertaining her rights. Free v. Beatley (1893) 95 Mich. 426, 54 N. W. 910.

In Weiser v. Weiser (1899) 5 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 196, 53 N. Y. Supp. 578, affirmed in (1899) 38 App. Div. 266, 57 N. Y. Supp. 48, the court held that in a judgment creditor's action against a fraudulent transferee for an accounting of the profits of certain real property while in his possession, the defendant was bound to assert all his claims in the nature of expenses incurred and encumbrances and taxes paid, and, having failed to do so, he was precluded from recovering thereon in a future action.

In Hunter v. Stewart (1884) 23 W. Va. 549, an action to recover a sum held in trust for the plaintiff by the defendant, it appeared that the amount involved was the proceeds of a decree in a former action to settle partnership affairs wherein the parties were codefendants, and that in the second action the defendant collected and held the amount awarded to the plaintiff. In the second action the defendant attempted to assert in set-off a partnership claim held by him against the plaintiff. The court held that the set-off could not be allowed, since it appeared that it existed at the time of the former action to settle the partnership affairs, and the defendant, having omitted to assert it therein, was concluded by the decrees there rendered.

In Smith v. Johnson (1812) 15 East, 213, 104 Eng. Reprint, 824, 13 Revised Rep. 449, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 508, wherein the defendant attempted to claim in set-off the amount of a claim which he failed to assert in a former reference to settle all matters of account between the parties, the court held that as it appeared that the subject in respect of which the deduction was here claimed was a matter in difference at the time of the reference, the defendant should have asserted it therein, and therefore he was bound as to every matter included within the subject of the reference.

In some jurisdictions, the rule is that a party defendant who pleads only a part of a claim by way of set-off or counterclaim is precluded from recovering the balance in a subsequent action, except where it appears that the original action was brought before a justice of the peace. Riddle v. McLester-Van Hoose Co. (1906) 145 Ala. 307, 40 So. 101; House v. Donnelly (1913) 7 Ala. App. 267, 61 So. 18; Huff v. Broyles (1875) 26 Gratt. (Va.) 283.

Thus, in House v. Donnelly (1913) 7 Ala. App. 267, 61 So. 18, it appeared that the defendant had, in a former action, set up a part of a claim against the plaintiff as a set-off, and in the suit at bar attempted to avail himself of the balance of the claim, not previously pleaded, by way of counterclaim. The court held that under the Alabama Code (§ 2595) but one suit could be maintained when all the breaches claimed had occurred at the time of the original suit, and, although the defendant could elect to plead his claim as a set-off or reserve it for a future independent action, he could not split it so as to plead a part as a set-off and recover on the balance as a counterclaim in a subsequent action.

In Riddle v. McLester-Van Hoose Co. (1906) 145 Ala. 307, 40 So. 101, it was held that the plaintiff could not maintain an action to recover the balance over and above a set-off which he had interposed in a former action, the court saying: "He was, of course, not bound to plead set-off as a defense. It was entirely optional with him; but having done so, and offered evidence to support his defense, and having defeated the plaintiff's recovery against him, he must be held to a release or remittitur of the residue of his demand."

So, in Huff v. Broyles (1875) 26 Gratt. (Va.) 283, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover the balance of a claim in his favor over and above an amount allowed to him therein as a set-off in a prior action, the court held that he could not recover, for, under the statute (Code 1873, chap. 168, §§ 5-9), one cause of action could not be split up into two or more.

IV. Rule in Vermont as to proceeding in probate court.

The statutes in Vermont require an administrator of the estate of a deceased person to interpose a claim existing in favor of the estate against a creditor as an offset to any claim presented by the creditor, and a failure so to plead the claim bars the right to recover thereon. Spaulding v. Warner (1887) 59 Vt. 646, 11 Atl. 186; Kenney

v. Howard (1895) 67 Vt. 375, 31 Atl. 850.

In the case last cited it was said: "Commissioners having been appointed upon an estate, if a creditor thereof exhibits his claim against it to them for allowance, the executor or administrator must present all claims at law against such creditor in favor of the estate to the commissioners for allowance in offset, or must commence and prosecute an action to recover the same against such creditor, as permitted by Rev. Laws, § 2131, before the commissioners have acted upon the claim of the creditor against the estate; otherwise such claims of the estate against him are forever barred."

V. Rule where prior action is brought in court of justice of peace, or other inferior court.

a. General rule.

It is provided by statute in most jurisdictions that a defendant who fails to interpose a set-off or counterclaim, when sued before a justice of the peace, or in an inferior court not of record, on a claim or contract, is precluded from maintaining a subsequent action thereon.

West Virginia.—Bowdish & D. Bros. v. Groscup (1912) 70 W. Va. 758, 74 S. E. 950.

Thus, in Righter v. Van Riper (1810) 3 N. J. L. 715, it was contended by the defendant that in a prior action brought by him in a justice's court, the plaintiff failed to plead in set-off the claim which was made the basis of the suit at bar, and therefore he was estopped from recovering upon his claim. The court upheld the defendant's contention, holding that the plaintiff was barred by §§ 16 and 17 of the Justice's Act from maintaining an independent action on a claim which he had failed to plead in set-off as required.

And in Johnson v. Pennington (1835) 15 N. J. L. 188, it was held that under a statute the plaintiff could not maintain an action on a claim which was the proper subject of a set-off, and which he failed to plead as such in a prior action before a justice. The court said: "Our statute is peremptory. When a party is sued, he is not at liberty to bring a cross action for a demand which, as in this case, is the subject-matter of a set-off. The set-off must be claimed as such, or the right to recover it is barred. Nor does it make any difference which process was first returnable; or which suit first progressed to judgment. A different rule would encourage a party defendant to evade the wholesome provision of the act to prevent the multiplication of actions, and excite a disgraceful scramble for jurisdiction."

So too, in Bowdish & D. Bros. v. Groscup (W. Va.) supra, wherein the plaintiffs sued as partners to recover on a claim arising out of a contract made with the defendant, it appeared that the defendant had instituted a prior suit in a justice's court to recover under the same contract, and that the plaintiffs as defendants therein, did not assert their claim as a set-off or counterclaim, although the amount thereof was within the jurisdiction of the justice. The court held that, having failed to set up their claim in the suit before the justice as a counterclaim, the plaintiffs were precluded from recovering in this action by the terms of the statute (Code 1906, chap. 50, § 55), which provides as follows: "If the defendant, at the time the plaintiff's action is commenced, has any credit, or set-off, or counterclaim to allege in defense or reduction of the plaintiff's demand, and be personally served with process in the suit, or appear and answer the action, he shall produce the same, with his evidence in support thereof, in the cause, or be forever precluded from maintaining any action for the recovery thereof," etc. However, the court said by way of dictum that, if the defendant's former action had been in a higher court, the question as to estoppel could not have arisen, for under the general rule a defendant could elect to recoup his claim in an action against him, or maintain an independent action against the plaintiff.

In Lathrop v. Hayes (1870) 57 Ill. 279, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, having a claim against the defendant which amounted to less than $100, neglected to set up the same in a prior action brought against him by the defendant in a justice's court, the court held that, under the statute (Ill. Rev. Stat. 1845, chap. 59, § 35) requiring that each party shall bring forward all demands and claims not exceeding $100 in a suit commenced before a justice of the peace, the plaintiff, by failing to assert his claim as a set-off, was barred from maintaining an independent action to recover thereon.

In Walter v. Cox (1907) 36 Mont. 20, 91 Pac. 1063, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's cause of action was the proper subject of a counterclaim in a prior action against him in a court of a justice of the peace, the court held that under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1524, 1525) which provides that in an action in a justice's court a defendant must set up all matters in the nature of a defense, set-off, or counterclaim coming within the jurisdiction of the court, and upon failure so to do the defendant, or his assignee, is thereafter barred from maintaining an action thereon, the plaintiff, having failed to assert his claim as required, was effectively barred from recovering.

In Jones v. Charles Warner Co. (1912) 2 Boyce (Del.) 566, 83 Atl. 131, it was stated that the statute (Rev. Code 1852, amended 1893, p. 744 [14 Del. Laws, chap. 94, § 8]) required that all accounts, demands, and causes of action cognizable before a justice of the peace, in favor of a defendant, must be pleaded as a set-off, and provided that a failure to do so should be a bar to a subsequent action thereon.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff had been sued by the defendant in a prior action before a justice of the peace, and failed to set up his claim in that action as a set-off, although it had accrued at the time, it was held that the former suit was a bar, as the plaintiff, as defendant in the prior action, was required to assert his claim by way of set-off in an action in a justice's court. M'Kerras v. Gardner (1808) 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 137.

In Serjeant v. Holmes (1808) 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 428, wherein it appeared that two suits were brought by the same plaintiff against the same defendant in a court of a justice of the peace, and the defendant allowed the first to proceed to judgment without asserting a set-off which existed in his favor, the court held that the omission was fatal to the assertion of the set-off in the second action, as the defendant was required to set off his claim in an action in a justice's court, at the very first opportunity.

In Greenleaf v. Low (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 168, wherein the defendant pleaded in bar of the plaintiff's action a judgment in a prior action brought by the defendant before a justice of the peace in which the present plaintiff was the defendant, the court held that the plea was good, for the plaintiff should have set off his claim in the action before the justice, and, having failed to do so, was precluded from ever maintaining an action thereon.

And in Goldberg v. Ziegler (1905) 92 N. Y. Supp. 777, the court held that a plea of res judicata was established where it was shown that, in a prior action in a municipal court, brought against the present plaintiff by the defendant herein, the claim which was made the basis of the plaintiff's action was matter for a counter-claim and should have been there considered and determined.

So too, in Douglas v. Hoag (1806) 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 283, the court held that the defendant's plea of a former action brought by him in a justice's court, wherein plaintiff's claim might have been, but was not, asserted as a set-off, was good, and that the plaintiff could not maintain his action.

In Baldwin v. Walsworth (1844) Hill & D. Supp. (N. Y.) 340, wherein it appeared that, in a former action brought by the defendant before a justice of the peace, the plaintiff, as defendant therein, neglected to set up by way of set-off a claim which was made one of the counts in his subsequent action, the court held that the omission was fatal to a subsequent recovery on the claim, for, under the statute (2 Rev. Stat. p. 235, § 57), a neglect to assert a claim as a set-off in a proper case before a justice of the peace was a perpetual bar to subsequent recovery.

In Wills v. Little (1898) 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 100, 42 W. N. C. 404, wherein it appeared that in a prior action brought against the plaintiff by the defendant in a justice's court, the plaintiff did not assert as a set-off the claims asserted in the case at bar but agreed to produce the claims before the justice for allowance on the judgment, the court held that this was not an assertion of a set-off within the meaning of the statute (Act 1810, § 7), and that by the terms of that act the plaintiff was estopped from recovering on his claims.

In White v. Johnson (1833) 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 146, wherein, although it could not be decided from the facts which of two suits in justices' courts maintained against each other by the plaintiff and defendant, respectively, was prior in point of time, the court, deeming it necessary that the question be determined, in order that difficulties respecting it could not arise thereafter, stated the rule as follows: "Where one party bona fide institutes proceedings against another for a debt or demand arising from contract, before a justice of the peace, the effect of the commencement of such proceedings is to give to the justice exclusive jurisdiction during their pendency, not only of the plaintiff's demand, but of any legal set-off, within the jurisdiction of the justice, the defendant may have. Such set-off it is the imperative duty of the defendant to exhibit, under the peril of the forfeiture of his claim for his contumacy in neglecting or refusing to present it on hearing."

Likewise in Armstrong v. Johnson (1833) 2 Chester Co. Rep. (Pa.) 64, the court held that it was admissible on the part of the defendant to show by parol that the court had no jurisdiction of the plaintiff's claim, by reason of the fact that he was barred from maintaining an action thereon by having omitted to assert the same as a set-off in a previous suit before a justice.

In Slyhoof v. Flitcraft (1831) 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 171, the plaintiff issued summons shortly after having been served with a summons in an action brought by the defendant against him in a justice's court, and it appeared that the plaintiff's claim was the proper subject of a set-off in the suit in justice's court. The court held that he was estopped from maintaining his action, as his claim should have been asserted as a set-off in the prior action.

So, in Herring v. Adams (1843) 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 459, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff did not assert his claim as a set-off in a prior action against him in a justice's court, although the claim arose ex contractu and was within the jurisdiction of the justice, the court held that under the Act of Assembly of 1810 the plaintiff was barred from recovering on his claim.

Under the act mentioned in the preceding paragraph where it appeared that the subject of a plaintiff's claim was proper matter for a set-off, which he omitted to assert when sued by the defendant in a justice's court, the court held that the action was properly dismissed. Light v. Ringler (1885) 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 156.

And in Shoup v. Shoup (1859) 15 Pa. 361, an action by an employer to recover damages occasioned by a breach of contract of employment by the defendant, it appeared that the defendant had brought suit before a justice of the peace and obtained a judgment against the employer for salary due him. The court held, under the same act, that the judgment rendered by the justice was a bar to the action, as the plaintiff, being defendant therein, was required to plead his claim in set-off, and, not having done so, was barred from subsequently recovering on it.

Under the same act, in Walsh v. Greenwood (1810) 2 Pa. Dist. R. 64, wherein it appeared that the defendant attempted to set off, in an action in replevin, a claim which he had omitted to assert as a set-off in a prior action to recover rents, brought against him in a justice's court, the court held that he was precluded from doing so by the terms of the statute.

See also Nickle v. Baldwin (1842) 4 Watts & S. (Pa.) 290, wherein it was said that a case in damages not exceeding $100, arising ex contractu and capable of liquidation by a legal standard, fell within the Defalcation Act, as well as within the express terms of § 7 of the Act of March 20, 1810, which provides, in part, that "the defendant is required in a suit before a justice of the peace, on pain of being forever barred, to set off his demand, whether founded on bond, note, penal or single bill, writing obligatory, book account, or damage on assumption."

See also Holden v. Wiggins (1832) 3 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 460, wherein it was said of the same statute: "Under the 7th section of this act, justices are also authorized and required to take cognizance of any demand of the defendant, founded 'upon bond, note, penal or single bill, written obligation, book account or damages on assumption, against the plaintiff, which shall not exceed one hundred dollars,' and which shall be offered by the defendant as a set-off against the plaintiff's demand. And it is thereby also declared that if the defendant have such a demand, but refuse or neglect to set it off, he shall be forever barred from recovering it."

b. Limitation of rule.

1. Claim for unliquidated damages.

As the rule requiring a defendant to plead a claim by way of set-off or counterclaim in an action before a justice of the peace, or in an inferior court, is purely statutory, it must be strictly construed, and the courts have so limited it to actions on contract only, and where the defendant's claim is for unliquidated damages, the party, in whose favor the claim exists, is not precluded from recovering upon the same, or the balance over and above the jurisdiction of the lower court, in a subsequent independent action. Bush v. Kindred (1858) 20 Ill. 98; Cooper v. Crane (1827) 9 N. J. L. 178; Babeock v. Peck (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 292; Cook v. Moseley (1835) 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 277; Welch v. Hazelton (1857) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 97; Davis v. Aikin (1895) 85 Hun. 554, 33 N. Y. Supp. 103; Clift v. Mercer (1903) 79 App. Div. 369, 79 N. Y. Supp. 622; White v. Curtis (1905) 49 Misc. 50, 93 N. Y. Supp. 319, 18 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 117.

In Cooper v. Crane (1827) 9 N. J. L. 178, an action against the executors under the will of a deceased party, to recover damages for the cutting and removing of timber from the plaintiff's premises by the testator during his lifetime, and on a second count to recover for payments made for the testator by the plaintiff as surety on a note, it appeared that in a prior action in a justice's court, the claims which were made the basis of the action were not pleaded in set-off, and the defendants contended that this omission so to plead precluded a recovery. The court held that, as the damages under the first count for the cutting of timber were unliquidated, the claim thereon was not the proper subject of a set-off, in an action before a justice of the peace; but that, as to the second count for money had and received, it was the proper subject of a set-off, and, it appearing that it did not exceed the jurisdictional limits of the justice, should have been asserted as a set-off, failing which the plaintiff was precluded from maintaining an action to recover upon it, under the terms of § 15 of the Revised Laws, page 683, to the following effect: "If any defendant neglect or refuse to deliver a copy of his or her account or state of demand against such plaintiff, he or she shall forever thereafter be precluded from having or maintaining any action for such account or demand, or from setting off the same in any future suit. Provided always, that where the balance found to be due to such defendant exceeds the sum of one hundred dollars, then the said defendant shall not be precluded from recovering his or her account or demand against such plaintiff in any other court of record having cognizance of the same."

In Bush v. Kindred (1858) 20 Ill. 93, it was held that a party sued in a court of a justice of the peace was not required to set off a claim for unliquidated damages, the court saying: "If such damages might be so set off, it would be to invest justices of the peace with jurisdiction over questions involving title to real estate, and compel parties to litigate all their rights, of every nature and kind, in one action, which would result in great injustice and endless confusion. . . . It is manifest that the legislature never intended to confer such jurisdiction upon justices of the peace, and thereby produce such results."

In Welch v. Hazelton (1857) 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 97, the defendant pleaded, in abatement of the plaintiff's right to recover, a prior action before a justice of the peace in which the plaintiff, as defendant therein, should have asserted his claim as a set-off. The court held that the plea was insufficient, as it did not show whether the plaintiff's claim was for liquidated or unliquidated damages.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff in an action to recover damages caused by a breach of warranty under a contract for the sale of a horse had not pleaded his claim as a set-off in a prior action instituted by the defendant before a justice of the peace to recover the purchase price of the horse, the court held that the failure to assert the claim as a set-off was no bar to a recovery, since the claim was unliquidated, and therefore could not have been interposed as a set-off in an action in a justice's court. 2 Rev. Stat. 234, 236, §§ 50, 57. It was held further that, conceding the claim could have been set up in mitigation of damages, the party was not bound to do so, and was not prejudiced by the omission. Cook v. Meseley (1835) 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 277.

In Davis v. Aikin (1895) 85 Hun, 554, 33 N. Y. Supp. 103, an action to recover the value of professional services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant as the latter's attorney, it appeared that the defendant had brought a prior action in a justice's court against the plaintiff to recover for an alleged conversion, and that the plaintiff had not pleaded his demand as a counterclaim therein. The court held that the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 2947), providing that the failure of a defendant, in an action to recover upon, or for, a breach of contract in a justice's court, to interpose a counterclaim existing in his favor, forever precluded the maintenance of an action thereon, applied only to actions on contract.

In Clift v. Mercer (1903) 79 App. Div. 369, 79 N. Y. Supp. 622, an action by the plaintiff to recover for money expended by him in the purchase of a team for the defendant's testator, it appeared that in a prior action in a municipal court against the plaintiff to recover the possession of the team, he did not file his claim as a counterclaim. The court held that the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 2947), requiring a defendant to plead his counterclaim in a justice's court, the procedure in which applied to the mu-municipal court of Syracuse, was limited specifically to actions "to recover damages on or for a breach of contract."

In White v. Curtis (1905) 49 Misc. 50, 18 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 117, 98 N. Y. Supp. 319, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff failed to file a counterclaim in a prior action brought against him in a justice's court for a certain demand, the court held that he was not thereby estopped from maintaining this proceeding to recover thereon.

In New York, it has been held that where, in an action before a justice of the peace, a claim available as a set-off or counterclaim is interposed as such, but before judgment is rendered, the claim is withdrawn or dismissed, the judgment is no bar to a subsequent suit to recover on the claim. Phinney v. Earl (1812) 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 352; Ives v. Goddard (1857) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 434; Lord v. Ostrander (1864) 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 337. Compare Lawrence v. Houghton (1809) 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 129.

In Phinney v. Earl (N. Y.) supra, wherein the defendant pleaded a former action in a justice's court, in which the claim sued on by the plaintiff should have been set up by way of set-off, it appeared that in that action the plaintiff attempted to assert his claim as a set-off, but that it was dismissed on the defendant's motion. The court held that the former action constituted no bar to this suit, since the defendant could not plead the necessity of the claim being asserted as a set-off in the prior action when he had objected to its admissibility.

In Lord v. Ostrander (1864) 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 337, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was defendant in a prior suit before a justice of the peace and did not set up his demands as a set-off, but that the justice dismissed the former proceeding against the remonstrance of the defendant, the court held that while the statute (2 Rev. Stat. 233, 236, § 57) required the defendant to interpose and avail himself of his claim in an action before the justice, or suffer a forfeiture of the same for omission so to plead it, nevertheless the effect of the prior action as a bar was obviated by its dismissal before issue was joined.

Where it appeared that in a prior action in a justice's court the claim of the plaintiff, as defendant therein, was offered as a set-off, but was properly excluded by the justice, the court held that the former action constituted no bar. Ives v. Goddard (1857) 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 434.

But compare Lawrence v. Houghton (N. Y.) supra, wherein the court held that a prior judgment rendered in an action in a justice's court, against the plaintiff as defendant therein, where he offered to set off the claim which was made the basis of the suit at bar, but the same was ruled out by the justice, nevertheless constituted a bar to the maintenance of this suit on the claim.

The rule requiring a defendant to plead a claim by way of set-off or counterclaim in an action before a justice of the peace has been held not to apply where the claim exists against a party not a litigant in the action. Culver v. Barney (1835) 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 161; Compton v. Green (1853) 9 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 228.

Thus, in Compton v. Green (N. Y.) supra, it was held that a defendant in a justice's court action was not required by the statute (2 Rev. Stat. 234, 235, § 52) to plead a claim in set-off, where it appeared that the claim consisted of a demand against two parties, one only of whom was a plaintiff in the action before the justice; and therefore the pendency of the former suit constituted no bar to the independent action brought by the defendant against both parties liable on his claim.

So, in Culver v. Barney (N. Y.) supra, it appeared that the claim which was made the basis of the suit at bar, existed against two parties, and that in a former action in a justice's court brought by one of the parties, the plaintiff, as defendant therein, did not assert his claim as a set-off. The court held that he was not required to do so, since, under the statute requiring the pleading of a set-off in an action in justice's court (2 Rev. Stat. 234, § 60, subd. 7), the demands which a defendant must set off are demands against the plaintiff in the action, and not against the plaintiff and another person, either jointly or severally.

4. Recovery of balance of claim in excess of justice's jurisdiction.

Where, in an action before a justice of the peace, a claim available as a set-off or counterclaim exceeds the jurisdiction of the court, the defendant, in whose favor the claim exists, may subsequently maintain an action to recover the balance of his claim over and above the sum of the court's jurisdiction.

Texas.—Dixon v. Watson (1909) 152 Tex. Civ. App. 412, 115 S. W. 100.

In Canton-Hughes Pump Co. v. Llera (1914) 131 C. C. A. 387, 215 Fed. 79, affirming (1913) 123 C. C. A. 397, 205 Fed. 209, the court construed § 157 of the Municipal Court Act of New York, which reads as follows: "Where defendant has a counterclaim which is in excess of the amount of the jurisdiction in this court, the counterclaim may be interposed, and in the event of judgment being rendered in defendant's favor, sustaining said counterclaim, said judgment shall not be for any larger sum in any event than the sum of which the court has jurisdiction, exclusive of costs, but nothing in this section shall be construed to estop such a defendant from bringing an action against the plaintiff for the difference between the sum of the court's jurisdiction and the sum claimed by said defendant to be due, unless the judgment shall state that the sum awarded by the judgment is the whole amount found to be due." It was held that the act expressly allowed the maintenance of a subsequent suit to recover the balance of a counterclaim over and above the sum of which the municipal court had jurisdiction.

In East Forty-Sixth Street Realty Corp. v. Max Gutschneider (1918) 103 Misc. 491, 170 N. Y. Supp. 374, where in it appeared that, in a former action in a municipal court, the defendant had pleaded in counterclaim an amount due on a cause of action in excess of the jurisdiction of that court, it was held that he was not precluded from asserting the balance of his claim as a counterclaim in a second suit brought against him by the same plaintiff. The court said: "It is plain, however, that where a counterclaim is interposed to a cause of action in a court, the jurisdiction of which is limited in amount, or in a proceeding in which no affirmative judgment can be granted in respect of the counterclaim, . . . the defendant may avail of the excess or surplus of the counterclaim above the plaintiff's claim in the first action, and interpose the same as a defense or counterclaim in the second."

In Rundlett & Reynolds v. Whitall (1912) 76 Misc. 456, 185 N. Y. Supp. 697, in answer to the plaintiff's suit in a municipal court, the defendant pleaded a counterclaim for an amount within the jurisdiction of the court, and it appeared that another action was pending by the defendant against the plaintiff, to recover the balance of his claim. The court held that he

So, in Silberstein v. Begun (1919) 107 Misc. 895, 176 N. Y. Supp. 558, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the defendants' breach of contract, it appeared that the defendants had instituted an action in a municipal court against the plaintiffs, to recover for goods sold and delivered, and that the plaintiffs had interposed a counterclaim based on their cause of action, for a sum in excess of $1,000, the jurisdiction of the justice, but that the justice fixed their damage at $1,000. The court held that while the plaintiffs were forced into the municipal court by the commencement of the action, they were not required to litigate their claim for damages, which exceeded the justice's jurisdiction, but might have set it up as an offset, and thus reserved the right to institute an action for their damages in a court of more ample jurisdiction; but having interposed the cause of action as a counterclaim they were bound by the result of the justice's judgment.

In Babcock v. Peck (1847) 4 Denio (N. Y.) 292, the court held that where it appeared that the plaintiff's cause of action for a liquidated sum exceeded the jurisdiction of a justice's court, he was not required to plead it in a former action in that court as a set-off. 2 Rev. Stat. 236, §§ 57, 58, subd. 1.

In Sipley v. Wass (1885) 47 N. J. L. 187, the court construed the 24th section of the Justice's Court Act, which reads as follows: "If any defendant neglect or refuse to deliver a copy of his or her account or state of demand against such plaintiff, he or she shall forever thereafter be precluded from having or maintaining any action for such account or demand, or from setting off the same in any future suit: Provided always, that where the balance found to be due to such defendant exceeds the sum of one hundred dollars, then the said defendant shall not be precluded from recovering his or her account or demand against such plaintiff in any other court of record having cognizance of the same." It was held that a plaintiff was not precluded from recovering on a claim which he omitted to interpose as a set-off when previously sued by the defendant in a justice's court, where he showed that the balance due him exceeded $100.

In State, Clancy, Prosecutor, v. Neumeyer (1889) 51 N. J. L. 299, 17 Atl. 154, the court said: "If the defendant has a set-off, and when used in a justice's court shall neglect or refuse to deliver a copy of his or her account or state of demand against the plaintiff, he shall be precluded from suing for said account: Provided, that where the balance found to be due to the defendant exceeds $100, then the defendant shall not be precluded from recovering his demand in any court. Rev. p. 544, § 24." The case, however, did not involve circumstances under which a prior defendant might have pleaded in set-off, for it appeared that the former action was brought in a justice's court, wherein the defendant attempted, unsuccessfully, to file a claim in set-off which far exceeded the jurisdiction of the justice.

In Harrison v. Dickerson (1916) 89 N. J. L. 712, 99 Atl. 325, the court held that § 25 of the Small Cause Act of 1903 (Revision) did not change the rule as laid down in Sipley v. Wass (N. J.) supra; and that failure to plead a set-off or counterclaim exceeding the jurisdiction of a justice's court constituted no bar to a subsequent independent action to recover on the claim.

In Meyerhoffer v. Baker (1907) 121 App. Div. 797, 106 N. Y. Supp. 718, an action to recover damages occasioned by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant, made to induce the plaintiff to become a lessee of premises, it appeared that the defendant had successfully maintained a prior action for summary dispossession in a municipal court wherein the plaintiff did not plead her claim. The court held that, as it appeared that plaintiff's claim was for more than $500, the limit of the jurisdiction of the municipal court (Laws 1902, chap. 580, § 1, subd. 13, § 157), she had sufficient reason for not setting up as a counterclaim therein the claim asserted in the later action, and the prior proceedings, therefore, constituted no bar.

In Devinny v. Jelly (1817) Tappan (Ohio) 127, wherein it was contended that the plaintiff was barred from recovering on his claim for work, labor, and services, because of failure to plead the same as a set-off in a prior action brought in a justice's court by the present defendant against the plaintiff, the court held that, as it appeared that the plaintiff's claim exceeded in amount the jurisdictional limits of the justice, he was not required to plead the same as a set-off in the action in the inferior court, and his failure to do so did not preclude a recovery.

So, in Lancaster, Ohio Mfg. Co. v. Colgate (1861) 12 Ohio St. 344, wherein it appeared that the defendant in a former action in a justice's court attempted, without success, to plead as a counterclaim a demand in his favor for a sum far in excess of the jurisdiction of the justice, the court held that the amount being beyond the limit which he could recover in the prior action the failure to set up the claim as a counterclaim could constitute no bar to a recovery thereon in a subsequent action, in a court having jurisdiction to grant the relief sought.

In Simpson v. Lapsley (1846) 3 Pa. St. 459, the court held that the plaintiff was not estopped from recovering any part of his claim, because it was not offered as a set-off before a justice, when previously sued by the defendant, saying: "If the present plaintiff's demand against the plaintiff in the other suit was over $100, he was not bound to submit any portion of it to the jurisdiction of the justice, or sever it into parts for the purpose of set-off. Besides, suppose he was bound to take some item of the account or demand, which he then claimed against the present defendant, and set it off against the claim of the plaintiff in that suit, can the defendant in this case, or the jury, or the court, select the one he was bound to set off? The act of assembly only requires a defendant to make his set-off,

In Giffen v. Kahnweiler (1893; C. P.) 2 Pa. Dist. R. 656, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's claim was in excess of the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, the court held that his failure to set it off in a prior suit before a justice did not preclude him, under the statute (art. 1810, § 7), from maintaining a subsequent independent action to recover thereon.

In Dixon v. Watson (1909) 52 Tex. Civ. App. 412, 115 S. W. 100, an action by the plaintiff, as tenant, against the defendant, his landlord, for a breach of the lease, it appeared that the landlord had instituted a prior action against the tenant on the lease in a county court, and in that action the tenant did not assert his claim as a set-off for the reason that it exceeded the jurisdiction of the court. The court held that the plaintiff was not bound to plead his set-off in the county court action, but had the right to decline to do so and maintain an independent action thereon.

VI. Rule in Arkansas.

In Arkansas, an irreconcilable difference of opinion exists on the question whether a prior action in which a claim might have been interposed as a set-off or counterclaim is a bar to a separate or independent action thereon. But three cases have been found in this jurisdiction in which the question has been raised, two of which held that the prior action is a bar to a recovery on the claim, and the third holding directly to the contrary. Beaty v. Johnston (1899) 66 Ark. 529, 52 S. W. 129. Compare Hughes v. Sebastian County Bank (1917) 129 Ark. 218, 195 S. W. 364; Turley v. Gorman (1918) 133 Ark. 473, 202 S. W. 822.

In Beaty v. Johnston, supra, it was held that where a party has a claim which might properly have been the subject of a set-off in a prior action, the failure to use it as such does not bar a subsequent action to recover thereon.

But compare Hughes v. Sebastian County Bank (1917) 129 Ark. 218, 195 S. W. 364, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, who was the maker of a note held by the defendant bank, had neglected, in a prior action on the note, to set up by way of counterclaim or set-off the improper handling of his collateral by the bank, by reason of which he sustained a loss. In an action to recover the amount of the loss, the court held that the omission to plead the claim by way of set-off or counterclaim in the prior action precluded a subsequent recovery.

In Turley v. Gorman (1918) 133 Ark. 473, 202 S. W. 822, it was held that a party was concluded by the judgment rendered in a prior action, in which he failed to claim an amount by way of set-off, although it did not appear whether the set-off was available in the original suit.

Although there is an apparent conflict of opinion in New Jersey, the weight of authority in that state seems to hold that the failure to interpose an available claim by way of set-off, counterclaim, or cross petition in a prior action bars a recovery on the claim in a subsequent independent suit. Schenck v. Schenck (1828) 10 N. J. L. 276; Henry v. Milham (1832) 13 N. J. L. 266; Dey v. Jackson (1877) 39 N. J. L. 535; Links v. Mariowe (1912) 83 N. J. L. 389, 84 Atl. 1056. Compare Longstreet v. Phile (1876) 39 N. J. L. 63; Baldwin v. Woodbridge & T. Engineering Co. (1896) 59 N. J. L. 317, 36 Atl. 683. The procedure in justices' courts in that state is not in conflict with the general rule governing actions brought in inferior courts, and the cases from that jurisdiction relating to actions of that kind are in V. supra.

In Henry v. Milham (1832) 13 N. J. L. 266, the court held that, by the terms of the statute (Rev. Laws, 633, § 15), a party who had failed to assert a claim in his favor, which was the proper subject of a set-off in a former action against him, could not recover on the same in a subsequent independent action.

In Links v. Mariowe (1912) 83 N. J. L. 389, 84 Atl. 1056, the court held that the plaintiff's omission to file a liquidated claim for damages as a set-off in a prior action against him in a district court precluded him from maintaining a subsequent action thereon, under the terms of the statute. Comp. Stat. p. 1971, § 61.

So, in Dey v. Jackson (1877) 39 N. J. L. 535, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as defendant in a former action, had omitted to plead his claim as a set-off therein, the court held that under the statute relating to set-off his claim became forever barred by reason of the failure to assert it in the original action as required.

Likewise in Schenck v. Schenck (1828) 10 N. J. L. 276, the court held that under the statute the plaintiff could not maintain an action on a claim which was the proper subject of a set-off in a former action, but which he failed to plead.

But compare Longstreet v. Phile (1876) 39 N. J. L. 63, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, as a defendant in a prior suit to recover the value of property on which he had performed services, and which he had sold to satisfy his lien, did not assert, in that action, his claim for services, but suffered judgment, and subsequently brought an action to recover on his claim, the court held that he was not prevented from recovering by the judgment in the prior proceedings, as his right to set off his claim in the former action was optional with, and not imperative on, him, and, if he so elected, a subsequent independent action would lie to recover upon his claim. This decision, however, is not in accord with the weight of authority in the state, and should be limited strictly to those cases embracing a similar state of circumstances.

Compare also Baldwin v. Woodbridge & T. Engineering Co. (1896) 59 N. J. L. 317, 36 Atl. 683, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was sued in a prior action brought against him in attachment as a foreign debtor. In that proceeding judgment was had by default, the plaintiff, as defendant therein, not appearing. The court held that the failure to plead the claim in set-off was no bar to the prosecution of an action thereon, despite the statute (Gen. Stat. March 27, 1874, p.

3109), since the former action, having been brought against a foreign debtor on whom personal service was not made, was an action in rem, and the judgment therein had no further effect than to subject to a lien such property of the debtor as was subject to attachment. W. J. K.

A. TENENBAUM, Appt.,

v.

GERHARD B. LAMBERT COMPANY.

(— Ark. —, 215 S. W. 596.)

Evidence — of fraud in making written contract.

1. The rule prohibiting the admission of parol evidence to vary a written contract does not preclude the admission of such evidence to establish fraud in making the contract.

[See note on this question beginning on page 747.]

Contract — to deliver scrap iron — effect of estimate by buyer.

2. The owner of a plantation who offers to sell the scrap iron which he has accumulated is not bound to deliver the quantity as estimated by the buyer's agent, which is much more than he possesses, although the estimated quantity is named in the written contract as that to be delivered.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Phillips Chancery Court (Robertson, Ch.) in favor of defendant, cross complainant, in a suit brought to recover damages for alleged breach of a contract to sell scrap iron. Affirmed.

Statement by Hart, J.:

A. Tenenbaum brought this suit in the circuit court against Gerhard B. Lambert Company to recover $540 damages, which he alleges he has sustained by reason of a breach of a contract with the defendant to sell it approximately 50 tons of scrap iron. The defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and by way of cross complaint asked judgment against plaintiff for the price of 13½ tons of scrap iron, which it shipped to the plaintiff, and for which it has not been paid. The defendant prayed for a reformation of the contract of sale, and asked that the case be transferred to the chancery court. Without objection the case was transferred to equity and tried there. The chancellor found for the defendant in the amount of its counterclaim. It was therefore decreed by the court that the complaint of the plaintiff be dismissed for want of equity, and that the defendant have and recover of the plaintiff the sum of $149.37. The case is here on appeal.

Plaintiff, by and through the superior knowledge and experience of M. M. Tenenbaum, his agent, perpetrated a fraud on the defendant.

Doniphan, K. & S. R. Co. v. Missouri & N. A. R. Co. 104 Ark. 483, 149 S. W. 60; 4 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1376; Martin v. Hempstead County Levee Dist. 98 Ark. 23, 185 S. W. 458.

Plaintiff has wholly fallen down on the question of proving damages, if he had made a good and valid contract for the purchase from defendant.

Kirchman v. Tuffi Bros. Pig Iron & Coke Co. 92 Ark. 111, 122 S. W. 239; Allen v. Northern, 121 Ark. 150, 180 S. W. 465.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only issue raised by the appeal is as to the correctness of the finding of the chancellor. According to the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, he has been engaged in the business of buying and selling scrap iron and hides at Little Rock, Arkansas, since the year 1890. His son traveled for him over the state of Arkansas, buying scrap iron for him. He went to Elaine, Phillips county, Arkansas, and entered into a contract with the Gerhard B. Lambert Company, a corporation engaged in business there, for the purpose of buying scrap iron from it, and the contract is evidenced by a letter signed by the Gerhard B. Lambert Company and written to A. Tenenbaum, Little Rock, Arkansas, and dated "May 5, 1917, Elaine, Ark." The letter is as follows:

Dear Sir:—We beg to confirm sale made to you through your representative, M. M. Tenenbaum, for approximately 50 gross tons of scrap iron, free of boilers, grates, and stove plates, at $13.50 gross ton, f. o. b. cars, Elaine, Ark., railroad rates to govern, draft with bill of lading attached, delivery to be made within two weeks. We beg to acknowledge receipt of your draft for $50 to apply on this shipment.

Yours truly.

The defendant shipped to the plaintiff one car of scrap iron within two weeks, and notified the plaintiff that this was all the scrap iron that it had. The plaintiff received the carload of scrap iron, but refused to pay for it, claiming that the contract called for approximately 50 tons of scrap iron and that the defendant had only shipped to the plaintiff 13½ tons. The plaintiff claimed that he had contracts out for the sale of the scrap iron, and that in order to fill them he had to buy scrap iron at an advanced price from other parties, and that he was damaged in the sum of $540 by the defendant not complying with its contract. It is also shown by the plaintiff that the defendant estimated that it had on hand at Elaine approximately 50 tons of scrap iron, and that the plaintiff bought that amount from it.

On the other hand, it was shown by the defendant that it was engaged in business at Elaine, Arkansas, and that on the 5th day of May, 1917, a son of the plaintiff called upon it to purchase the scrap iron which it had accumulated at its place of business. An agent of the defendant showed Tenenbaum the iron which it had accumulated at Elaine, and Tenenbaum estimated the amount to be between 40 and 50 tons. The plaintiff's agent was also told that the defendant had some more scrap iron at Lambrook, on its plantation, 8 miles away. The defendant was engaged in operating a cotton plantation of about 3,000 acres, and also operated a store and gin on the premises. The defendant knew nothing as to the amount of scrap iron on hand, and relied entirely upon the estimate made by Tenenbaum. The latter knew that the defendant was not engaged in the business of buying and selling scrap iron, and that it only intended to sell the plaintiff the amount of scrap iron which it had on hand at Elaine and Lambrook. The contract in question was written by an agent of the defendant, but was dictated by the agent of plaintiff. The above facts were testified to both by the bookkeeper and manager of the defendant.

It is first insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that this testimony on the part of the defendant was inadmissible, on the ground that it violated the well-known rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to modify or vary a written contract. The facts bring this case within an exception to the rule. The rule prohibiting the admission of oral evidence to vary a written contract does not preclude the admission of such evidence to establish fraud in making the contract. This is so because fraud in a contract could never be proved if the parties were bound by its terms as written. Brown v. Le May, 101 Ark. 95, 141 S. W. 759; Carwell v. Dennis, 101 Ark. 603, 143 S. W. 135.

In the case at bar two witnesses for the defendant testified in positive terms that it was engaged in running a plantation of 3,000 acres, and in operating a store, mill, and gin situated thereon; that it only intended to sell the scrap iron, which it had accumulated in the course of its business; that it was not engaged in the business of buying and selling scrap iron, and that the plaintiff knew these facts, and knew that the defendant relied upon his agent in estimating the quantity of scrap iron on hand. The iron was to be delivered within two weeks. The defendant did deliver all the scrap iron it had on hand to the plaintiff within this time.

The chancellor correctly held that the action of the plaintiff in estimating the quantity of scrap iron in the contract at approximately 50 tons, when in fact there were only about 18½ tons, was a fraudulent misrepresentation which induced the defendant to sign the contract, as dictated by the plaintiff's agent. This view is strengthened by the fact that the defendant wrote the plaintiff a letter, offering to sell him the scrap iron which it had on hand, and the agent of the plaintiff went down there to buy it in response to this letter.

Contract—to deliver scrap iron—effect of estimate by buyer.

It follows that the decree will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Admissibility of parol evidence as to amount of commodity specified in written contract of sale.

The parol evidence rule is not violated by the admission of evidence with respect to the amount of a commodity intended to be sold and transferred by a written contract of sale, where the amount is not specifically set out in the contract. Smith v. Wilson Mercantile Co. (1912) 6 Ala. App. 171, 60 So. 484; Ruff v. Jarrett (1880) 94 Ill. 475; Farwell v. Tillson (1884) 76 Me. 239; Neal v. Flint (1895) 88 Me. 72, 33 Atl. 669. Thus, in Smith v. Wilson Mercantile Co. (Ala.) supra, it was held that where a contract for the purchase of six bales of cotton did not specify the weight of the bales, it could be shown by parol evidence that the bales contemplated were of the usual and customary weight, and what that weight was. Likewise, in Ruff v. Jarrett (1880) 94 Ill. 475, it appeared that a bill of sale of ice did not state to whom the sale was made, the quantity sold, or the price per ton, but only stated by whom the ice was sold, its location, the total to be paid, and that it was to be removed before a certain time. It was held that this could not be regarded as a contract between the parties without the aid of extrinsic evidence, and that if evidence could be introduced to prove who was the purchaser, and to give effect to the bill of sale, there was no reason for refusing to permit evidence of a warranty of quantity in order to show a failure of consideration, as a defense to an action on a note given for the ice. So, in Neal v. Flint (Me.) supra, the bill of sale involved contained no particular enumeration of the articles sold, the language being, "all the boats, canoes, sails, oars, paddles, fittings, and fixtures of every kind, more or less, as the same now lie at Winter Harbor."

It was held that parol evidence was admissible to show that there was an oral promise, warranty, or understanding, to the effect that all the boats, etc., put into the boathouse at Winter Harbor by one of the plaintiffs, were there at the time of the execution and delivery of the bill of sale. The court said: "The contract or promise relied on was a collateral agreement, incidentally connected with that which had been reduced to writing, and not inconsistent with it. The bill of sale was silent as to quantity. The words, 'as they now lie,' refer to quality or condition rather than quantity and number. No part of the writing covered this collateral stipulation set up by the plaintiffs. Consequently evidence of it was admissible, and it was for the jury to determine whether it was proved or not. . . . The parties having reduced their contract to writing, their rights must be governed by and depend upon its terms as therein expressed, irrespective of parol evidence of what was intended, or what took place previous to or at the time of making the contract. But there are exceptions to this general rule which permit parol evidence of engagements collateral to, or independent of, the provisions expressed in the written agreement, and not within its terms, although made at the same time and affecting the rights of the parties in relation to the subject-matter of the writing. In such it is deemed only partially reduced to writing, and the collateral undertaking or stipulation exists in parol."

In Farwell v. Tillson (1884) 76 Me. 239, the contract sued on was partly oral and partly written and provided, among other things, for the furnishing of stone for building purposes. The court held that an oral agreement between the parties with regard to the amount of stone to be furnished was properly admitted in evidence.

But evidence directly contradicting the amount of a commodity specifically stated in a written contract of sale will not be admitted.

California.—Schroeder v. Schmidt (1887) 74 Cal. 459, 16 Pac. 243; Hodson v. Varney (1898) 122 Cal. 619, 55 Pac. 413.

Illinois.—McCloskey v. McCormick (1865) 37 Ill. 66.

Massachusetts.—Ridgway v. Bowman (1851) 7 Cush. 268; Parry v. Libbey (1896) 166 Mass. 112, 44 N. E. 124.

Mississippi.—Coats v. Bacon (1900) 77 Miss. 320, 27 So. 621.

Montana.—Hogan v. Kelly (1904) 29 Mont. 485, 75 Pac. 81.

Sackett (1889) 53 Hun, 638, 6 N. Y. Supp. 860.

Thus, it has been said that parol evidence will not be admitted to show what was intended to be included in a bill of sale, where there is no doubt of the identity of the articles described therein. Schroeder v. Schmidt (Cal.) supra.

Nor will parol evidence be admitted to show that property included in a bill of sale was not intended to be included. Hogan v. Kelly (Mont.) supra. So, where the contract of sale of a photograph studio transferred "all the cameras . . . therein contained," the court refused to admit parol evidence to show that a certain named camera was reserved from the property sold. Hodson v. Varney (Cal.) supra.

In Pennington v. Avera (Ga.) supra, the court held that where a written contract of sale purported to cover "all timber for sawmill purposes" on a parcel of land, parol evidence would not be admitted to show that the limbs and tops of trees should be included in the contract, as well as all timber capable of being made into lumber.

In Ridgway v. Bowman (Mass.) supra, it appeared that a bill of sale was given of the stock of a livery stable, most of which was covered by a mortgage. In an action of trover by the vendor to recover part of the property as not conveyed by the bill of sale, he attempted to show by the attorney who prepared the bill of sale that he, the vendor, had stated to the purchaser that he was conveying only the mortgaged property. The evidence was rejected on the ground that it was an attempt to vary and control a written instrument by parol evidence.

In Parry v. Libbey (Mass.) supra, the bill of sale involved purported to convey to the plaintiffs "a certain lot of brick, being brick now left in a certain kiln situated in the southerly end of brick shed at South Clinton, Massachusetts, containing about two hundred thousand hard brick; also about one hundred thousand light hard brick, being piled partly in northern end of said shed and partly outside of shed." It was held that the words, on their face, purported to convey all the brick in the two distinct piles mentioned, and that parol evidence was inadmissible to cut down their effect.

In McCloskey v. McCormick (Ill.) supra, there was involved a written memorandum in the form of a bill of sale, which contained a list of property, including the item, a "lot of empty boxes and empty barrels (not including 442 tierces and 100 barrels of salt now in the pork house), all other movable effects now in said pork house." It was held that it was not a mere receipt, but a bill of sale, and that parol evidence could not be admitted to prove that 150 barrels of salt should have been excepted instead of 100 barrels. The court said: "It is insisted that this bill of sale was executed in mistake, and included 50 barrels of salt not intended to be sold. That instead of there being but 100 barrels of salt, as received, there were 150. It is insisted that appellant had the right to explain the bill of sale, and to show that no portion of the salt was in fact sold. It will be observed that but 100 barrels of the salt and the tierces were reserved, and the other movable effects then in the house were included. The right to show the mistake is placed upon the ground that the bill of sale was in effect but a receipt, and, as such, it could be either contradicted or explained. In that respect it speaks its own language. If appellees were permitted to prove that this bill of sale contained articles not sold, it seems to us that it is not explaining a receipt, but contradicting an agreement or contract. It says that these 50 barrels of salt were sold to appellant, and it is proposed to prove that they were not sold."

In Coats v. Bacon (1900) 77 Miss. 320, 27 So. 621, it appeared that a written contract between the plaintiff and the defendants provided for the purchase of 6,000 cards of needles. After the delivery of the contract, a copy thereof was sent to the defendants with the request that they check it over carefully. They returned it with the statement that they had checked it, and found it correct in every particular. It was held that parol evidence by the defendants to the effect that they had intended to order only 6,000 needles was improperly admitted, the court saying: "The letter from appellants to appellee of date August 9, 1898, taken with the indorsement thereon by appellee, 'We have checked this all over carefully, and find it correct in every particular,' completed the contract, which, being thus in writing, could not be changed in its terms by parol. Proof of fraud would set aside the contract, but there is no such proof in this record. Appellee should have read carefully the letters of appellants, and to indorse in the unqualified terms he did the proposed contract, without reading it carefully, is simply gross inattention. To permit the parol proof objected to in this case to be heard in evidence would be to make a contract for the parties, not to enforce the contract which they have themselves made. It was error to admit such parol proof."

By the terms of the contract involved in Van Gorden v. Sackett (1889) 53 Hun, 638, 6 N. Y. Supp. 860, the plaintiff agreed to deliver "about 200 bushels of buckwheat" to the defendant. He delivered in fact only about 50 bushels, and the defendant refused to pay therefor until the whole amount contracted for had been delivered. Parol evidence was admitted to the effect that, at the time the contract was made, the defendant's agent was told by the plaintiff that the buckwheat was partnership property, that his share was only about 100 bushels, and that he did not think the other owner would sell his share; and that the agent replied that it would be all right, and that the plaintiff would get pay for what he delivered. It was held that the evidence was properly admitted, the court saying: "It was competent to show by parol what the condition was, and what obligation was, by the bargain as in fact made, upon the defendant. Chapin v. Dobson (1879) 78 N. Y. 74, 34 Am. Rep. 512; Eighmie v. Taylor (1885) 98 N. Y. 294; Juilliard v. Chaffee (1883) 92 N. Y. 535; Benjamin, Sales, 2d ed. § 232.

In this view evidence was given from which the justice had the right to find, as a part of the bargain, that the plaintiff might draw what buckwheat he had, and he would have his pay, without reference to whether the party who owned the rest drew his share. This would not necessarily be inconsistent with the writing, but would relate to the time and manner of payment. If such was the bargain, the defendant, after receiving and keeping the plaintiff's share, would not be in a position to assert the entirety of the contract, but would be bound to pay for what he received, and resort to his claim for damages, if the balance was not delivered."

However, when a contract of sale is tinged with fraud, parol evidence is admissible to explain the transaction, even though in effect it directly contradicts the amount of the commodity specifically stated to be sold and transferred thereby. Thus, in the reported Case (TENENBAUM v. GERHARD B. LAMBERT Co. ante, 745) it is held that parol evidence was admissible to show that the amount of scrap iron specified in a written contract of sale was fixed at 50 tons, through the fraudulent representations of the purchaser's agent, when in fact the vendor had on hand for sale only about 18½ tons. So, in Kirby v. Thurmond (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 1099, it appeared that there was a written contract between the plaintiff and the defendant for the sale of a stock of goods, specifying that the seller did not warrant as to quantity. It was held, however, that the parol evidence rule was not violated by admitting evidence to the effect that the defendant fraudulently misrepresented the amount of goods on hand at the time of sale. The court said: "Allegations of a petition are taken as true when considering a demurrer thereto. It was alleged that plaintiff was induced by fraudulent misrepresentations to enter into the contract of purchase, and but for such misrepresentations he would not have done so, stating what the misrepresentations were, and that they were made wilfully and with intent to deceive, etc., were sufficient to state a good cause of action, and, if proven, warranted a verdict by the jury. The provision in the bill of sale that 'it is understood that said stock is sold as it now stands, and the grantor does not warrant as to quantity,' does not preclude plaintiff from showing that he was induced to make the trade, and, in so doing, relied on the representations of the defendant. This does not violate the well-known rule that parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written contract, as the action in this case sounds in tort and not in contract."

CORA L. KALLOCK

MARY ELWARD.

(— Me. —, 109 Atl. 256.)

Arrest — privilege of exemption — loss.

1. Exemption from arrest is a personal privilege which may be lost by waiver or estoppel.

Estoppel — effect of statute.

2. A statute cannot stand in the way of waiver or equitable estoppel when the facts demand their application in the interest of justice and right.

— to set up statutory exemption from arrest.

3. A married woman masquerading as a single one, who, when sued for tort by one ignorant of and with no means of knowledge of the true state of facts, gives a bail bond to secure release from arrest, is estopped, after judgment goes against her, to set up her statutory exemption from arrest in exoneration of her bail.

Arrest — right to discharge — when determined.

4. The status of one petitioning for discharge from arrest at the time the application is made is the test of his right to relief.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to an order of the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County, at law, granting defendant's motion after verdict against her and before judgment, for exoneration and discharge of herself and sureties on her bail bond because she was a married woman exempt from arrest, in an action brought to recover damages for alienation by her of the affections of plaintiff's husband. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Frank H. Ingraham and A. S. Littlefield for plaintiff.

Mr. E. C. Payson for defendant.

Cornish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before the law court on plaintiff's exceptions to the order of the presiding justice granting the defendant's motion and ordering an exoneration on a bail bond.

The facts are these: On July 19, 1918, an action was brought by the plaintiff under Rev. Stat. chap. 66, § 7, to recover damages of the defendant because of her alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's husband. A capias writ was issued returnable at the September term, 1918, of the supreme judicial court for Knox county, and, in accordance with its commands, the defendant was arrested and held to bail in the sum of $8,000. The bail bond was signed by Mary L. Elword, as principal, and C. E. Bicknell and A. B. Crockett as sureties, was accepted by the sheriff, and the defendant was released from custody. The condition of the bail bond was as follows: "Now, therefore, if the above-bonded defendant shall appear and answer unto said suit and abide final judgment thereon and not avoid, then this obligation shall be void," etc.

The writ was duly entered at the September term, 1918, the bail bond was filed in court, an attorney appeared for the defendant, and the action was continued to the January term, and again to the April term, 1919, when the case was tried and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Early in the trial, it appeared, to the surprise of the plaintiff, that the defendant was a married woman, Mrs. Mary L. Davis, and that she had held herself out as a single woman on coming to Maine, in accordance with a pre-arranged plan with her husband, who in the meantime had gone to Pennsylvania. The defendant's attorney stated that he had received no information in regard to the marriage until about one month before the trial.

At the same term, after verdict against her and before judgment, the defendant filed a motion asking that she and her sureties on the bail bond be exonerated and discharged because she was a married woman, and under the statutes of this state was exempt from arrest. The presiding justice granted the motion "as a matter of legal right," and to this ruling exceptions were taken by the plaintiff.

The statute in this state granting a married woman exemption from arrest is as follows: "A husband married since April 26, 1852, is not liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, nor for those contracted afterward in her own name, for any lawful purpose; nor is he liable for her torts committed after April 26, 1883, in which he takes no part; but she is liable in all such cases; a suit may be maintained against her therefor, and her property may be attached and taken on execution for such debts and for damages for such torts, as if she were sole; but she cannot be arrested." Rev. Stat. chap. 66, § 4.

Exemption from arrest, however, is a personal privilege, and, as such, may be lost either by waiver or by estoppel.

Thus at common law a party or a witness duly summoned in a process then pending is immune from arrest while in attendance upon court, but the privilege may be waived. Brown v. Getchell, 11 Mass. 11; Smith v. Jones, 76 Me. 138, 49 Am. Rep. 598.

So under the Constitution of Maine, senators and representatives, except in certain cases, are privileged from arrest "during their attendance at, going to, and returning from each session of the legislature." Art. 4, pt. 3, § 8. And yet it has been held that this privilege, though guaranteed by the organic law of the state, may be waived. The jury found such a waiver in Chase v. Fish, 16 Me. 132, and this court sustained the finding.

In the case at bar the exemption is created by statute, but there is no reason why the doctrines of waiver and estoppel should not apply and work their legitimate effects the same as if the exemption were created at common law or under the Constitution. A statute cannot stand in the way of waiver or equitable estoppel when the facts demand their application in the interest of justice and right. Thus it has been held in an elaborate opinion in which the doctrine is fully discussed that a statute, providing that "no waiver of demand or notice by an indorser of a promissory note is valid unless it is in writing, signed by him or his lawful agent," may be waived, or the conduct of the indorser may have been such that he is estopped to set up the statute. Hallowell Nat. Bank v. Marston, 85 Me. 488, 27 Atl. 529. "A statutory or even a constitutional provision, made for one's benefit, is not so sacred that he may not waive it, and having once waived it he is estopped from thereafter claiming it," says the court in that case.

It remains, therefore, to ascertain whether the conduct of the defendant has been such in this case that she is estopped from now claiming the privilege of immunity from arrest. Has she so acted as to induce the plaintiff, relying upon her acts, to take steps which otherwise he would not have taken, and to change his course to his own disadvantage so that, having remained silent when she should have spoken, to allow her now to speak, even to allege and prove the truth, would be contrary to equity and good conscience?

That the defendant was in fact a married woman, Mrs. Mary L. Davis, at the time of her arrest, sufficiently appears from the bill of exceptions. She was masquerading as a single woman under the name of Mary L. Elword, or Mary L. Elward, or Mary Elwood. The reason for this subterfuge is best known to the defendant and her husband, but it is admitted that it was in accordance with a preconcerted plan between them, when she came to Maine and he went to Pennsylvania. The plaintiff was, therefore, justified in suing her as a feme sole and in making the arrest on mesne process. Had she then told the truth, the proceedings would immediately have been dropped, because the object of the service by arrest was undoubtedly to secure, if possible, a guaranty of the payment of judgment through the sureties on the bail bond, and if she were a married woman so that coverture would prevent the taking of such a bond, it is fair to presume that the unnecessary expense of costs and counsel fees would have been avoided by the plaintiff. The bail bond was supposed to take the place of attached property, and as security for the judgment if one were obtained.

But the defendant did not disclose the true situation, which she knew and which the plaintiff did not know and had not means of knowing, and the defendant was aware of her ignorance.

Instead, she gave the bail bond. That, of itself, has been held not to constitute a waiver. Baker v. Copeland, 140 Mass. 842, 4 N. E. 606; Dickinson v. Farwell, 71 N. H. 218, 51 Atl. 624. But in the latter case the court said by way of dictum: "If the plaintiff does not know of the facts which create the privilege,—of the defendant's attendance upon a court as a witness, for example,—and the defendant is aware of the plaintiff's ignorance, he may possibly waive the privilege by omitting to disclose the facts. But it is not necessary to decide that question, for it is not claimed that the plaintiff was ignorant of the reason why the defendant happened to be within the jurisdiction at the time of his arrest."

We would not rest our decision, therefore, merely upon the defendant's failure to disclose the facts at the time of arrest, because it is undoubtedly true as a general principle that, if a person deprives another of his liberty, he does so at his peril. But that is one link in the chain. The action was entered in court and the bail bond was filed. At the April term, 1919, pleadings were filed. The general issue was pleaded with a brief statement that the affections of the plaintiff's husband for the plaintiff were destroyed before he met the defendant. Up to that point the plaintiff had been kept in utter darkness as to the true situation. The plaintiff's attorney opened the case to the jury, and after he had concluded he asked counsel for the defendant if he would admit the marriage and identity of the parties, referring, of course, to the plaintiff and her husband. The defendant's attorney replied: "If you mean that Miss Elward is Mrs. Mary L. Davis, yes." This was the first intimation that the plaintiff or her counsel had that the defendant was a married woman. The trial then proceeded, and after a verdict against her this motion for an exoneretur was made by the defendant. We think this came too late to permit such a scheme to succeed is to put a premium on wilful deception, the practice of which had involved the plaintiff in useless cost and expense, and worked gross injustice.

It is true, as claimed by the defendant, that the status of the petitioner for discharge at the time when application is made is the test, and it might happen that, although the arrest had been valid when made, through intervening circumstances a discharge should be granted, as, for instance, if the debtor had received his discharge in bankruptcy before judgment rendered. The reason is that, if the principal were surrendered by the bail, the court could not commit him, or, if committed, he would be entitled to immediate discharge. Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. 329, 9 L. ed. 145; White v. Blake, 22 Wend. 612; Washburn v. Phelps, 24 Vt. 506; Champion v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 481, cited in Almon H. Fogg Co. v. Bartlett, 106 Me. 122, 124, 188 Am. St. Rep. 338, 75 Atl. 380.

That, however, is not this case. Here, if the bail should surrender the principal, she would not be entitled to a discharge because through her own conduct she has deprived herself of this privilege she had once possessed, and having once waived it, she is estopped from thereafter claiming it.

Authorities for the position taken are not lacking.

In Moses v. Richardson, 8 Barn. & C. 421, 108 Eng. Reprint, 1098, the court of King's bench declined to discharge a married woman from arrest on execution, where she had been sued as a feme sole and suffered judgment to go by default. "She must be left to her writ of error," said Lord Chief Justice Tenterden.

In Poole v. Canning, L. R. 2 C. P.

241, a married woman, sued as a feme sole, pleaded coverture, but offered no evidence in support of the plea. A verdict was found against her, and she was afterwards arrested upon the execution. She then applied for a discharge. The discharge was refused. Keating, J., said: "She comes to ask for her discharge on the ground that she is that which by the judgment of the court she is pronounced not to be."

Willes, J., said there was no authority for extending the power of discharge "to the case of one sued as a feme sole suffering judgment by default, or to the case of a married woman who has pleaded her coverture and has allowed the verdict to go against her on the trial of that issue, and so has created a sort of estoppel of the advantage to which it would be unjust to deprive a creditor without at least indemnifying him against the costs which he has been unnecessarily put to."

These two cases were cited and quoted in Winchester v. Everett, 80 Me. 535, 541, 1 L.R.A. 425, 6 Am. St. Rep. 228, 15 Atl. 596, where it was held that a judgment creditor is not liable in trespass for refusing, on notice that his judgment debtor is a married woman, to release her from arrest already made by an of-

In Weston v. Palmer, 51 Me. 73, the two defendants were in fact husband and wife, but there was nothing in the writ to indicate that relation, and the court held that the wife was sued as a feme sole. Coverture was not pleaded. Judgment was rendered on default, and the court refused a writ of error. The ground of the decision is stated as follows: "They now claim that, because they then had a legal defense, . . . which they chose not to avail themselves of, the judgment is erroneous and ought to be reversed. We think otherwise. They have had their day in court. They have once had a fair opportunity to try the same questions which are not presented. They chose not to avail themselves of it, and the law will not allow them another."

The same principle of equitable estoppel runs through all these cases. It obtains here. The defendant in this legal battle voluntarily laid down or designedly concealed a weapon which she might have successfully used. It is too late now for her to resume it and thereby unjustly deprive the plaintiff of the fruits of her victory.

Exceptions sustained.

ANNOTATION.

Waiver of privilege against or nonliability to arrest in civil action.

But it seems that the privilege accorded to a diplomatic or consular representative of a foreign nation is not personal, and cannot be waived. United States v. Benner (1890) Baldw. 234, Fed. Cas. No. 14,568; Valarino v. Thompson (1853) 7 N. Y. 576. Thus, in United States v. Benner (Fed.) supra, the defendant was indicted for the arrest and imprisonment of the secretary of the Danish legation. The court said: "The privileges of a foreign minister are not personal, nor is their violation punished as an injury to himself; the immunity from arrest is the privilege of the sovereign who sends him, the injury is done to him, in the person of his representative."

The general law of all nations, as well as the municipal laws of each, exempt ministers from all jurisdiction or control over their persons, so long as their representative character is recognized by the government which sends or receives them; if they exercise the functions of ministers, or retain that character, their exemptions attach to their office, whether they claim them or not. There is no principle of national law, or any word in an act of Congress, which justifies the arrest of a minister who waives the privileges of the diplomatic character." So, in Valarino v. Thompson (N. Y.) supra, the action was in assumpsit for money had and received. A verdict and judgment having been obtained in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant removed the cause to the superior court, assigning as error the fact that prior to and at the time of the commencement of the action against him, he was consul of the Republic of Ecuador, and so privileged from arrest and suit. The court held that the privilege was not a personal one, that the defendant did not waive it by answering to the merits, and that it was no objection that the plea was set up for the first time in an appellate court.

II. What constitutes waiver.

a. Failure to claim or plead privilege.

An exemption from civil arrest is waived by submitting to the arrest and failing to assert the exemption. Thus, in Hess v. Morgan (1802) 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 84, an action for assault and battery and false imprisonment against a justice of the peace, for the issuance, in a former action, of an execution against the body of the plaintiff on which he was imprisoned, the evidence showed that the judgment in the former action was recovered before the justice, who asked the plaintiff if execution should issue; that the reply of the plaintiff was that he did not care how soon, and that he refused to state whether he was a freeholder or had a family. It was held that his refusal to claim exemption amounted to an acquiescence or submission to the process, and constituted a waiver of his exemption.

A like view was taken in Gillespie v. Fogarty (1840) 3 N. B. 162, wherein it appeared that the defendant was arrested while returning from court where he had attended as a witness. The court held that, since he was distinctly informed at the time of his seizure that he was privileged from arrest, his reply that it was just as well to arrest him, as it would save expense and he might as well meet the demand at once, constituted a waiver of his privilege.

So, in Cable v. Cooper (1818) 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 152, it was held that where a defendant taken in execution is discharged from imprisonment under the act for the relief of debtors with respect to the imprisonment of their persons, and is afterwards sued on the original judgment, he must plead his exemption if he intends to avail himself of it, and his omission to do so is a waiver.

Similarly, the privilege of a state senator from arrest while on his way to attend a session of the legislature was held in Chase v. Fish (1839) 16 Me. 132, to have been waived by submitting with but slight protest to arrest.

In like manner, in Geyer v. Irwin (1790) 4 Dall. (Pa.) 107, 1 L. ed. 762, it was held that while a member of the general assembly is privileged from arrest during his attendance on the session, the privilege thus granted must be claimed at a proper time and manner, and is waived by a failure to urge it "as an objection to the trial of the cause."

In Smith v. Jones (1834) 76 Me. 138, 49 Am. Rep. 598, it appeared that the plaintiff, while returning home from another city where he had been attending court, was arrested and confined in prison until he was finally discharged on the ground that he was privileged from arrest. While the main issue involved was the propriety of bringing an action to recover damages for the plaintiff's detention, the court nevertheless said: "All the authorities affirm that the privilege may be waived. Therefore, the arrest cannot be void; is only voidable. The arrest remains valid until avoided. And the witness can avoid the arrest only by applying to the court for a discharge. He waives the privilege unless he applies for a discharge."

Likewise, in Cooke v. Gibbs (1807) 3 Mass. 193, it was held that the exemption of the defendant from arrest, in an action of debt on a judgment on which he had been previously committed to jail, and had been discharged on taking the poor prisoner's oath, was waived by neglecting to plead it.

The right of a voter to exemption from arrest on election day was, in Woods v. Davis (1857) 34 N. H. 328, held to be waived. It appeared that he was arrested and detained on election day by a tax collector for nonpayment of his taxes, and that he said nothing to the collector about his right to vote, made no objection on the ground of his privilege as a voter, and made no claim of exemption from arrest on that account. But in Swift v. Chamberlain (1820) 3 Conn. 537, the court held that an elector who, after election, retired to a house in the neighborhood while the proper officers were counting the votes, was still attending to the business of the election and was privileged from arrest, and that mere silence on his part at the time of his arrest was no waiver of his privilege.

A claim of exemption from civil arrest must be interposed in the proceeding at the first opportunity, or it is waived. Thus, it cannot be made for the first time after judgment. Wood v. Kinsman (1833) 5 Vt. 588. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff was exempt from arrest by reason of the fact that he had taken advantage of the Poor Debtors' Law. The court held that by negligently delaying and suffering judgment to be taken against him, and not appearing to object to the execution issuing against his body, and, in addition, returning from another state and surrendering himself to the officer in discharge of his bail, he waived his privilege so that he could not later set it up in an action of trespass by him to recover for his illegal arrest and imprisonment.

So, a plea of privilege made for the first time on appeal comes too late. Wilson v. Nettleton (1850) 12 Ill. 61, wherein the court held that a plea of privilege, by an attorney, that he was arrested on a civil writ issued in justice's court, while attending court as a suitor, was waived, where it was interposed for the first time in the circuit court on appeal.

While five days' delay has been held not to be a waiver (Desuian v. Zefcak (1899) 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 71), in the same jurisdiction, it has been held that an application to set aside the writ and process because the defendant, at the time of its issuance and service, was a suitor in another case pending, would not be allowed, where it appeared that the application was made after several days' delay, and after the defendant had obtained a rule to show cause why he should not be discharged on common bail (Green v. Bonaffon (1838) 2 Miles (Pa.) 219).

In Farmer v. Robbins (1872) 47 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 415, the defendant was arrested while on his way home from attending a cause in another county. The court held that, since the defendant failed to claim his personal privilege to the sheriff, and failed to demand his exemption from the county judge who issued the order, but, on the contrary, acquiesced in the arrest by his silence in respect to his personal privilege, and, in addition to that, entered into the usual undertaking, and then waited some twenty-two days before serving the motion papers for an order discharging the arrest, he was guilty of laches and would be deemed to have waived his personal privilege.

In Gottschall v. Reinhart (1890) 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 415, it appeared that a freeholder, three years after he was arrested in an action for slander, made an application to quash the writ on the ground that he was a freeholder and, under the law, exempt from arrest. The court held that the writ would not be quashed, since he was too late in filing the application.

In Barcklow v. Hutchinson (1867) 32 N. J. L. 195, it appeared that a resident freeholder, privileged as such from civil arrest, was arrested on suspicion of attempting to leave the jurisdiction and defraud his creditors. The court held that it was his privilege to claim the immunity, but that he waived all irregularities by filing a written plea which admitted that he was a freeholder and owed the debt, but which was defective because it failed to state that he was a resident of the county.

On the same principle, it was held in Randall v. Crandall (1844) 6 Hill (N. Y.) 342, that the filing of a plea in bar by a person exempt from arrest admitted for all purposes that the defendant was properly in court, and thereby waived his right to object that the warrant on which the action was commenced was served upon him while he was attending court as a suitor in another case.

According to the view of the majority of the courts which have passed on the point, a person privileged from civil arrest does not waive his privilege by appearing in the action and giving bail. Larned v. Griffin (1882) 12 Fed. 590; Dickinson v. Farwell (1902) 71 N. H. 213, 51 Atl. 624; Farmer v. Robbins (1872) 47 How. Pr.

(N. Y.) 415; Mackay v. Lewis (1876) 7 Hun (N. Y.) 88; United States v. Edme (1822) 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 147; Dobson v. Fitzpatrick (1875) 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 186; Desuian v. Zefcak (1899) 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 77; Washburn v. Phelps (1852) 24 Vt. 506.

Thus, in Mackay v. Lewis (1876) 7 Hun (N. Y.) 83, it was held that a witness attending the trial of an action to which he is a party is privileged from arrest and waives no rights by giving bail. See also Farmer v. Robbins (1872) 47 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 415.

Likewise, in Dickinson v. Farwell (1902) 71 N. H. 213, 51 Atl. 624, it appeared that the defendant, a resident of New York, while a witness before a referee in another action pending in the superior court of New Hampshire, was arrested a few minutes after he had left the witness stand, and before he had been discharged from testifying in that action. He furnished bond without objection, but on the day to which the writ was returnable he appeared specially and moved for a discharge from arrest on the ground that he was exempt from arrest and process. The court held that he was privileged and that the giving of the bail was not a waiver of his privilege, saying: "The giving of bail by a witness arrested in a civil action while entitled to the privilege is not, of itself, sufficient to constitute a waiver of the privilege. An arrest under such circumstances is illegal. The witness by giving bail acknowledges the fact of the arrest, but not its validity. He elects to be in the nominal custody of persons of his own selection, rather than in the actual custody of the sheriff or jailer, while the arrest continues in force. To protect the administration of justice, it is oftentimes necessary that he shall be released from actual custody as soon as possible. There was evidently such necessity in this case. The release can usually be effected more conveniently, expeditiously, and surely by giving bail than by either of the other methods provided by law."

So, in Larned v. Griffin (1882) 12 Fed. 590, it was held that where the defendant was arrested while in attendance before a commissioner taking a deposition, the fact that he submitted to the arrest, made application for bail, and entered into bond for his release, did not constitute a waiver of his privilege against arrest.

Similarly, in United States v. Edme (1822) 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 147, it appeared that the defendant was arrested on a writ issuing from the United States district court, while he was returning from his attendance on a magistrate before whom he had made a deposition as a witness in a pending case. The court held that he was privileged from arrest, saying that the giving of a bail bond was so far from waiving the privilege that the court, in granting a discharge, would order it to be delivered up to be canceled.

So, in Washburn v. Phelps (1852) 24 Vt. 506, wherein a person was arrested while attending court as a witness, in violation of his privilege, and required to give bail to effect his release, the court said: "The courts have often shown themselves somewhat astute in devising grounds upon which to presume a waiver of the privilege from arrest, by giving bail, or in some other mode. But it is not esteemed any good ground for presuming a waiver of privilege from arrest, because the person takes the ordinary and most expeditious mode of freeing himself from arrest."

In Dobson v. Fitzpatrick (1875) 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 186, it was held that the act of a freeholder in appearing and moving to reduce the bail constituted no waiver of his privilege from arrest.

So, in Desuian v. Zefcak (1899) 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 77, where the plaintiff sued out a writ of habeas corpus in slander, against a freeholder who was privileged from arrest, the court held that the giving of bail by the freeholder was no waiver of his right to abate the writ on the ground that he was privileged.

Bidgood v. Davis (1826) 6 Barn. & C. 84, 108 Eng. Reprint, 384, 9 Dowl. & R. 158, 5 L. J. K. B. 64, while not expressly so holding, seemingly implies that the execution of a bail bond is not a waiver of privilege. In that case it appeared that the warden of the Tower, though insisting on his privilege from arrest, was arrested and confined in jail. He still claimed his privilege, but afterwards executed a bail bond to regain his liberty. While the court refused to order the bail bond to be delivered up and canceled, it nevertheless allowed him to sue out his writ of privilege.

There seem, however, to be a few cases of contrary tendency from the same jurisdictions. Thus, in Petrie v. Fitzgerald (1864) 1 Daly (N. Y.) 401, it appeared that the defendant was summoned to attend court to be informally examined by the opposing counsel on certain matters pending in another action; and after examination, but before he had a reasonable time to leave the city hall, he was arrested, and later released on bail. The court held that while he was privileged from arrest at the time of seizure, yet this privilege was personal, and was waived by his acts in giving bail and giving notice of justification of his sureties. So, in Stewart v. Howard (1858) 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 26, wherein the defendant was placed under arrest while attending court as a witness in another cause, it was held that giving bail without objection, giving notice by his attorney of a retainer in the cause, and demanding a copy of the complaint amounted to a waiver of his privilege from arrest. And in Fletcher v. Baxter (1827) 2 Aik. (Vt.) 224, wherein it appeared a person was arrested while attending court as a witness, the court held that where he not only gave bail, but suffered a judgment to pass against him in the original suit without claiming his privilege, the privilege was waived.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that one privileged from civil arrest waives his privilege by submitting to arrest and giving bail. Brown v. Getchell (1814) 11 Mass. 11; White v. Marshall (1902) 23 Ohio C. C. 376; Lipton v. Harris (1824) Peck (Tenn.) 414. Thus, in White v. Marshall (1902) 23 Ohio C. C. 376, supra, it appeared that the defendant was brought into the state of Ohio by extradition proceedings for the trial of a crime which he had committed there. While awaiting hearing on this charge, a civil action was commenced against him, growing out of the same transaction for which he was arrested and indicted. The defendant claimed that the court had no jurisdiction to try the second action, and that he was privileged from arrest by reason of the fact that he was brought into the state under extradition proceedings for trial in another case. The court held that by filing motions for bail, which raised an issue of fact not only as to his rights to bail, but as to the existence of a complete defense to the action before he claimed exemption, he waived the privilege, saying: "It may be admitted that if extradition process should be used for the purpose of bringing the party into another state, with the intention of there serving him in a civil action, that the court might under such state of facts relieve the party from his appearance, not because the defendant himself could claim the same if he had voluntarily entered his appearance in the action, but because of the imposition upon the court and upon the state that brought the prisoner within its borders to answer for a crime therein committed. The good faith required in such cases is that the defendant shall be prosecuted for a crime he has committed, and not brought into the state for mere personal motives, and for the purpose of a civil action. . . . The defendant entered his appearance by his answer to the petition in the civil action, and by the motions he filed to quash the writ upon which he was arrested, and, having appeared by way of tendering issues to obtain his release from the arrest, he cannot thereafter avail himself of his privilege, but has waived it."

So, in Brown v. Getchell (Mass.) supra, it was held that while a party attending court is privileged from arrest, yet where he voluntarily submits to the custody of the arresting officer, and gives bail to effect his release, he thereby waives his privilege.

In Tipton v. Harris (Tenn.) supra, it was held that where a witness privileged from arrest is arrested, and does not insist on his privilege, but gives a bond for the prison limits, this amounts to a sufficient waiver of his privilege.

c. False representation as to status.

In Partridge v. Clarke (1793) 5 T. R. 194, 101 Eng. Reprint, 109, it was held that the defendant would not be discharged from arrest on common bail on the ground that she was a married woman, where it appeared that at the time she procured the credit she was masquerading as a single woman, and specifically denied that she was married. And see the reported case (KALLOCK v. ELWARD, ante, 750), wherein it is held that a married woman who holds herself out to the world as a single woman thereby waives the exemption from arrest granted to married women, and is estopped to set up her coverture as privilege against arrest.

J. COLLISON, Appt.,

v.

DAVID CURTNER, in His Own Right and as Admr., etc., of Woodrow Curtner, Deceased.

(— Ark. —, 216 S. W. 1059.)

Landlord and tenant — construction of lease — duty to make repairs.

1. A provision in a lease of a cotton gin that lessor shall furnish all fuel and supplies, "all repairs and new parts of machinery, and other similar things necessary for the successful operation of the plant" makes him responsible for the making of the repairs, not simply for furnishing the material, and therefore liable for injury through nonrepair, to one rightfully on the premises.

Contract — construction — parties preparing.

2. One preparing an instrument is responsible for the language employed, which will be given its plain and ordinary meaning.

[See 6 R. C. L. 854.]

Appeal — evidence — failure to object.

3. Testimony admitted without objection cannot be the subject of complaint on appeal.

[See 2 R. C. L. 77.]

Evidence — permission to enter boiler room in cotton gin.

4. Upon the question of liability for injury to one who had gone into the boiler room of a cotton gin to ascertain if his cotton was ready, evidence is admissible that persons going to the gin on business were permitted to enter that room.

5. Upon the question of liability for injury to a customer in the boiler room of a cotton gin by the blowing of a plug out of the boiler, evidence is admissible of witness's examination of the condition of the boiler soon after the accident, and the conditions which were found.

— lapse of time between accident and examination — effect.

6. The lapse of fifteen days between an injury by the blowing of a plug out of a boiler and an examination of the boiler by witness does not render his testimony as to the condition of the boiler inadmissible in the absence of anything to show a change in the condition.

[See 10 R. C. L. 943.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County (Jackson, J.) in favor of plaintiff in consolidated actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries to himself, and for injury to and death of his son, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Brundidge & Neelly and Cul. L. Pearce, for appellant:

Ledgerwood, to whom defendant had leased the property, was an independent contractor, for whose acts or whose failure to perform certain duties in the operation of the gin defendant was not responsible.

Mr. G. G. McKay also for appellee.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 3d of October, 1918, David Curtner, accompanied by his son, Woodrow Curtner, five years of age, drove a load of cotton to the gin of J. Collison, at Bald Knob, Arkansas. While waiting to have the cotton ginned, Curtner and his son went into the boiler room of the gin, and while there a plug at the bottom of the boiler was blown out, and Curtner and his son were scalded. The son died from the injuries received, and David Curtner instituted a separate action in his own right, and as administrator of the estate of his son instituted another action against the appellant, to recover damages for the injury and death of the son.

The grounds of negligence set forth in the complaints are that Collison negligently and carelessly permitted the boiler to become and remain insecure and unsafe, in that the plug used by him to stop the blowpipe at the bottom of the boiler was too large for the opening, and when screwed into the opening only a few threads would catch; that the threads in the opening of the boiler were worn, some of them being entirely gone, making the plug insecure in the opening; that the plug blew out, and permitted the steam and hot water to escape and burn the plaintiff below, appellee here, rendering him a cripple for life; that Collison, at the time of and before the happening of the accident, knew of, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the defective condition of the boiler, and that such condition was wholly unknown to the appellee. The appellee then set forth minutely the nature of the injuries received. The appel-lee alleged that he had suffered, and that he will continue to suffer for the remainder of his life, great pain of body and anguish of mind as a result of the injuries; that on account of his own personal injuries he had been damaged in the sum of $30,000, for which he asked judgment.

In the case of the appellee as administrator of the estate of his son, he alleged the same grounds of negligence, and set up that his son was injured by reason thereof, and suffered great agony, and finally died as the result of the negligence alleged. He averred that the services of his minor son were worth to him the sum of $5,000, and that he should recover for the benefit of the estate in the sum of $15,000. He therefore prayed for judgment in the sum of $20,000.

In his answer the defendant, appellant here, denied all the material allegations of the complaint, and set up as an affirmative defense that the gin where the accident happened had been rented by the appellant to one N. B. Ledgerwood, who at the time was in the exclusive possession, control, management, and operation of the same; that, if the appellee and his son were injured, their injuries were caused by the appellee's going into the boiler room and taking his son, without the invitation or permission of the appellant; that appellee knew, or should have known, that it was a dangerous place, and was a trespasser, and was therefore guilty of contributory negligence. The allegations of the answer in the case of the appellee as administrator of the estate of his son were substantially the same. In that case the appellant charged that the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence in taking his son into a dangerous place and allowing him to remain there.

The causes were consolidated for the trial.

Appellant first contends that at the time of the accident the gin was being operated by one N. B. Ledgerwood, under a lease from appellant which exempted him from liability in damages for the injuries of which the appellee complains. The lease was dated August 1, 1918, and was between J. Collison, the lessor, and N. B. Ledgerwood, the lessee, and recites in part as follows: "For and in consideration of the payment of rentals hereinafter reserved, and the covenants herein, the lessor hereby grants, lets, and leases unto the lessee, his executor, administrator, and assigns, for a period of one (1) year from the date hereof, the following property: All the property, personal and real, now used and known as the 'Collison gin plant,' including the realty upon which it is located, in the town of Bald Knob, Arkansas, and the use and the employment of all machinery, fixtures, implements, utensils, supplies on hand, and all other things which now constitute or are a part of the said gin plant, or located upon the premises and which are considered a part of the said gin plant. . . . It being agreed that the lessor shall furnish all wood, coal, and other fuel, oil, belting, and other supplies, all repairs and new parts of machinery and other similar things necessary for the successful operation of the said plant, and shall receive from the lessee the sum of $4.25 for each and every bale of cotton ginned and turned out at the said plant, and shall also receive all profits and gain from the handling and sale of cottonseed coming from said gin. And the lessee shall pay said amount per bale, and concede all profits and gain from the handling and sale of cottonseed from said plant, and assumes and agrees to be responsible for, and assumes all liabilities for, wages, debts, damages, and otherwise, arising from or growing out of the operation of the said gin plant. And the lessor shall, during the period of said lease, be in no wise connected with the operation or management of the said gin plant, and assumes no liability therefor. But the lessor shall assist the lessee in keeping books, accounts, and do other records of the business when requested so to do."

The contention of the appellant is that under the above lease Ledgerwood, at the time of the accident, was an independent contractor, and if the explosion was caused through any acts of negligence, such acts were those of Ledgerwood.

The court, at the instance of the appellee, over the objection of the appellant, gave instructions to the effect that under the terms of the lease appellant agreed to furnish all the repairs on the cotton gin; that if the jury found that at the time the alleged lease was executed the boiler plug near the back end was insecurely fastened, and that the threads of the boiler would not catch and hold the plug in position, and that by reason thereof the boiler at said place was unsafe and dangerous, and that appellant knew this or could have known it by the use of ordinary care and reasonable inspection; and that if they found that there was this unsafe and dangerous condition, and that it continued to exist from the date of the alleged lease until the injury, and that appellant negligently failed to repair it, the alleged lease would not constitute a defense, provided that the appellee and his child were lawfully upon the premises at the time and place of the alleged injury, and that the negligence, if any, of the appellant, was the direct and proximate result of the injury as defined in other instructions.

The specific grounds of objection to the above instructions were that they told the jury that the appellant agreed to furnish all the repairs on the cotton gin, when, under the undisputed evidence, the appellant was only to furnish the material for making such repairs as his lessee might find necessary and such as he might make demand for, and further because the undisputed evidence showed that appellant had nothing to do with putting the machinery in condition and repair prior to the operation of the same for the season of 1918.

The instructions and the objections raised to them call for a construction of the alleged lease. A majority of the court have reached the conclusion that the trial court was correct in construing the alleged lease as one which bound the appellant not only to furnish the material for making the repairs, but also to actually make all the repairs that were necessary for the successful operation of the plant. It occurs to us that this is the correct construction of the contract, when the words, "furnish all repairs," are given their ordinary and obvious meaning. The word "repair," as used in the instrument, is a noun. It means: "Act of repairing; restoration; or state of being restored to a sound or good state after decay, waste, injury, etc., supply of loss, reparation; mending; also an instance or result of such restoration; often in pl., as the repairs to the house are extensive." Webster's New Int. Dict., Funk & Wagnall's New Standard Dict. "Repairs."

One of the definitions of the word "repairs" given by the latter author is: "Condition after use, specially good condition; condition after repairing."

The definition of the verb "furnish," as given by Funk & Wagnall's, is: "To equip or fit out; supply what is necessary or fitting."

As given by Webster is: "To accomplish; insure; to provide for; to provide what is necessary for."

If the appellant had intended that the words should have the meaning which he now insists they have, it would have been easy for the attorney who prepared the instrument under his direction to have so worded it as to convey that meaning, by simply using the exact words to express his meaning which he now contends the words used do express, to wit, "to furnish all materials for making repairs," instead of the words "furnish all repairs," the words actually used. The appellant, having prepared the instrument, is responsible for the language employed, and, as he relies upon the instrument for his protection, he is not in a position to insist upon a different interpretation of the words than that of their plain and ordinary meaning.

Other portions of the instrument strengthen this construction, and show that the party named as the lessee in the instrument was to have nothing whatever to do, except to pay the rent and keep the gin running or in operation, after all machinery, wood, coal, supplies, repairs, etc., necessary for its successful operation, were furnished or made by the appellant. Such being the meaning of the alleged lease, the issue as to whether or not the negligence averred was that of an independent contractor, and the doctrine applicable thereto, have no place in this case. The court, therefore, ruled correctly in refusing prayers by the appellant for instructions seeking to have that issue submitted to the jury.

The issues of negligence and contributory negligence, under the evidence, were issues of fact for the jury. They were submitted under familiar and correct declarations of law.

Appellant complains here of the ruling of the court in admitting the testimony of certain witnesses, tending to show what the custom was with reference to parties being permitted to enter the boiler room, where the appellee and his son were injured. The abstract of the appellant does not show that any objection was made at the time to the testimony of these witnesses. Furthermore, if such testimony had been objected to, there was no error prejudicial to appellant in admitting it, for appellee testified without objection, and there was no testimony to the contrary, that he went into the engine or boiler room for the purpose of inquiring ~~whether~~ cotton would be ginned.

Those in charge knew that he and his son were in the boiler room, and no objections were made to their presence there. The testimony as abstracted was competent on the issue as to whether or not the appellee was a trespasser and guilty of contributory negligence, in going in and taking his son into a dangerous place. The testimony tends to prove that persons going to the gin on business were permitted to go into the boiler or engine room; that no steps were taken in any manner to prevent those having business at the gin from going into the engine or boiler room.

Evidence—permission to enter boiler room in cotton gin.

The appellant complains of the ruling of the court in permitting the witness Graham to testify that "he went down to the gin the next morning after the explosion, and that he found where the boiler had a plug in it, and that it had been blown out; that the threads were mighty bad on the boiler, where the plug is supposed to set in; it was eaten out considerable; that the threads on the boiler had an appearance of being freshly done, but were worn slick; that Mr. Collison spoke to him about the matter," etc.

The appellant also urges here that the court erred in permitting witness P. J. Donahue to testify as to the condition that the boiler was in some fifteen days after the accident; but the appellant, neither in his brief nor in his abstract, set out any testimony of the witness which shows that the boiler was in any different condition at the time witness saw the same than it was at the time the injury occurred. The testimony of this witness, as abstracted, shows that he testified as an expert, and in answer to hypothetical questions propounded to him he gave his opinion concerning the causes that must have brought about the worn condition of the threads in the hole of the boiler from which the plug was blown, as assumed in the question propounded to the witness.

In the testimony, as abstracted, it does not appear that any objection was urged at the trial, either to the question or to the answer. But again we say that, even if objection had been offered to the testimony in the form in which it appears in appellant's abstract, we would have to hold that the testimony was competent, and that it did not in any manner contravene the doctrine announced by us in Prescott & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ark. 179, 67 S. W. 865, St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Plumlee, 78 Ark. 148, 95 S. W. 442, and other cases more recent of the same purport, to the effect that testimony is incompetent, after an accident has occurred, tending to show that the defect causing the accident and injury was removed, altered, or changed by the master, for the purpose of showing negligence.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, January 12, 1920.

This note is not intended to cover the question of the liability of the landlord, whether he has covenanted to repair or not, for injuries to third persons while using that part of the leased premises intended for public use. In this connection, however, attention is called to Lowell v. Spaulding (1849) 4 Cash. (Mass.) 277, 50 Am. Dec. 775, holding that where there is an agreement by a landlord to keep the leased premises in repair, he is liable to a town for damages which it is compelled to pay by reason of an injury to a third person due to the bad condition of a cellarway, constructed in the sidewalk in front of the leased premises.

The question here raised is as to whether or not a contract by the landlord to repair the leased premises creates a relation between the parties out of which there arises the legal duty to repair, the failure to perform which will support an action ex delicto or ex contractu to recover damages for personal injuries due to such negligence.

In considering the cases passing upon this specific question, they are to be interpreted with reference to certain distinguishing facts. As, for example: (1) Where the lease is of property for a private use or purpose, without any reservation of a right of possession in the landlord; (2) where the lease is of property to be put to some public use; (3) where there is a reservation by the lessor of the possession of the property for the purpose of making repairs and the grant to the lessee, in effect, is of the mere right or license to make a certain use of the property reserved. In treating the cases accordingly as they fall within one of the three divisions mentioned, at least some of the confusion existing among the authorities on the point will be obviated.

a. Majority rule.

1. In general.

Where the right of possession and enjoyment of the leased premises passes to the lessee, the cases are practically agreed that, in the absence of concealment or fraud by the landlord as to some defect in the premises, known to him and unknown to the tenant, the rule of caveat emptor applies, and the tenant takes the premises in whatever condition they may be in, thus assuming all risk of personal injury from defects therein. This doctrine is in harmony with the common-law rule that a lease is a conveyance of an estate or an interest in real property, or a transfer of the right to the possession and enjoyment of real property for a specified period of time, or at will. In other words, it is a demise of real property for a limited period of time. So far as concerns the condition of the premises, the relation created by a lease is substantially similar to that created by a deed or a contract for the sale of real property with the right of possession. By the great weight of authority, the fact that the lessor covenants to repair the premises does not affect this rule, so far as concerns the lessor's liability for personal injuries to the lessee or those in privity with him, due to defects in the premises leased for a private purpose, the possession of which has passed to the lessee, although the existence of the defect is attributable to the failure of the lessor to repair according to his covenant. Canada.—Brown v. Toronto General Hospital (1898) 22 Ont. Rep. 599.

On this point, in Cromwell v. Allen (1909) 151 Ill. App. 404, the court said: "In case a landlord fails to make repairs, in violation of his covenant, the tenant may (1) abandon the premises if they became untenable by reason of want of repair; (2) he may make the repairs himself and deduct the cost from the rent; (3) he may occupy the premises without repair, and recoup his damages in an action for rent; (4) he may sue for damages for breach of the covenant to repair, and the damage recoverable in this last instance is usually the difference between the value of the premises in repair and out of repair."

In Lane v. Raynes (1916) 223 Mass. 514, 112 N. E. 152, the court said that it is not enough to show that the landlord failed to comply with his agreement to make repairs, even after notice, but the tenant must also show that the landlord actually made the repairs, and was negligent in making them, thus causing the injury complained of.

In Dailey v. Vogl (1915) 187 Mo. App. 261, 178 S. W. 707, it is held that a landlord is not liable in an action, either ex contractu or ex delicto, for personal injuries to a tenant or a person in privity with the tenant, based upon a breach by him of his agreement to repair.

In Murrell v. Crawford (1918) 102 Kan. 118, 169 Pac. 561, it is held that the landlord is not liable for personal injury to his tenant, caused by her falling through the floor of a defective porch on the leased premises, although he had agreed to repair the porch and put it in good, safe and tenantable condition.

3. Application to wife, or other member of tenant's family.

The general rule that a landlord is not liable to compensate a tenant for his damage for personal injuries, due to the defective condition of the leased premises the landlord was under covenant to repair, also applies to the wife of the tenant, and she cannot recover of the landlord for personal injuries which she suffers by reason of the defective condition of the premises. Pinkerton v. Slocomb (1916) 126 Md. 665, 95 Atl. 965; Rolfe v. Tufts (1914) 216 Mass. 563, 104 N. E. 341, 5 N. C. C. A. 291; McBride v. Gurney (1916) — Mo. App. —, 185 S. W. 735; Wynne v. Haight (1898) 27 App. Div. 7, 50 N. Y. Supp. 187; Van Tassel v. Read (1899) 36 App. Div. 529, 55 N. Y. Supp. 502, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 428; Stelz v. Van Dusen (1904) 93 App. Div. 358, 87 N. Y. Supp. 716; Kushes v. Ginsberg (1904) 99 App. Div. 417, 91 N. Y. Supp. 216, affirmed in (1907) 188 N. Y. 630, 81 N. E. 1168.

In McGinn v. French (1900) 107 Wis. 54, 82 N. W. 724, it is held that the wife of a tenant cannot maintain an action ex contractu for personal injuries due to the defective condition of the leased premises, based upon a contract with the tenant to repair.

In McBride v. Gurney (1916) — Mo. App. —, 185 S. W. 735, it is held that the wife of a tenant cannot maintain against the landlord a tort action to recover for personal injuries due to the defective condition of the premises, where the action is based upon a violation of the landlord's agreement to repair.

In Clyne v. Helmes, (1898) 61 N. J. L. 358, 39 Atl. 767, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 180, it was held that even if it be assumed that the tenant might hold the landlord for damages for personal injuries caused by the defective condition of the demised premises, which the landlord has failed to repair according to his agreement, nevertheless the wife of the tenant cannot maintain an action based upon such agreement, to recover compensation for injuries to her, due to the defective condition of the premises. The court said that there was no privity of contract between the landlord and the members of the tenant's family.

The rule also applies to other members of the tenant's family (Silverman

v. Isaac (1918) 183 App. Div. 542, 170 N. Y. Supp. 290; Davis v. Smith (1904) 26 R. I. 129, 66 L.R.A. 478, 106 Am. St. Rep. 691, 58 Atl. 630, 8 Ann. (N. Y.) 333; Petroski v. Mulvanity (1916) 78 N. H. 252, 99 Atl. 88).

In Brady v. Klein (1903) 133 Mich. 422, 62 L.R.A. 909, 108 Am. St. Rep. 455, 95 N. W. 557, 2 Ann. Cas. 464, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 351, it is held that no one, aside from the tenant, at least, has any right to maintain an action against the landlord to recover damages for personal injuries received, where the action is based upon a covenant to repair. In this case the action was in behalf of a child of the tenant, and it was held not maintainable.

In Dice v. Zweigart (1914) 161 Ky. 646, L.R.A. 1916F, 1155, 171 S. W. 195, the landlord was held not liable for the death of a child of a tenant, caused by falling into an uncovered cistern upon the leased premises, which, however, was generally kept covered by a plank upon which a heavy stone was placed, the landlord, however, having agreed to make this covering safer by installing a pump. The court, in reaching its conclusion, said that the case presented was simply one of the landlord's promise to repair the cistern, and of his failure to do so. "The only question to be considered, therefore, is whether or not the landlord, under these circumstances, is liable in damages for personal injuries received by a member of his tenant's family. The child in this case was not on the premises by invitation of the landlord. He was there by virtue of the relation which he sustained as a member of the tenant's family. If there be any liability, therefore, it grows out of that relation, and if the landlord be not liable to the tenant under the same circumstances, he is not liable to a member of the tenant's family. Ordinarily, of course, the landlord is not under a duty to use ordinary care to furnish a tenant reasonably safe premises in which to live. The tenant takes the premises as he finds them. As to him, the doctrine of caveat emptor applies. Here the dangerous condition was known to the tenant. The law imposed no duty on the landlord to repair the premises, and no liability for personal injury growing out of the defective condition of the premises. It is difficult to perceive upon what theory a mere agreement to repair could impose a liability not imposed by law. Of course, cases may arise where a legal duty arises from a contractual relation, and for a breach thereof an action of tort will lie. But such a case is altogether different from a duty entirely dependent upon a contract in which it is assumed."

Upon this point in Mehr v. McNab (1894) 24 Ont. Rep. 653, the court said, arguendo: "Even if the lessor was the one who had to do the repairs, and the accident had happened to the lessee himself, he could not sustain an action against the lessor for damages of the character of the damages claimed here. The plaintiff is a daughter of the lessee, who is her next friend, by whom she sues in this action; she was a member of his family and living with the lessee at the time of the accident, and I do not see how she can be considered a 'stranger,' as was contended."

Ryall v. Kidwell [1913] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 123, 29 Times L. R. 499, 82 L. J. K. B. N. S. 877, 108 L. T. N. S. 922, 77 J. P. 345, 57 Sol. Jo. 518, 11 L. G. R. 655, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 163, denies a recovery for injuries suffered by a daughter of the tenant. It is to be noted that the English cases are based upon a statute which in express terms imposes upon the landlord the duty of keeping the leased premises in repair, and reserves to him a sufficient possession of the leased premises for the purpose of making such repairs. This statutory liability of the landlord, however, only includes the tenant, and the court, regarding it as a change in the general rule, strictly applies it and holds that it does not apply even to the tenant's family. The cases are, therefore, no support to the rule asserted in Merchants' Cotton Press &

3. Application to guest, customer, etc.

The general rule also applies to guests of the tenant (Frank v. Mandel (1902) 76 App. Div. 413, 78 N. Y. Supp. 855), and to a member of a lodge although the lodge is the tenant (Dustin v. Curtis (1907) 74 N. H. 266, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 504, 67 Atl. 220, 13 Ann. Cas. 169); it also applies to a customer or patron of the tenant (Burdick v. Cheadle (1875) 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767).

In Frank v. Mandel (N. Y.) supra, the court said: "The plaintiff, as a lodger, visitor, or member of the tenant's family, has no better claim than a tenant would have. The covenant of the landlord to repair does not inure to the benefit of a stranger, sustaining injuries because of its breach. . . . 'The fact that a landlord leases premises with a condition that he may re-enter for the purpose of making repairs does not enlarge his responsibility as to third persons, or burden him with the duty, as to them, of observing any greater degree of care than would be required were he in possession.'"

In Dustin v. Curtis (1907) 74 N. H. 266, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 504, 67 Atl. 220, 13 Ann. Cas. 169, it appeared that a member of a lodge was injured by falling plaster while attending a lodge meeting. The owner of the building had leased it to this lodge, and had agreed to repair the same. Under these circumstances he was held not liable to the injured person in an action for tort to recover for personal injuries.

In Burdick v. Cheadle (1875) 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767, it is held that the landlord is not liable to a third person for injuries received through the defective condition of the fixtures attached to a store building which he had leased, and which he had agreed to keep in repair. The court said that "whatever may be the rights and duties respectively of landlord and tenant, as between themselves, the latter cannot, by the terms of the lease, be discharged from the duty to his guests, and in a greater degree to his customers, of caring for their safety. And while such persons may reasonably expect the exercise of care for their safety from the person who invites them, they have no right to expect like care from his landlord, with whom they are not in privity."

In Sherlock v. Rushmore (1904) 99 App. Div. 598, 91 N. Y. Supp. 152, the servant of the lessee was injured through the defective condition of the leased premises. Although the landlord had contracted to keep the same in repair, he was held not liable to the servant for breach of the agreement.

In Glidden v. Goodfellow (1913) 124 Minn. 101, L.R.A.1916F, 1073, 144 N. W. 428, it is held that the rule in that state, holding the landlord liable for injuries to a third person caused by defects in the leased premises which the landlord has contracted to keep in repair, also applies to a contract by the landlord to properly heat the premises, and where he negligently fails to perform, the contract he is liable to a servant of the tenant, who suffers injury in consequence thereof.

4. As affected by nature of the agreement to repair.

Up to the present time the cases apparently have given but little consideration to the question as to the effect of the form or character of the agreement by the lessor, that is, as to whether or not it is merely a simple agreement to repair, or whether it is of such a character as to amount to a reservation by the lessor of the possession of the leased premises for the purpose of making repairs.

In Miles v. Janvrin (1907) 196 Mass. 431, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 378, 124 Am. St. Rep. 575, 82 N. E. 708, the court said that in respect to what is within the contemplation of the parties, there is no difference between a contract by the landlord to keep the premises of his tenant in repair, generally, during the term of the lease, and a contract by a landlord to make specific repairs on the premises of the tenant, although there is a difference between a landlord's agreeing to maintain premises in a safe condition for the tenant's use, and a contract to keep his tenant's premises in repair.

If a part of a landlord's undertaking is an agreement in terms to make repairs, and the circumstances are such as to leave the meaning doubtful, it is to be determined from all the language used, and from all the circumstances, whether his meaning is to make repairs merely as a mechanic might contract to make them, only upon notice that they are needed, or whether his undertaking is intended to be broader, including a duty to observe for himself and provide for the safety of the premises. Ibid.

In the foregoing case, the court said that the landlord is liable where the arrangement with the tenant is that during the term of the lease the landlord is to be responsible for the safety of a flight of steps which leads from the highway to the demised house; hence, the direct way of carrying that arrangement into effect is to give the tenant nothing but the right to use the steps. Thus would the steps be in the control of the landlord, and, being in his control with an agreement to keep them in repair, the case would come within the rule applicable where a portion of the premises is reserved by the landlord.

In Thompson v. Clemens (1903) 96 Md. 196, 60 L.R.A. 580, 53 Atl. 919, the rule is thus stated: "The mere failure of the landlord to make repairs which he had agreed to make cannot make him responsible to the tenant, or a member of his family, for damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of the defective condition of the premises, whether such suit be in assumpsit or in case; but in order to recover such damages there must be shown some clear act of negligence or misfeasance on the part of the landlord, beyond the mere breach of contract. . . . If the appellee knew of the defect in this porch that caused the injuries, and had reason to believe that it was likely to produce such result if not repaired, then it was negligence on his part, in view of his agreement to repair, not to do so promptly, or at least to take some steps to protect the tenant and his family from injury."

In some jurisdictions, at least, the agreement to repair may be in such form, or the circumstances may be such, as to impose upon the lessor the duty of using ordinary care to inform himself as to the condition of the leased premises, at the time of the letting. And he may be held liable for personal injuries due to the defective condition of the premises when possession was given to the lessee, if the defect is attributable to his negligence in failing to repair and put in safe condition the premises, and the defect was known to him, or ought to have been known to him.

For example, in Moore v. Steljes (1895) 69 Fed. 518, it appeared that the lessor warranted the sufficiency and safety of the premises. This warranty was held to render him liable for injury to a child of the tenant due to a falling ceiling. It is pointed out that the action is not based upon the warranty, but this serves to fix the negligence of the lessor.

In Robinson v. Heil (1916) 128 Md. 645, 98 Atl. 195, it appeared that the injury complained of was due to defective stairs, and that these stairs were in a defective and dangerous condition at the time the property was leased, and that the landlord knew of this condition, his attention having been called to it by a prior tenant. The lessor agreed to repair the stairs, and told the tenant to use them until he could make the repairs. Under these circumstances it was held that the landlord was liable if he negligently failed to make the repairs, and that this was a question of fact for the jury.

In Sontag v. O'Hare (1897) 73 Ill. App. 432, the landlord was held liable for personal injuries resulting in the death of the wife of a tenant, due to the giving away of a railing to a stairway, where he had contracted to repair the premises. The lease was for the first-floor flat of a building, and the defective stairs led to this flat. The question was given considerable consideration by the court, which held that if the landlord agreed to make these repairs at the time of leasing the premises, and neglected to do so, he would be liable for the death of the wife of the tenant due to the unrepai red condition of the stairs.

In Jacobson v. Ramey (1915) 200 Ill. App. 96, the landlord was held liable for personal injuries to the wife of the tenant under these circumstances: The landlord had leased to the tenant a certain building, the lower floor to be used as a store building and the upper floor for flats or apartments, the landlord agreeing so to remodel the building that the upper floor would be suitable for apartments. There was an outside stairway leading to these apartments, and it was alleged that the stairway was defective, rotten, and unsafe, and that it was because of this defective condition of the stairway that the plaintiff fell through it and was injured.

And see, upon this point, Stillwell v. South Louisville Land Co. (1900) 22 Ky. L. Rep. 785, 52 L.R.A. 325, 58 S. W. 696, holding that, where a landlord undertakes and promises to repair a cistern on the leased premises at the time and before he rented the same, he assumes the responsibility for injury to a child of the tenant, caused by such dangerous place.

Flood v. Pabst Brewing Co. (1914) 158 Wis. 626, L.R.A.1916F, 1101, 149 N. W. 489, it was held that a landlord having actual or constructive knowledge of a structural defect in a building, when he lets it to one without knowledge, actual or constructive, of the defect, is liable to an invitee of the tenant, also without such knowledge, for personal injuries due to such defect, the landlord having covenanted to keep the property in repair.

In Mesher v. Osborne (1913) 75 Wash. 439, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 917, 134 Pac. 1092, it is held that where the owner, upon leasing premises, covenants to repair the same, he is chargeable with knowledge of their condition and of any defect therein, rendering the premises unsafe, if a reasonable inspection by him would have disclosed the defect, and it was unknown to the tenant, and hence he is liable to the tenant for personal injuries received by reason of such defect. The court said that "where the landlord agrees to put the premises in repair, and keep them in repair during the tenancy, it would seem that there ought to arise a positive duty on his part, before relinquishing possession to the tenant, to make reasonable inspection of the premises for concealed defects, unknown to and undiscoverable by a reasonable inspection on the tenant's part, which might render the premises dangerous to the tenant, his family, servants, and guests. In such a case, as it seems to us, the landlord ought to be held to a more careful inspection than the tenant, because the duty to repair is upon the landlord, and his presumed knowledge of his own premises would make a discovery by him of concealed defects and dangers more probable. Such a rule would seem to be only a just application of the maxim to which we have adverted, that there is always a positive duty to exercise reasonable care to so use one's own property as not to injure another." This case is not necessarily a departure from the majority rule already stated, although it is, perhaps, a departure from the general rule that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to leases of land, as to defects unknown to either of the parties.

In Lowe v. O'Brien (1914) 77 Wash. 677, 138 Pac. 295, it is held that the lessor of a building set upon piles driven in the water of an inlet is liable for personal injuries to a tenant due to the building falling into the water, the lessor having contracted to keep the premises in repair, and his attention having been called to these insecure pilings, and he having agreed to fix them soon, and having failed to do so. The court said that the question of contributory negligence by the plaintiff by remaining in the premises more than a reasonable time after the lessor made this promise was one of fact for the jury. This case may, perhaps, be regarded as a departure, in part at least, from the majority rule stated, although the peculiar facts and the nature of the defects are such as to present strong grounds for making an exception to the majority rule. In this case the injury to the tenant was not due to an accident, but was directly due to the failure of the landlord to repair. It is more in line with the cases holding that the landlord is liable for injury to the property of the tenant where he breaches his contract to repair, where the injury to the property is the proximate result of the breach, as, for instance, the failure to repair a roof, permitting water to leak through onto the tenant's goods. In a majority of the cases considered, the injury was due to a combination of circumstances more or less accidental in their nature.

In a few jurisdictions the majority rule referred to is denied, either in whole or in part. In Minnesota, it is apparently denied as a whole. The first Minnesota case denying the rule is Barron v. Liedloff (1905) 95 Minn. 474, 104 N. W. 289. In that case the sublessee of two rooms of the leased premises, who had been given the right to use a porch attached to another part of the premises and adjoining these rooms, was held to be entitled to recover from the original lessor for personal injuries received by reason of defective flooring in the porch, due to the lessor's failure to repair. The court said that where the landlord agreed to repair and keep in repair the premises, his right to enter and have possession of the premises for that purpose is necessarily implied, and his duties and liabilities are in some respects similar to those of the owner and occupant. And if his negligence in making or failing to make the repairs results in an unsafe condition of the premises, he is liable for injuries caused thereby to persons lawfully upon the premises, who are not guilty of contributory negligence on their part. It is clear that in this state the action in behalf of the injured person sounds in tort, and not in contract. This is emphasized in Keegan v. G. Heileman Brewing Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 496, L.R.A.1916F, 1149, 152 N. W. 877, where the court said: "If the lease did require the defendant to keep the premises in repair, then the instruction was correct, for the rule is that, where the lessor by his lease contracts to keep the leased premises in repair, and he negligently fails to do so, he is liable to the lessee and the members of the lessee's family occupying the same, for personal injuries received from a defective condition of the premises. The action is for the wrong committed by the landlord by his negligence in failing to perform an act assumed by him, which he should know would protect them from injury if performed, or expose them to injury if not performed. The contract creates an implied legal duty on the part of the landlord toward those who are rightfully upon the premises, and a negligent violation thereof vests in them a right of action in tort against him for injuries sustained." This is also the doctrine of Good v. Von Hemert (1911) 114 Minn. 393, 131 N. W. 466; Glidden v. Goodfellow (1913) 124 Minn. 101, L.R.A.1916F, 1073, 144 N. W. 428; Glidden v. Second Ave. Invest. Co. (1914) 125 Minn. 471, L.R.A.1915C, 190, 147 N. W. 658, 6 N. C. C. A. 743; Keiper v. Anderson (1917) 138 Minn. 392, L.R.A.1918C, 299, 165 N. W. 237.

In Keegan v. G. Heileman Brewing Co. (Minn.) supra, this rule was applied in holding a landlord liable for injuries to an employee, due to his failure to heat the leased premises according to his contract. And in Keiper v. Anderson (Minn.) supra, the rule also was applied to a contract by the lessor to keep the premises heated, and, where the tenant's death resulted from a breach of this contract, it was held that an action could be maintained under the Death Statute to recover damages for the death. The court said that the right to maintain the action was not affected by the fact that it was based upon a breach of the contract; that as a matter of law the liability of the landlord was based upon his negligence, growing out of his failure to perform the contract. Compare, upon this point, with Davis v. Smith (1904) 26 R. L. 129, 66 L.R.A. 478, 106 Am. St. Rep. 691, 58 Atl. 630, 3 Ann. Cas. 832, which denies the right to recover for the death of a tenant, based upon the landlord's breach of covenant to repair, where the right of action depends upon the Death Statute.

In Kurtz v. Pauly (1914) 158 Wis. 534, 149 N. W. 143, the statement is made that the landlord is not liable for personal injuries to a tenant, due to defects in the premises, in the absence of an agreement upon his part to repair. And in Flood v. Pabst Brewing Co. (1914) 158 Wis. 626, L.R.A.1916F, 1101, 149 N. W. 489, the court, while recognizing a conflict of authority upon the point, says that it thinks the weight of authority and the better reason support the doctrine that a landlord who agrees to keep leased premises in repair is liable to an invitee of the tenant in an action of tort for breach of his duty to repair. "Where a landlord agrees to keep leased premises in repair, his right to enter and have possession of the premises for such purpose is necessarily implied, and his duties and liabilities in that regard are in some respects similar to those of an owner and occupant. His negligent failure to repair, therefore, is a breach of duty, and anyone lawfully upon the premises by invitation of the tenant, who suffers injury in consequence of the landlord's breach of duty, has an action for negligence against the landlord.

. . . While the decisions of this court are not directly in point, they inferentially, if not directly, support the doctrine that, where a landlord agrees to keep premises leased in repair, he is liable to an invitee of a tenant for breach of duty in that regard."

In many cases like Park v. Penn (1916) 203 Ill. App. 188, where there was in fact no covenant to repair, the general rule of the landlord's immunity from liability is so stated as to suggest that it would not apply had the lease contained a covenant to repair. But this is pure obiter.

In Collins v. Fillingham (1908) 129 Mo. App. 340, 108 S. W. 616, a landlord, who had contracted to repair the premises, was held liable for injury to the child of a tenant, due to a rotten balustrade of the porch, which the tenant had frequently requested the landlord to repair. This is also the holding in Graff v. Lemp Brewing Co. (1908) 130 Mo. App. 625, 109 S. W. 1044. These cases are apparently in conflict with McBride v. Gurney (1916) — Mo. App. —, 185 S. W. 735, which denies the liability of the landlord for personal injuries to the lessee or his family, due to the defective condition of the leased premises, although the lessor was under contract to repair the premises. The question, however, is apparently settled in Missouri by the decision of the supreme court of that state in Kohnle v. Paxton (1916) 268 Mo. 463; 188 S. W. 155, wherein the question is given very able consideration. It is held that the landlord cannot be held liable for damages for personal injuries to the tenant, due to defects in the premises, although he had contracted to keep the premises in repair.

There are, in addition to the cases previously cited in this subdivision, the following cases in which a recovery was sustained against the lessor for personal injuries due to the defective condition of the leased premises, which he was under covenant to repair:

United States. — Moore v. Steljes (1895) 69 Fed. 518 (supra, I. a, 4).

Arkansas. — COLLISON v. CURTNER (reported herewith) ante, 760.

Illinois. — Sontag v. O'Hare (1897) 73 Ill. App. 432; Jacobson v. Ramey (1915) 200 Ill. App. 96 (supra, I. a, 4).

Maryland. — Robinson v. Heil (1916) 128 Md. 645, 98 Atl. 195 (supra, I. a, 4).

II. Rationale of majority and minority doctrines.

a. Action ex delicto.

The important question is, To what extent, if at all, is the relation of landlord and tenant enlarged by the inclusion in the lease of an agreement by the lessor to repair the leased premises? Does the lessor stand toward the lessee, in regard to an agreement of this character, in any different relation than would a third person, as, for example, a carpenter, contractor, plumber, etc.?

Where the only relation between the parties is contractual, the liability of one to the other in an action of tort for negligence must be based upon some positive duty which the law imposes because of the relationship, or because of the negligent manner in which some act which the contract provides for is done; and the mere violation of a contract, where there is no general duty, is not the basis of such an action. Dustin v. Curtis (1907) 74 N. H. 266, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 504, 67 Atl. 220, 13 Ann. Cas. 169, supra.

It has been said that actionable negligence is the neglect of a legal duty. To bring the case within the category of actionable negligence, some wrongful act must be shown, or a breach of some positive duty. The duty to do no wrong is a legal duty. The duty to protect against wrong is, generally speaking, and excepting certain intimate relations in the nature of a trust, a moral obligation only, not recognized or enforced by law. Ibid.

In this connection, the general rule applies to a breach by the lessor of his covenant to repair, that if the act constituting the breach is one of misfeasance, either on the ground that it is prohibited by statute or is violative of some duty imposed by law because of the relation between the parties created by the contract, independent of the duties expressly imposed by the contract itself, the lessee may maintain an action either in tort or for breach of a contract; but where the act complained of is merely one of nonfeasance, or merely negligence, his only remedy is for breach of contract. See cases cited in following section.

A comparatively late English appeal case holds that the power of control necessary to cast a duty to repair on the landlord, for breach of which damages may be recovered for personal injuries caused thereby, requires something more than a right or liability to repair the premises. It implies the power and right to admit people upon and exclude them from the premises. Ordinarily, this right and power belong to the tenant, and not to the landlord, and the latter's contract to repair cannot alone transfer such right to him. Cavalier v. Pope [1906] A. C. (Eng.) 428, 75 L. J. K. B. N. S. 609, 95 L. T. N. S. 65, 22 Times L. R. 648, 5 Ann. Cas. 713.

Generally speaking, a tort is based upon the breach of a legal duty, or the negligent performance of the same. Properly, it cannot be based upon the mere breach of a contract, although the contract may create some relation between the parties out of which there may arise some legal duty, and a failure to perform, or the negligent performance of this duty, may constitute a tort. For example, the relation of master and servant is created by contract. Regardless of the terms of the contract, the law imposes upon the master certain legal duties with regard to the safety of the servant, such as furnishing the servant a safe place in which to work. The negligent breach of this duty constitutes a tort. This duty arises out of the relation between the parties, and is not created by the contract itself.

On this point in Schick v. Fleishhauer (1898) 26 App. Div. 210, 49 N. Y. Supp. 962, supra, the court said: "The tenant is not at liberty, if the landlord fails to keep his contract to repair the premises, to permit them to remain in an unsafe condition, and to stay there at the risk of receiving injury on account of the defects in the premises, and then recover as for negligence for any injury that he may suffer. Where the sole relation between two parties is contractual in its nature, a breach of the contract does not usually create a liability as for negligence. In such a case the liability of one of the parties to the other because of negligence is based either on the breach of some duty which is implied as the result of entering into contractual relation, or from the improper manner of doing some act which the contract provided for. But the mere violation of a contract, where there is no general duty, is not the subject of an action of tort."

In Thompson v. Clemens (1903) 96 Md. 196, 60 L.R.A. 580, 53 Atl. 919, the wife of a tenant was denied the right to recover damages for personal injuries received by falling through a defective porch which the landlord had agreed to repair, it not appearing, however, that either the tenant or the landlord knew of the particular defect which was the cause of the injury complained of. The court said: "We have no doubt, however, that no action, either in contract or in tort, by a tenant or one of his family, against a landlord, to recover damages for personal injuries, should be sustained merely because the latter has been guilty of a breach of contract to make necessary repairs in the premises demised. It is not denied by counsel for the appellant that such damages are too remote, and not in contemplation of the parties, to be recovered in an action ex contractu, and to permit a recovery for such damages, based on the contract, simply because it is in form an action of tort, would be making a distinction that could not be justified by reason or authority. There must be something more than a mere failure on the part of the landlord to make the repairs he has agreed to make."

Upon the same point in Tuttle v. George H. Gilbert Mfg. Co. (1887) 145 Mass. 169, 13 N. E. 465, the court said: "The action of tort has for its foundation the negligence of the defendant, and this means more than a mere breach of a promise. Otherwise, the failure to meet a note, or any other promise to pay money, would sustain an action in tort for negligence, and thus the promisor be made liable for all the consequential damages arising from such failure. As a general rule, there must be some active negligence or misfeasance to support tort. There must be some breach of duty distinct from breach of contract. In the case at bar, the utmost shown against the defendant is that there was unreasonable delay on its part in performing an executory contract. As we have seen, it is not liable by reason of the relation of lessor and lessee, but its liability, if any, must rest solely upon a breach of this contract. We do not see how the cases would differ in principle if an action were brought against a third person who had contracted to repair the stable floor, and had unreasonably delayed in performing its contract. We are not aware of any authority for maintaining such an action."

Upon this point, in Kohnle v. Paxton (1916) 268 Mo. 463, 188 S. W. 155, the court says: "This doctrine necessitates the holding that the landlord, in failing to repair, has been guilty of something more than a breach of the contract, viz., negligence. Upon no other theory can a basis be established for an action sounding in tort. To sustain the rule as thus announced it is necessary to determine when the contractual obligation ends and the liability for negligence begins. They cannot be coexistent as to matters within the purview of the contract, which, if not forfeited, continues during the time prescribed and loses none of its force or effectiveness by reason of any act of the landlord. The contract not only defines the time and terms of the rental, but it measures as well the obligations of the parties. Thus complete within itself, it cannot be reasonably said that upon failure to comply with its conditions a right of action authorized by its terms, and within the contemplation of the law, can be supplanted by another not based upon or growing out of the contract, but having its origin purely in a process of reasoning. A breach of the contract to repair, resulting in injuries to the tenant, may arise from the negligence of the landlord, but this is not such technical negligence as will authorize a right of action in tort; this can only exist independently.

of the contract, for injuries not proximately resulting from the breach, and, therefore, not within the contemplation of the parties. Put more plainly, an agreement to repair does not contemplate a destruction of life or an injury to the person which may result accidentally from an omission to fulfil the terms of the agreement."

The distinction between the responsibility of the lessor for a tort based upon negligence, and for a breach of his contract, is pointed out in Cronwell v. Allen (1909) 151 Ill. App. 404. Upon this point the court says: "The wrongdoer is answerable for all the injurious consequences of his tortious act, which, according to the usual course of events and general experience, were likely to ensue, and which, therefore, when the act was committed, he may reasonably be supposed to have foreseen and anticipated. But for breaches of contracts the parties are not chargeable with damages on this principle. Whatever foresight, at the time of the breach, the defaulting party may have of the probable consequences, he is not generally held, for that reason, to any greater responsibility; he is liable only for the direct consequences of the breach, such as usually occur from the infraction of like contracts, and were within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was entered into, as likely to result from its nonperformance."

In Anderson v. Robinson (1913) 182 Ala. 615, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 330, 62 So. 512, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 829, it is held that a landlord is not liable in a tort action for personal injuries due to a breach of his covenant to repair. It has, however, been held in this jurisdiction that a landlord may be held liable in an action ex contractu for breach of covenant to repair. See Hart v. Coleman (1917) — Ala. —, L.R.A.1918E, 213, 78 So. 201. On a prior appeal of the Hart Case, reported in (1915) 192 Ala. 477, 68 So. 315, it is also held that the landlord is not liable in an action in tort, for personal injuries resulting from defective premises, which the landlord had covenanted to repair.

rule obtains. For example, in Merchants' Cotton Press & Storage Co. v. Miller (1915) 135 Tenn. 187, L.R.A. 1916F, 1137, 186 S. W. 87, the servant of a compress company was held entitled to recover against the lessor of the building in which the lessee carried on his business, for personal injuries due to a defective door in a passageway. The lessor was under contract to keep the property in repair, and two months prior to the injury had been notified by the lessee of the defective condition of this door, and requested to repair the same. The court concedes that the apparent weight of authority is contrary to its holding, but it erroneously assumes that this is due to the doctrine of a lack of privity between the third person and the lessor. The theory adopted by the court in holding the landlord responsible for injury to a servant of the tenant is thus stated: "The action of the injured employee, for example, in such cases, is not deemed to be on the contract, for the employee is, of course, a stranger to the lessor's obligation to repair or keep repaired. The remedy is considered to be one for the wrong committed by the lessor in his negligent failure to perform a duty voluntarily assumed by him, which he must be held to know would protect the employee of the tenant, as such user of the demised premises, from injury, if his engagement be kept, or expose the servant to injury otherwise. Instead of the duty being law-imposed, it is self-imposed. The fact that the duty is voluntarily taken on should not detract from its scope and effect, or lessen the implication which the law will make. Such a duty, on nonobservance, may constitute the culpable negligence that is the basis for an action sounding in tort. The implication of legal duty and the delictum arise in this way out of the obligation incorporated in the contract, not on the contract. . . . There is no undue hardship on the lessor in such case. He has seen fit to interpose his own agreement to repair, and thereby tended, at least, to cause the lessee to hold back and wait for its execution on his part. He has elected to retain for his own, as primarily resting on him, the duty of care in the particular regard, and should not complain if the law leaves the burden where he placed it, and holds him not exempt."

A case imposing a very similar duty upon the lessor is COLLISON v. CURTNER (reported herewith) ante, 760. In this case the lessor of a cotton gin agreed to furnish all repairs, and new parts of machinery, and other similar things necessary for the successful operation of the plant. This agreement was construed to bind the lessor actually to make all repairs that were necessary for the successful operation of this plant. As thus construed, the agreement was held to impose upon him the duty to use ordinary care and inspection at the time of entering into the lease, to determine the condition of the machinery. It was held that if at this time a plug near the back end of the boiler was insecurely fastened, and the threads of the boiler were so worn that they would not hold the plug in position, by reason whereof the boiler was unsafe and dangerous, and these facts the lessor knew, or might have known by the exercise of ordinary care and reasonable inspection, then he would be liable for personal injuries to third persons who entered the boiler room to get a drink of water while they were delivering cotton to the gin, such personal injuries being caused by the boiler exploding, due to this defective plug.

In Ashmun v. Nichols (1919) — Or. —, 180 Pac. 510, holding a landlord who had contracted to keep the premises in repair liable to a tenant for personal injuries due to defective steps in the basement of the demised premises, the court said: "In a case like this we think that when a landlord agrees to keep his premises in repair, the law fastens upon him a duty to keep that contract, and if he violates that duty, after notice of the dangerous condition, he ought in principle to be liable for whatever injuries the tenant naturally and necessarily receives from such breach of duty. If the only injury is one directly contemplated in the contract, as the increased value of the use of the premises, the action of the tenant would be purely upon the contract. But if the negligence of the landlord resulted, necessarily and naturally, in some further injury to his person or property, he may bring an action like the one at bar, and it is of little importance whether it is called technically an action on contract or an action upon the tort, or whether it partakes of a double nature, depending upon both tort and contract."

In Barron v. Liedloff (1905) 95 Minn. 474, 104 N. W. 289, the lessor of a two-story brick store and living rooms agreed with the lessee to put the premises in first-class condition, and to care for ordinary repairs; the lessee sublet a part of the second story for living rooms, with the right to use an adjoining porch, which was a part of the building. The sublessee was held entitled to recover from the owner of the property for a personal injury sustained by reason of the breaking of a board in the floor of the porch. In so holding, the court said that the rule that the measure of damages for breach of a covenant by the lessor to keep the leased premises in repair is the difference between the agreed rent and the rental value of the premises without the repairs has no application to an action in tort to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the negligence of the lessor in making, or in failing to make, repairs that he agreed to make by his lease.

In Keiper v. Anderson (1917) 138 Minn. 392, L.R.A.1918C, 299, 165 N. W. 237, it is pointed out that all the cases theretofore presented to the court, in which the lessor was held liable for personal injuries received by another, due to the defective condition of the leased premises which the lessor had contracted to repair, the injury was not to the tenant, but was to some third party not in privity with the lessor, and the action was in tort and not in contract. It is, however, held in this case that where the complaint by the personal representative of the tenant, in an action seeking to recover damages for the wrongful death of the tenant, due to a breach by the lessor of his agreement to heat the leased premises, alleges negligence on the part of the landlord, a cause of action is stated under the Death Statute.

It matters not the form of words used in reasoning of this character, the fact remains that the actual holding is that, for breach of contract to make the repairs, damages may be recovered for personal injuries received by anyone injured through the unrepaired condition of the premises. This holding ingrafts an exception upon the rule that it is the duty of one party to a contract to mitigate damages due to the breach. It ingrafts an exception upon the generally accepted rule that it is the duty of a tenant, if the landlord has contracted to repair, to make the repairs himself, at least where they are not serious in character, and charge the expense thereof to the landlord. It ingrafts an exception upon the generally accepted rule that for breach of contract the damages recoverable are such as are the proximate result of the breach, and fairly within the contemplation of the parties at the time of making the contract. When this rule is considered with reference to the facts of a particular case,—as, for example, Merchants' Cotton Press & Storage Co. v. Miller (1915) 135 Tenn. 187, L.R.A.1916F, 1137, 186 S. W. 87, supra,—the difficulties of the position in which courts may be placed by departing from the majority rule are well illustrated. In this case, the door which caused the injury weighed from 800 to 1,000 pounds, was metal lined, and operated by raising after the manner of an ordinary window, weights having been suspended to facilitate its being raised and lowered; these ropes, to which the weights had been attached, had become worn and broken, and the weights detached, so that in order to keep the door up and open a prop or stick was used as a support; by long use the strip that held either side of the door in place in grooves had worn away and become thin; on the day of the accident, at the close of the work hours, in the darkness, the plaintiff and two other laborers went to lower the door; one of these two knocked the prop out before the plaintiff reached the point where he or the third laborer could take hold and ease the door's descent, its great weight requiring two or three men to lower it in safety; the door fell suddenly to the floor, and its bound carried it out of the insecure grooves, causing it to fall on the plaintiff, resulting in the injuries complained of. It is clear that the defective condition was trivial in character, and might have been repaired at small expense and in a comparatively short time. It is a perversion of the rule of damages for breach of contract to hold that under these circumstances, when the parties entered into the lease, it was contemplated that the landlord would become liable for personal injuries received under such a combination of circumstances. Certainly as to defects of this character it is but just to hold that the duty rests upon the tenant to make the repair, if the landlord fails to do so upon notice.

The measure of damages for breach of contract to repair the leased premises is the expense of doing the work which the landlord agreed to do, but did not. Schiff v. Pottlitzer (1906) 51 Misc. 611, 101 N. Y. Supp. 249.

Upon the question of the measure of recovery in Dice v. Zweigart (1914) 161 Ky. 646, L.R.A.1916F, 1155, 171 S. W. 195, the court said: "Where an ordinary contract is violated, the damages are limited to such as are within the reasonable contemplation of the parties. Manifestly, if a third party agreed to repair the cistern, there would be no liability for personal injuries growing out of the failure to repair. Since the duty of the landlord to repair does not grow out of the legal relations existing between him and the tenant, his agreement and failure to repair should subject him to no greater liability than a third party, who has violated his agreement to repair; for such consequences are no more within the contemplation of the parties in the one case than in the other."

In O'Neil v. Brown (1914) 158 Ky.

118, 164 S. W. 315, the rule is stated, but not applied, that if the landlord covenants to make repairs he undertakes to perform that which is not a duty imposed by law. The obligation assumed is, therefore, purely contractual, and any action of this character is based not upon negligence, but upon breach of contract. The rule governing such action is that originally announced in the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale (1850) 26 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 398, as follows: "Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect to such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from said breach of the contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of a breach of it."

2. As to whether personal injuries are within the contemplation of the parties.

It is the general rule that in covenanting to repair the leased premises the parties are not presumed to contemplate or intend that, if the premises become defective through the landlord's failure to comply with his covenant, an accidental injury to the tenant, or someone in privity with him, or a third person, shall be considered as the proximate result of the breach, and hence damages due to such an injury are not to be included in assessing the damages for the breach. Murrell v. Crawford (1918) 102 Kan. 118, 169 Pac. 561; Korach v. Loeffel (1912) 168 Mo. App. 414, 151 S. W. 790; Dailey v. Vogl (1915) 187 Mo. App. 261, 173 S. W. 707; Sanders v. Smith (1893) 5 Misc. 1, 25 N. Y. Supp. 125; Schiff v. Pottlitzer (1906) 51 Misc. 611, 101 N. Y. Supp. 249; Spellman v. Bannigan (1885) 36 Hun (N. Y.) 174; Kabus v. Frost (1884) 18 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 72; Flynn v. Hatton (1872) 43 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 333.

The mere agreement to repair in no way contemplates any destruction of life or injury to the person or property of anyone which might accidentally result from an omission to fulfil the agreement, and no warrant exists in principle or authority for the proposition that a landlord, under such a contract, is liable to his tenant as in tort, for wilful refusal or neglect to perform his obligation. Brown v. Toronto General Hospital (1893) 23 Ont. Rep. 599.

Personal injuries due to the defective condition of the leased premises, brought about by the failure of the landlord to keep his covenant to repair, are too remote to have been within the contemplation of the parties. Korach v. Loeffel (1913) 168 Mo. App. 414, 151 S. W. 790.

In Hanson v. Cruse (1900) 155 Ind. 176, 57 N. E. 904, it is held that the landlord is not liable to the tenant for an injury due to exposure to the elements caused by a breach of the agreement to repair the leased premises. In so holding the court said: "But the tenant may contract with the landlord, as well as with another. . . . Under the contract, appellant was entitled to the repairs or to damages for the breach of the contract. Appellees broke their contract, and are liable in damages. But what is the measure? On principle, the landlord who is paid by the tenant to make repairs that he is not otherwise under obligation to make should be held to exactly the same liability that a stranger-contractor would incur. Damages for personal injuries resulting from the mere continuance of obvious defects, such as existed here, and which the tenant has contracted to have repaired, are not recoverable from the contractor. They are deemed to be too remote, and not within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made. The injury is attributable to the tenant's want of care in the use of the property rather than to the contractor's breach."

And in Schiff v. Pottlitzer (1906) 51 Misc. 611, 101 N. Y. Supp. 249, it is said that a contract to repair does not contemplate as damages for failure to keep it that any liability for personal injuries shall grow out of the defective condition of the premises, because the duty of the tenant, if the landlord fails to keep his contract to repair, is to perform the work himself and recover the costs in an action for that purpose, or as a counterclaim in an action against him for the rent.

In Murrell v. Crawford (1918) 102 Kan. 118, 169 Pac. 561, on this point, the court said: "The landlord's liability is only for the breach of his covenant to repair, and this liability is measured by the difference in the rental value of the leased property unrepaired, from its agreed rental value if the promised repairs had been made. If the repairs would cost but little, the tenant may make them himself, and offset the expense against the rent. In this instance, it cost about $7 to make the repairs. The rent was $10 per month, and it was then two months past due and unpaid at the time of the accident. The landlord's failure to comply with his covenant to repair is likewise ground for rescission and termination of the tenancy. But personal injuries are almost uniformly considered by the courts to be too remote to be included in an action for breach of covenant to repair. Loss of life or limb is not a natural and probable consequence which ordinarily and reasonably could be anticipated from a breach of covenant to make repairs on a dwelling house."

However, in Hart v. Coleman (1917) — Ala. —, L.R.A.1918E, 218, 78 So. 201, it was held that in an action ex contractu for breach of covenant to repair, the tenants might recover damages, including the personal injuries resulting from falling through a defective flooring, to which the tenant had called the landlord's attention, and which the latter had agreed to repair. The court said that it confined the rule to the case in hand, and to the facts presented, which are stated as follows: "The porch of the house occupied by plaintiff was badly in need of repairs and in an unsafe condition, at a place necessary to be traversed by plaintiff in the use of the premises. The landlord, the defendant, was notified of its condition, and saw it himself, and agreed to repair the same. We have previously herein treated the question of consideration in support of such agreement, which need not be repeated. Reasonable time elapsed, and he failed to comply with his promise, and as a proximate result plaintiff fell through the porch and sustained the injuries. We are aware that it is held in some of the cases that, upon failure of the landlord to repair, the tenant should have done so, and could only recover what it would have cost to have made the necessary repairs." It is to be noted that when this case was before the court on a prior appeal (1915) 192 Ala. 447, 68 So. 315, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover damages on the theory of a tort.

The rule has been asserted that if the landlord is under contract to keep the premises in repair, and, after being notified of the need of repairs, he fails to make them, if the property cannot be safely occupied, the tenant can ordinarily abandon it. If with knowledge of such condition he still remains in the property, he, and others having such knowledge, as a general rule will be denied the right to recover on the ground of contributory negligence, even if the landlord is negligent. Thompson v. Clemens (1903) 96 Md. 196, 60 L.R.A. 580, 53 Atl. 919.

In Shackford v. Coffin (1901) 95 Me. 69, 49 Atl. 57, it appeared that before a tenant moved upon the leased premises the landlord agreed to repair the stairs to the building thereon; knowing that the stairs had not been repaired, the tenant moved upon and accepted the premises; he also placed props under the stairs to strengthen them. In denying the right to recover for personal injuries due to falling through a platform at the top of the stairway, the court said that the tenant had as much knowledge in regard to the defective condition complained of as the landlord "All that was visible or known to the defendant or his agents was visible to the plaintiff. If the landlord had known of a secret defect not discoverable by the tenant, he was bound to disclose it. Notwithstanding plaintiff's agent agreed to repair the stairs, nothing was done towards it. Plaintiff knew this; yet he moved in and accepted the premises. He placed props under the stairs because of that knowledge. In this state of facts as disclosed by the evidence, defendant is not liable to plaintiff."

A tenant, knowing of the open condition of an outside cellarway which the landlord had agreed to close or cover, by going near the same in the dark, is guilty of contributory negligence and assumes the risk of any injuries due to falling into the cellarway. Reams v. Taylor (1906) 31 Utah, 288, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 436, 120 Am. St. Rep. 930, 87 Pac. 1089.

But it has been held that where stairs did not look to be unsafe, although their appearance indicated the need of repair, it is not, as a matter of law, contributory negligence for the tenant to continue to use them, the landlord having told the tenant to do so until he could repair them. Under these circumstances, the court said that the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury. Robinson v. Heil (1916) 128 Md. 645, 98 Atl. 195.

In Ashmun v. Nichols (1919) — Or. —, 180 Pac. 510, supra, where the landlord, who had contracted to keep the premises in repair, was held liable to the tenant for personal injuries received by the giving way of stairs leading to the basement, it appeared that the tenant had given notice to the landlord of the dangerous condition of the leased premises, but it was nevertheless held that the use of the premises by the tenant did not constitute contributory negligence. The question as to the duty of the tenant to make the repairs, and thereby avoid any danger of personal injury, was apparently not considered by the court. Upon the question of contributory negligence the court said: "The question of contributory negligence was clearly one for the jury. When plaintiff found the steps were in a dangerous condition she was in the actual occupation of the premises with her family and household goods. She had the choice of remaining until the repairs were made, or attempting to remove to some other place. To do the latter she would first have to find a place to which she could remove. She had the landlord's general promise to repair. She notified him at once about the dangerous condition of the steps, and he promised to repair them immediately. Under these circumstances, according to her testimony, she remained on the premises, using the steps carefully. We think it was clearly a question for the jury as to whether she was negligent in so doing, and as to whether the defendant was negligent in delaying to repair."

As an additional ground for denying the liability of the lessor for personal injuries due to the defective condition of the leased premises, it has been held that where the defect renders the premises unsafe, and its repair is not a difficult matter, it is the duty of the tenant to repair or cause it to be repaired at the expense of the landlord.

In Schick v. Fleischhauer (1898) 26 App. Div. 210, 49 N. Y. Supp. 962, it is held that the measure of damages for breach of an agreement by the landlord to repair the demised premises is the expense of doing the work which the landlord agreed to do, but did not. The court said that the contract to repair does not contemplate as damages for the failure to keep it that any liability for personal injuries shall grow out of the defective condition of the premises, because the duty of the tenant, if the landlord fails to keep in repair, is to perform the work himself and recover the costs in an action for that purpose.

In Flynn v. Hatton (1872) 43 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 343, the court said that a tenant had no right to omit making such repairs as were necessary to make the premises safe and secure for the use of himself and other persons he permitted to use the same, because he had an agreement with the landlord that the latter should make repairs. Such an agreement was characterized as an additional reason why the tenant himself should make the repairs, rather than an excuse for his neglect in not making them. Under this agreement, he had an indemnity against any necessary outlay in making repairs, and his neglect in this regard was, therefore, inexcusable.

This point is also made in Brown v. Toronto General Hospital (1893) 23 Ont. Rep. 599. In the trial court, in directing a verdict for the defendant, Rose, J., said: "But the notice and knowledge which the landlord thus had, or the agent of the landlord thus had, could not be higher or greater than that conveyed by the notice, and could not be higher or greater than the knowledge of the persons giving the notice, and therefore could not be higher or greater than the knowledge of the tenant himself. The tenant, therefore, knew of the condition of the steps as well as the landlord, and if landlord knew the steps were dangerous, the tenant, a fortiori, must have known the steps were dangerous. The steps being dangerous, the danger of which the landlord had notice being that they might break down when the tenant should use them, the tenant chose, they being in that condition, to use them, running the risk of their breaking down." In affirming the action of the trial judge upon appeal, the court on the same point said: "In the present case the disrepair existed for over a year, and repeated notice was given to the agent of the hospital [the lessor], but nothing was done either by landlord or tenant. A small outlay would have remedied what was needed, probably not over $8, which was the monthly rent. But nothing was done, and though the plaintiff had reason to believe the steps to be unsafe he continued to use them, till one day, he broke through, or the framework collapsed, and he was badly hurt. . . . The plaintiff did not believe he would be hurt when going on them, otherwise he would have used the back door; and if he used them, knowing the danger, he contributed to the result by his own incaution, and so should not recover. But if he did not suspect such danger, neither could the landlord; and the damages sustained were not the natural and expected consequences of the failure to repair."

In Cromwell v. Allen (1909) 151 Ill.

App. 404, the landlord was held not liable for injury to the tenant due to defects in the premises not shown to have been known to the landlord, although the latter had covenanted to keep the premises in repair. In so holding, the court said: "The ordinary covenant to keep the premises in repair is generally held to mean that the covenantor is to make such repairs on notice, and that he is not in default until so notified, unless the lease shows an intention that he shall take notice from his own observation. This intention will not be implied where the lease does not give him the right to enter and view the premises. The rule is that notice to perform is necessary whenever the fact, on the occurrence of which the right to claim performance depends, lies more peculiarly within the knowledge of the party claiming such right."

In Hedekin v. Gillespie (1904) 33 Ind. App. 650, 72 N. E. 143, it appeared that a tenant claimed that the landlord agreed that he would from time to time, as required, make all necessary repairs and keep the leased premises in good repair. The wife of the tenant was injured by falling through a defective walk upon the premises, and it was held that the measure of damages for the breach of the contract was the amount paid for making the repairs. The court said that it was incumbent upon the tenant to make the repairs, upon refusal of the landlord to do so, and look to the landlord for the cost of the same.

In Reams v. Taylor (1906) 31 Utah, 288, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436, 120 Am. St. Rep. 930, 87 Pac. 1089, the lessor was held not liable for personal injuries to the tenant, due to his failure to repair an uncovered outside cellarway, the tenant subsequently, while near there in the dark, falling into the cellarway and injuring herself. In so holding, the court said that the plaintiff, as against her landlord, had no right to expose herself to the risk of injury from existing and visible defects in the premises leased by her. It was her duty to repair the defects, and deduct the expense therefor from the rent, or she might, under the lease in this case, have surrendered the premises. She chose to do neither, and hence cannot recover.

The duty of a tenant in this regard is well stated in McGinn v. French (1900) 107 Wis. 54, 82 N. W. 724, wherein the court said: "It is perfectly evident that a few minutes' work with a hammer and nails would have made the steps absolutely safe. If these steps were as unsafe, defective, and dangerous as the plaintiff would have us believe, it was little less than foolhardy for anyone to attempt to use them. If they could be repaired, as they were, at so slight an expense and with so little effort, the continued use without such repair was an assumption of the risk of accident. Knowing these stairs were unsafe, the liability of danger great, and the expense of repairs trifling, it was the plain duty of the tenant to make them, and thus save his family from the threatened danger. . . . It was but a matter of common prudence, and the tenant, knowing the danger of loss or injury to be great, cannot continue the use of the dangerous premises and hide behind a promise to repair."

III. Where possession of the property is reserved by the lessor.

a. In general.

Without reference to any agreement upon the part of the landlord to keep the leased premises in repair, it is the general rule that where he retains in his possession portions of the leased premises for the common use of himself and the tenant, or for the common use of different tenants, it is his duty to keep such portion of the premises in safe condition, and for the negligent failure to perform this duty he is liable in tort for any injury resulting therefrom to a tenant, or any person lawfully on the premises. This rule, of course, is not affected by the fact that the lease contained an agreement upon the part of the landlord to keep the premises in repair. The cases so holding, however, are sometimes referred to as supporting what may be termed the minority rule, that the landlord who has covenanted to repair is liable, even where the juries received by reason of such defect. The court said that "where the landlord agrees to put the premises in repair, and keep them in repair during the tenancy, it would seem that there ought to arise a positive duty on his part, before relinquishing possession to the tenant, to make reasonable inspection of the premises for concealed defects, unknown to and undiscoverable by a reasonable inspection on the tenant's part, which might render the premises dangerous to the tenant, his family, servants, and guests. In such a case, as it seems to us, the landlord ought to be held to a more careful inspection than the tenant, because the duty to repair is upon the landlord, and his presumed knowledge of his own premises would make a discovery by him of concealed defects and dangers more probable. Such a rule would seem to be only a just application of the maxim to which we have adverted, that there is always a positive duty to exercise reasonable care to so use one's own property as not to injure another." This case is not necessarily a departure from the majority rule already stated, although it is, perhaps, a departure from the general rule that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to leases of land, as to defects unknown to either of the parties.

In Lowe v. O' Brien (1914) 77 Wash. 677, 138 Pac. 295, it is held that the lessor of a building set upon piles driven in the water of an inlet is liable for personal injuries to a tenant due to the building falling into the water, the lessor having contracted to keep the premises in repair, and his attention having been called to these insecure pilings, and he having agreed to fix them soon, and having failed to do so. The court said that the question of contributory negligence by the plaintiff by remaining in the premises more than a reasonable time after the lessor made this promise was one of fact for the jury. This case may, perhaps, be regarded as a departure, in part at least, from the majority rule stated, although the peculiar facts and the nature of the defects are such as to present strong grounds for making an exception to the majority rule. In this case the injury to the tenant was not due to an accident, but was directly due to the failure of the landlord to repair. It is more in line with the cases holding that the landlord is liable for injury to the property of the tenant where he breaches his contract to repair, where the injury to the property is the proximate result of the breach, as, for instance, the failure to repair a roof, permitting water to leak through onto the tenant's goods. In a majority of the cases considered, the injury was due to a combination of circumstances more or less accidental in their nature.

b. Minority rule.

In a few jurisdictions the majority rule referred to is denied, either in whole or in part. In Minnesota, it is apparently denied as a whole. The first Minnesota case denying the rule is Barron v. Liedloff (1905) 95 Minn. 474, 104 N. W. 289. In that case the sublessee of two rooms of the leased premises, who had been given the right to use a porch attached to another part of the premises and adjoining these rooms, was held to be entitled to recover from the original lessor for personal injuries received by reason of defective flooring in the porch, due to the lessor's failure to repair. The court said that where the landlord agreed to repair and keep in repair the premises, his right to enter and have possession of the premises for that purpose is necessarily implied, and his duties and liabilities are in some respects similar to those of the owner and occupant. And if his negligence in making or failing to make the repairs results in an unsafe condition of the premises, he is liable for injuries caused thereby to persons lawfully upon the premises, who are not guilty of contributory negligence on their part. It is clear that in this state the action in behalf of the injured person sounds in tort, and not in contract. This is emphasized in Keegan v. G. Heileman Brewing Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 496, L.R.A.1916F, 1149, 152 N. W. 877, where the court said: "If the lease did require the defendant to keep the premises in repair, then the instruction was correct, for the rule is that, where the lessor by his lease contracts to keep the leased premises in repair, and he negligently fails to do so, he is liable to the lessee and the members of the lessee's family occupying the same, for personal injuries received from a defective condition of the premises. The action is for the wrong committed by the landlord by his negligence in failing to perform an act assumed by him, which he should know would protect them from injury if performed, or expose them to injury if not performed. The contract creates an implied legal duty on the part of the landlord toward those who are rightfully upon the premises, and a negligent violation thereof vests in them a right of action in tort against him for injuries sustained." This is also the doctrine of Good v. Von Hemert (1911) 114 Minn. 393, 131 N. W. 466; Glidden v. Goodfellow (1913) 124 Minn. 101, L.R.A.1916F, 1073, 144 N. W. 428; Glidden v. Second Ave. Invest. Co. (1914) 125 Minn. 471, L.R.A.1915C, 190, 147 N. W. 658, 6 N. C. C. A. 743; Keiper v. Anderson (1917) 138 Minn. 392, L.R.A.1918C, 299, 165 N. W. 237.

In Keegan v. G. Heileman Brewing Co. (Minn.) supra, this rule was applied in holding a landlord liable for injuries to an employee, due to his failure to heat the leased premises according to his contract. And in Keiper v. Anderson (Minn.) supra, the rule also was applied to a contract by the lessor to keep the premises heated, and, where the tenant's death resulted from a breach of this contract, it was held that an action could be maintained under the Death Statute to recover damages for the death. The court said that the right to maintain the action was not affected by the fact that it was based upon a breach of the contract; that as a matter of law the liability of the landlord was based upon his negligence, growing out of his failure to perform the contract. Compare, upon this point, with Davis v. Smith (1904) 26 R. L. 129, 66 L.R.A. 478, 106 Am. St. Rep. 691, 58 Atl. 630, 3 Ann. Cas. 832, which denies the right to recover for the death of a tenant, based upon the landlord's breach of covenant to repair, where the right of action depends upon the Death Statute.

In Kurtz v. Pauly (1914) 158 Wis. 534, 149 N. W. 143, the statement is made that the landlord is not liable for personal injuries to a tenant, due to defects in the premises, in the absence of an agreement upon his part to repair. And in Flood v. Pabat Brewing Co. (1914) 158 Wis. 626, L.R.A.1916F, 1101, 149 N. W. 489, the court, while recognizing a conflict of authority upon the point, says that it thinks the weight of authority and the better reason support the doctrine that a landlord who agrees to keep leased premises in repair is liable to an invitee of the tenant in an action of tort for breach of his duty to repair. "Where a landlord agrees to keep leased premises in repair, his right to enter and have possession of the premises for such purpose is necessarily implied, and his duties and liabilities in that regard are in some respects similar to those of an owner and occupant. His negligent failure to repair, therefore, is a breach of duty, and anyone lawfully upon the premises by invitation of the tenant, who suffers injury in consequence of the landlord's breach of duty, has an action for negligence against the landlord. . . . While the decisions of this court are not directly in point, they inferentially, if not directly, support the doctrine that, where a landlord agrees to keep premises leased in repair, he is liable to an invitee of a tenant for breach of duty in that regard."

In many cases like Park v. Penn (1916) 203 Ill. App. 188, where there was in fact no covenant to repair, the general rule of the landlord's immunity from liability is so stated as to suggest that it would not apply had the lease contained a covenant to repair. But this is pure obiter.

In Collins v. Fillingham (1908) 129 Mo. App. 340, 108 S. W. 616, a landlord, who had contracted to repair the premises, was held liable for injury to the child of a tenant, due to a rotten balustrade of the porch, which the having prepared the instrument, is responsible for the language employed, and, as he relies upon the instrument for his protection, he is not in a position to insist upon a different interpretation of the words than that of their plain and ordinary meaning.

Other portions of the instrument strengthen this construction, and show that the party named as the lessee in the instrument was to have nothing whatever to do, except to pay the rent and keep the gin running or in operation, after all machinery, wood, coal, supplies, repairs, etc., necessary for its successful operation, were furnished or made by the appellant. Such being the meaning of the alleged lease, the issue as to whether or not the negligence averred was that of an independent contractor, and the doctrine applicable thereto, have no place in this case. The court, therefore, ruled correctly in refusing prayers by the appellant for instructions seeking to have that issue submitted to the jury.

The issues of negligence and contributory negligence, under the evidence, were issues of fact for the jury. They were submitted under familiar and correct declarations of law.

Appellant complains here of the ruling of the court in admitting the testimony of certain witnesses, tending to show what the custom was with reference to parties being permitted to enter the boiler room, where the appellee and his son were injured. The abstract of the appellant does not show that any objection was made at the time to the testimony of these witnesses. Furthermore, if such testimony had been objected to, there was no error prejudicial to appellant in admitting it, for appellee testified without objection, and there was no testimony to the contrary, that he went into the engine or boiler room for the purpose of inquiring when his cotton would be ginned.

Those in charge knew that he and his son were in the boiler room, and no objections were made to their presence there. The testimony as abstracted was competent on the issue as to whether or not the appellee was a trespasser and guilty of contributory negligence, in going in and taking his son into a dangerous place. The testimony tends to prove that persons going to the gin on business were permitted to go into the boiler or engine room; that no steps were taken in any manner to prevent those having business at the gin from going into the engine or boiler room.

The appellant complains of the ruling of the court in permitting the witness Graham to testify that "he went down to the gin the next morning after the explosion, and that he found where the boiler had a plug in it, and that it had been blown out; that the threads were mighty bad on the boiler, where the plug is supposed to set in; it was eaten out considerable; that the threads on the boiler had an appearance of being freshly done, but were worn slick; that Mr. Collison spoke to him about the matter," etc.

The abstract of appellant does not show that any objection was made to the introduction of this testimony, and, even if it had been objected to, the testimony was competent, for the reason that it tended to show the real condition that the boiler was in at the time the accident occurred.

The appellant also urges here that the court erred in permitting witness P. J. Donahue to testify as to the condition that the boiler was in some fifteen days after the accident; but the appellant, neither in his brief nor in his abstract, set out any testimony of the witness which shows that the boiler was in any different condition at the time witness saw the same than it was at the time the injury occurred. The testimony of this witness, as abstracted, shows that he testified as an expert, and in answer to hypothetical questions propounded to him he gave his opinion concerning the causes that must have brought about the worn condition of the threads in the hole of the boiler from which the plug was blown, as assumed in the question propounded to the witness.

In the testimony, as abstracted, it does not appear that any objection was urged at the trial, either to the question or to the answer. But again we say that, even if objection had been offered to the testimony in the form in which it appears in appellant's abstract, we would have to hold that the testimony was competent, and that it did not in any manner contravene the doctrine announced by us in Prescott & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ark. 179, 67 S. W. 865, St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Plumlee, 78 Ark. 148, 95 S. W. 442, and other cases more recent of the same purport, to the effect that testimony is incompetent, after an accident has occurred, tending to show that the defect causing the accident and injury was removed, altered, or changed by the master, for the purpose of showing negligence.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied, January 12, 1920.

I. In general.

This note is not intended to cover the question of the liability of the landlord, whether he has covenanted to repair or not, for injuries to third persons while using that part of the leased premises intended for public use. In this connection, however, attention is called to Lowell v. Spaulding (1849) 4 Cush. (Mass.) 277, 50 Am. Dec. 775, holding that where there is an agreement by a landlord to keep the leased premises in repair, he is liable to a town for damages which it is compelled to pay by reason of an injury to a third person due to the bad condition of a cellarway, constructed in the sidewalk in front of the leased premises.

The question here raised is as to whether or not a contract by the landlord to repair the leased premises creates a relation between the parties out of which there arises the legal duty to repair, the failure to perform which will support an action ex delicto or by her when the accident occurred. When considered, however, with the other evidence in the case, it did not tend to prove that ~~—statement as to employment—conclusiveness.~~ fact or justify a finding to that effect. The alleged purpose for which the statement was obtained might fairly be said to relate to the employment by her husband and herself, and it is quite evident it was so understood by her.

Indeed it is not an uncommon thing for a husband and wife to use the plural when speaking of their individual possessions used in common by both, e. g., "our residence," "our servants," "our automobile." Under the circumstances it was a natural thing for her not to have distinguished between the time the chauffeur was employed by her husband and her personally. In any view such statement did not justify submitting the case to the jury, or it in finding that Fraser at the time the plaintiff was injured was her servant.

It has been settled by numerous authorities in this state at least that when it appears, in an action against the owner of an automobile for damages sustained, that the driver was not in his employ nor engaged in his business, a plaintiff cannot recover. Automobile—liability for act of driver. Van Blaricom v. Dodgson, 220 N. Y. 111, L.R.A.1917F, 363, 115 N. E. 443, and cases cited; Reilly v. Connable, 214 N. Y. 586, L.R.A.1916A, 954, 108 N. E. 853, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 656; Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation, 203 N. Y. 191, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481, 96 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 883, 3 N. C. C. A. 444; Farthing v. Strouse, 172 App. Div. 523, 158 N. Y. Supp. 840; Heisenbittel v. Meagher, 162 App. Div. 752, 147 N. Y. Supp. 1087; Tanzer v. Read, 160 App. Div. 584, 145 N. Y. Supp. 708. The reason underlying this rule is the general one that a party injured by the negligence of another must seek his remedy against the person whose actual negligence caused the injury, and that such person alone is liable. King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37. The case of master and servant is an exception to the general rule, and the negligence of the latter is imputable to the master where the servant is doing the act which occasions the injury and is at the time acting within the scope of his employment. This exception is based upon the fact that the servant is standing in the master's place and is acting for and representing him, since he must obey his orders. Engel v. Eureka Club, 137 N. Y. 100, 33 Am. St. Rep. 692, 32 N. E. 1052.

But it is strenuously urged by the respondent that the defendant may be held liable, notwithstanding the rule established by the authorities cited, because she was the owner of the car, and in it at the time the accident occurred. This cannot be done unless the rule which makes one person responsible for the torts of another be entirely disregarded. If a change in this respect is to be made, it should be done by legislative enactment, and not by judicial decree.

A question somewhat similar to the one under consideration was recently considered in Hartley v. Miller, 165 Mich. 115, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 81, 130 N. W. 336, 1 N. C. C. A. 126. There the defendant loaned his automobile to a friend for a ride and was finally persuaded to accompany him. The plaintiff was injured through the negligent manner in which the automobile was driven by the defendant's friend, and brought action against the owner. The plaintiff's contention was essentially the same as that made by respondent in the present case. It was stated by the court as follows: "It is the contention of the plaintiff that, because defendant Miller was present and the machine was being used with his consent at the time of the injury complained of, he is liable; that, an automobile being a dangerous machine, its owner should be held responsible for the manner in which it is used."

The court, however, held that since at the time of the accident the automobile was not being driven by defendant, nor subject to his control, he was not liable for the negligent way it was driven, notwithstanding his presence in it.

In principle the present case cannot be distinguished from Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation, 203 N. Y. 191, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 481, 96 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 883, 3 N. C. C. A. 444. There the defendant owned an ambulance for which it hired a horse and driver from a livery stable. The plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the driver, but this court held that, notwithstanding the fact that the ambulance was owned by and at the time was being used for the defendant's purposes, the undisputed evidence that the defendant did not employ or pay the driver, and did not possess the right to discharge him, could not be disregarded, and consequently there was no evidence to sustain a verdict against defendant. In that case as in this the accident was caused by the negligent driving of the servant of another, whom the defendant did not select or control, and whom he could not discharge. Though at the time there was a representative of the defendant in the ambulance, and it was then being used for its purposes, the court nevertheless held there was no evidence establishing the relation of master and servant between the defendant and driver, and in its absence the owner could not be held liable.

I am of the opinion the complaint should have been dismissed, and that the evidence did not justify a finding that the defendant was responsible for plaintiff's injuries.

The judgment, therefore, should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide event.

Hiscock, Ch. J., and Hogan, Pound, and Andrews, JJ., concur. Chase and Crane, JJ., dissent on the ground that defendant was engaged in a joint undertaking with her husband at the time of the accident.

NOTE.

The general question whether uncontradicted testimony may be disregarded in civil actions is the subject of the annotation following KELLY v. JONES, post, 796. Other cases which like the reported case (POTTS v. PARDEE, ante, 785) have taken the view that uncontradicted testimony could not properly be disregarded, are cited in subdivisions IV. a, b.

v.

LESTER L. ARNOLD, Plff. in Err.

(200 Mich. 162, 166 N. W. 985.)

Evidence — right to disregard uncontradicted testimony.

1. The court may direct a verdict for either party where the evidence in his favor is uncontradicted either by cross-examination, other testimony, or facts and circumstances, is not in any way improbable or discredited, and but one legitimate inference may be drawn from it.

[See note on this question beginning on page 796.]

Sale — conditional — effect of taking note as security.

2. Title to personal property may be retained for security under a contract of sale to another, although a note is taken as evidence of the indebtedness, and the security is not lost by suit upon the note.

[See 24 R. C. L. 503 et seq.]

Trial — taking case from jury — assertion that testimony is untrue.

3. A claim by counsel that uncontradicted testimony in a case is not true does not require submission of the case to the jury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Berrien County (Bridgman, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought for the conversion of an engine. *Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. O'Hara & O'Hara, for plaintiff in error:

If there was not a reservation of title at the time of the sale of the engine, then, in the absence of any provision to the contrary in the mortgage, defendant became entitled to the engine upon its surrender to him by the mortgagor.

Rep. 187.

Fellows, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to February 21, 1914, defendant was the owner of four passenger boats on Paw Paw lake, in Berrien county. One of these boats was named "Dixie." On this date he sold this line of boats to one Alpha Cross, taking as part payment certain real estate at an agreed price of $685, and receiving for the balance four promissory notes, of $528.75 each, secured by a chattel mortgage on the boats. This chattel mortgage did not cover after-acquired property. Cross, after the purchase of the boats, made an arrangement with Harry W. Shively and a Mr. Crosett for the joint operation by the three of this line of boats during the season of 1914. Shively and Corsett were to and did put in $500 or $600, which was used to repair the boats and put them in shape for operation. The engine in the Dixie proved unsatisfactory, and Shively saw plaintiff, a manufacturer of marine engines, with a view of purchasing one of his engines for use in the Dixie. Both Shively and plaintiff testify to the arrangement made, which was that the engine should be tried out to see if it proved satisfactory, that title thereto should remain in plaintiff until paid for, and that a note was to be and was given as evidence of the indebtedness in case any of them should die. There was no testimony given to the contrary. The engine was shipped to Paw Paw lake, put in the boat Dixie, and worked satisfactorily. Shortly before the first note given by Cross to defendant fell due, defendant took possession of the boat "Dixie" and proceeded to advertise the same for sale under the terms of the mortgage. Plaintiff demanded the engine, which the testimony shows could have been removed without damage to the boat; but the demand was refused, and the boat, with the engine installed, was sold, and bid in by defendant. This action was brought for the conversion of the engine. Upon the trial and here, defendant conceded that title might be retained in personal property by parol, but insisted that it was a question for the jury in the instant case whether it was so retained. The trial court was of the opinion that plaintiff's case was made out by uncontroverted evidence, that there was no evidence to dispute it, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the engine.

The defendant insists, and it is the only question in the case, that the court should have submitted the case to the jury. The functions of the judge and jury are too well understood to require extended discussion. The jury finds the facts; the judge decides the law. The jury weighs the evidence; the judge determines the legal questions. The credibility, sufficiency, and weight of the evidence on a given subject are for the jury; the question of whether there is any evidence on a given subject is for the court. Where the testimony is all one way, is uncontradicted by any testimony given in the case, either from a party's own witnesses or the other party's witnesses, either on direct or drawn out on cross-examination, or by any facts or circumstances in the case, is not in itself in any way improbable or discredited, and but one legitimate inference may be drawn from it, and a case is thereby made for the plaintiff, or a defense made for the defendant, the duty rests upon the court to direct a verdict. Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 64 Mich. 93, 8 Am. St. Rep. 804, 31 N. W. 147; Hunt v. Supreme Council, O. C. F. 64 Mich. 671, 8 Am. St. Rep. 855, 31 N. W. 576; McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 555, 24 N. W. 854; Peninsular Stove Co. v. Osmun, 73 Mich. 570, 41 N. W. 693; Brudin v. Inglis, 121 Mich. 410, 80 N. W. 115; Hicks v. Steel, 126 Mich. 408, 85 N. Evidence—right to disregard uncontradicted testimony.

That it is many times a difficult question to determine whether there is any testimony on a given subject does not relieve the court from the responsibility or the duty of solving it. In the instant case the testimony of plaintiff and Mr. Shively, a disinterested witness, agrees as to what the arrangement was with reference to the engine, that title was retained in plaintiff until it was paid for, and that the note was given to evidence the indebtedness. We are unable to find anything in the cross-examination of either of them, any testimony by other witnesses, or any fact or circumstance in the case, which in any way tends to discredit or controvert the facts testified to by them. Under their undisputed testimony that title was retained in plaintiff, the circumstances surrounding their negotiations, their highly probable and in no way discredited testimony that the note was given solely to evidence the indebtedness, the fact that a note was given did not make a case for the jury. Title may be retained for security, even though a note is given to evidence the indebtedness, and the vendor may sue upon the note without losing his security. Holcomb & H. Mfg. Co. v. Cataldo, 199 Mich. 265, 165 N. W. 941; Atkinson v. Japink, 186 Mich. 335, 152 N. W. 1079.

Nor was a case made for the jury by the unsupported, but often repeated, claim of defendant's counsel that the testimony of these witnesses was not truthful and their version of the transaction was not true. If the unsupported claims of counsel would take a case to the jury, there would be few cases that juries would not be given an opportunity to speculate upon.

There was no error in refusing to submit this case to the jury, and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

The general subject as to the right to disregard uncontradicted testimony in civil actions is considered in the annotation following KELLY v. JONES, post, 796. For other cases in which the court, as in the reported case (BOUDEMAN v. ARNOLD, ante, 789), took the view that the uncontradicted testimony should control the result, see subdivision IV. b, of that note. In some of these cases, as in the BOUDEMAN CASE, the action of the trial court in directing a verdict was sustained on appeal; in others, a verdict by the jury contrary to the uncontradicted testimony was not permitted to stand.

BENJAMIN D. JONES, County Collector of Will County, etc.

Witness — right to disregard testimony.

1. There may be such inherent improbability in the testimony of a witness as to justify a court in disregarding his evidence, even in the absence of any direct contradiction.

[See note on this question beginning on page 796.]

Injunction — to prevent collection of tax on property not owned.

2. Injunction lies to prevent collection of a tax assessed against property which the taxpayer does not own.

Evidence — burden of proof — invalidity of tax.

3. One seeking an injunction against a tax alleged to have been assessed against property which he does not own has the burden of showing the invalidity of the tax.

4. One seeking to enjoin the collection of a tax upon shares of corporate stock which he alleges that he did not own does not overcome the presumption of validity of the tax by clear and specific testimony by stating that he sold whatever stock he owned on some dates with respect to which he was not certain.

Witness — facts demonstrating falsity of testimony.

5. If facts stated by a witness demonstrate the falsity of the testimony, the court is not bound to believe him.
[See 10 R. C. L. 1008, 1009.]

— right to reject uncontradicted testimony.

6. Where the testimony of a witness is uncontradicted either by positive testimony or circumstances, and is not inherently improbable, it cannot be rejected.

Tax — on intermingled property — validity.

7. A tax on shares of corporate stock owned by the taxpayer cannot be sustained where they are assessed together with shares not owned by him, and there is no way of separating the assessment upon his stock from that not owned by him.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Will County (De Selm, J.) dismissing a bill filed to enjoin collection of certain personal taxes assessed against plaintiff. Reversed with directions.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. George Warner Young, for appellant:

The board of review cannot assess or levy a tax against a person, based on property he does not own.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Joseph A. Kelly, a resident of Joliet, in Will county, in 1918 returned to the township assessor a schedule of personal property amounting to $405, not including any shares of capital stock. He was notified by the board of review to appear and show cause why his assessment should not be increased. A hearing was had on September 5, 1918, and the board assessed him on 20 shares of Republic Iron & Steel Company preferred stock, 40 shares of United States Steel Company preferred stock, 93 shares of Corn Products Refining Company common stock, 50 shares of Sears, Roebuck, & Company, preferred stock, for the years 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918, and also 50 shares of Columbia Gas & Electric Company stock for the year 1918. The various shares of stock were not valued separately, but a value was placed on all as a total for each year, making a final assessment of $14,175 cash value for the whole. The assessment was returned by the board of review as an assessment of omitted property, and a tax having been extended on the assessment, the appellee, Benjamin D. Jones, as collector, demanded of the appellant payment of the taxes. Thereupon the appellant filed his bill in this case in the circuit court of Will county to enjoin the collection of the tax, alleging that he did not own the shares of stock on the 1st day of April of any year for which he was assessed, except the shares of the Columbia Gas & Electric Company, which he owned in 1918. He offered to pay taxes on the assessment of 1918 on the Columbia Gas & Electric Company stock if the court could determine the amount of such tax, but alleged that it was impossible to separate the tax levied upon property owned by him from the tax on property which he did not own, so as to determine the amount justly due. He prayed for an injunction restraining the collection of the tax, and a temporary injunction was issued. The bill was answered by the appellee, admitting the assessment as charged, but denying the ground of relief alleged, and upon a hearing the bill was dismissed for want of equity.

Taxing authorities cannot arbitrarily assess a person on property he does not own, and the proper remedy to prevent the collection of a tax levied on such an assessment is in equity by bill for injunction. Weber v. Baird, 208 Ill. 209, 70 N. E. 231; Duckett v. Gerig, 223 Ill. 284, 79 N. E. 94; Bates v. Parker, 227 Ill. 120, 81 N. E. 384. Upon an issue of that kind the presumption is that the tax is just and lawful, and the objector assumes the burden of showing its invalidity.

N. E. 296. The complainant was the only witness at the hearing concerning the ownership of the shares of capital stock assessed to him. He testified that at one time he owned the 20 shares of Republic Iron &

Steel Company preferred stock, the 40 shares of United States Steel

Company preferred stock, and 50 shares of Sears, Roebuck, & Company preferred stock, but that he sold all of them before April 1, 1914, to raise money to go into the Joliet

Trust & Savings Bank, the Woodruff Building, and the Joliet Pure Ice

Company, business enterprises at Joliet; that he sold the United States Steel Company preferred

stock some time in February, 1914, and had a memorandum of that, as it was sold on account of his daughters, and he gave them credit for half of it, but as to the other shares

he had no memorandum when he bought or sold them. As to those stocks he testified generally that he had no data to go by; that he went into the Woodruff Building in 1910, and the last stock he bought in the Pure Ice Company was in 1912. He had alleged in his bill that the only stock he had owned since 1914 was the shares of Columbia Gas & Electric Company, but said that was a mistake, and admitted that he had owned 93 shares of Corn Products Refining Company at one time; that he had bought and sold shares of that stock several times, but he could not tell when he bought that stock and had no dates to guide him. He was uncertain about the dates, but said that he did not own that stock during the whole five-year period from 1914 to 1918. He could not give any dates or details of transactions concerning that stock, and his testimony was not so clear and explicit as to overcome the presumption of the validity of the tax on that stock.

The reason alleged for sustaining the decree is that the chancellor did not believe the complainant, and it is evident that such was the fact, because on no other ground could the decree be sustained. There may be such inherent improbability in the testimony of a witness as to justify a court in disregarding his evidence, even in the absence of any direct contradiction. If his testimony is contradictory of the laws of nature or universal human experience, so as to be incredible and beyond the limits of human belief, or if facts stated by the witness demonstrate the falsity of the testimony, the court is not bound to believe him. Podolski v. Stone, 186 Ill. 540, 58 N. E. 840; Kennard v. Curran, 239 Ill. 122, 87 N. E. 913; People v. Davis, 269 Ill. 256, 110 N. E. 9; Kuehne v. Malach, 286 Ill. 120, 121 N. E. 391. There was no inherent improbability in the testimony of the complainant, and nothing incredible about his statement that he sold stock to go into certain business enterprises in Joliet. There was no reason arising out of the testimony of the complainant for disbelieving him. If there is a contradiction of testimony, either direct or by facts and circumstances proved, much weight is to be given to the findings of the chancellor, who saw and heard the witness, since his credibility may be seriously affected by his appearance, manner, and conduct while testifying. Coari v. Olsen, 91 Ill. 273; Ellis v. Ward, 137 Ill. 509, 25 N. E. 530; Bouton v. Cameron, 205 Ill. 50, 68 N. E. 800; Hill v. Fowler, 231 Ill. 205, 83 N. E. 151; Kirby v. Judy, 286 Ill. 200, 121 N. E. 611. But there was no question of weighing the testimony of the complainant against contradiction, since there was no contradiction whatever of the facts testified to. Where the testimony of a witness is contradicted, either by positive testimony or circumstances, and is not inherently improbable, it cannot be rejected. Larson v. Glos, 235 Ill. 584, 85 N. E. 926. While the complainant had no dates of the purchase or sale of stocks occurring several years before he testified, his testimony was that he sold the stocks before 1914 to go into certain specific Joliet enterprises, and he adhered to that statement throughout his testimony. No evidence was offered as to who appeared on the books of the various corporations to have owned the stock, or that the complainant ever exercised any right or privilege of a stockholder, and there was nothing whatever tending to demonstrate the falsity of his testimony.

uncontradicted
testimony.

It was admitted both by the bill and on the hearing that the complainant was lawfully assessed on the 50 shares of Columbia Gas & Electric Company stock for the year 1918, and the evidence did not show that he was not liable on the 93 shares of Corn Products Refining Company's stock, and if it had been possible to separate the tax on those shares from the tax on shares not owned by the complainant, those taxes should and could have been sustained; but it was admitted, and is now conceded, that such separation was impossible. That being the case, granting the relief prayed for would not interfere with or in any manner prejudice the right to assess the complainant for the 50 shares of Columbia Gas & Electric Company stock and the 93 shares of Corn Products Refining Company stock hereafter as for omitted property.

Our conclusion is that the chancellor did not have sufficient ground to reject the uncontradicted testimony of the complainant, and that the decree was wrong in dismissing the bill.

The decree is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to grant the relief prayed for in the bill, without prejudice to the right to assess the complainant with the stock of the Columbia Gas & Electric Company and the Corn Products Refining Company as omitted property.

This annotation is intended to be general and suggestive, rather than comprehensive.

Cases in the inferior courts have, as a rule, been excluded. The effort has been made to exclude cases where the testimony was "undisputed" as distinguished from those where it was merely not contradicted, but in many cases such a distinction cannot be exact. The large number of cases where a person injured at a railway crossing testified that he looked or listened, where he must have detected the train had he looked or listened, are excluded, as are also cases of testimony estimating values, and expert testimony. While by way of illustration some negligence cases are included in which the uncontradicted testimony is invoked as overcoming, as a matter of law, a presumption or a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, that class of cases is not in general included, since the question involves considerations peculiar to the function and effect of a rebuttable presumption which are foreign to the purpose of this note.

The credibility of witnesses is for the jury; but they must not be permitted to run away with the case.

All agree that the jury must not believe impossibilities. Beyond this there is no rule generally applicable. As applied to uncontradicted testimony there are two broad rules: one, that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness is for the jury; the other, that the jury may not arbitrarily reject the uncontradicted testimony of a witness; and the courts apply one or the other as they mean to leave the matter to the jury, or to interfere. In the statement of these two rules the courts sometimes give preference to the power of the jury, and sometimes, on the other hand, require the jury to accept uncontradicted testimony unless there is some apparent reason against it. Cases in this annotation, as will be seen, are grouped generally according to the result, not according to the phrasing of the rule in the particular case. Sometimes the two rules are given in combined or double form. In a few jurisdictions an attempt has been made to enforce a rigid rule, at least so far as appellate courts are concerned, that the jury is not bound to believe uncontradicted testimony.

A similar rule as applied to the uncontradicted testimony of interested witnesses was formerly attempted in New York, but broke down as not of universal application.

By way of preface a few illustrations of the variety of points of view are here given.

"The credibility of a witness is for the jury; and where the issue depends upon facts the existence of which is not admitted, even though testified to by a credible witness who is unchallenged, the question is for the jury." Second Nat. Bank v. Smith (1917) 91 N. J. L. 531, 1 A.L.R. 470, 103 Atl. 862.

"However improbable the testimony of a witness may appear, who testifies to a fact not in itself impossible in the ordinary course of events, the credibility, force, and effect of such testimony are for the jury." O'Brien, J., in Hastings v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. (1893) 138 N. Y. 478, 34 N. E. 289.

In affirming a judgment on a verdict for the defendant, where the plaintiff had told an improbable story, including the statement that he obtained some of the money with which he made a purchase of property attached as the property of an alleged fraudulent vendee by finding buried treasure, the court said: "Bureaus and chests as depositories for money have this advantage over banks: they keep no records. And the story, as a whole, may be said to defy contradiction, save by its inherent improbability, its inconsistency with surrounding circumstances, and the contradictory statements. That lost treasures have been found in the past is doubtless true, but when the account is so improbable as that here given, and is inconsistent with statements made outside of court, it may well be rejected." Jordan v. Crickett (1904) 123 Iowa, 576, 99 N. W. 163.

"It is firmly established everywhere that, as a general rule, when a disinterested witness, who is in no way discredited by other evidence, testifies to a fact within the knowledge of such witness, which is not in itself improbable, or in conflict with other evidence, the witness is to be believed, and the facts so given are to be taken as legally established." Miller's Will (1907) 49 Or. 452, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1051, 90 Pac. 1002, 14 Ann. Cas. 277.

While strictly beyond the scope of this note, reference may be here made to Quock Ting v. United States (1891) 140 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 501, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733, in which case, affirming a judgment where the trial court, sitting without a jury, had disbelieved the petitioner and his father, who swore that the petitioner, a Chinese, was born in the United States, the court said: "Undoubtedly, as a general rule, positive testimony as to a particular fact, uncontradicted by anyone, should control the decision of the court; but that rule admits of many exceptions. There may be such an inherent improbability in the statements of a witness as to induce the court or jury to disregard his evidence, even in the absence of any direct conflicting testimony. He may be contradicted by the facts he states as completely as by direct adverse testimony; and there may be so many omissions in his account of particular transactions, or of his own conduct, as to discredit his whole story. His manner, too, of testifying, may give rise to doubts of his sincerity, and create the impression that he is giving a wrong coloring to material facts. All these things may properly be considered in determining the weight which should be given to his statements, although there be no adverse verbal testimony adduced."

"The testimony of a witness may be so impossible and absurd and self-contradictory that it should be deemed a nullity by the court." Graham v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1909) 143 Iowa, 604, 119 N. W. 708.

In Hughes v. Hughes (1912) 109 Me. 564, 84 Atl. 647, the court affirmed the decision of the trial court in directing a nonsuit on the "overwhelming improbability of the plaintiff's own story." He was apparently a person of small means and poor character, who sued his mother and brother for having taken $1,800 from his old coat, hanging in the cellar of his mother's house.

In affirming a nonsuit the court said: "For a young man in his nineteenth year to testify that he did not know that, if he got his fingers into the rolls of a straw cutter, they would be caught thereby, and did not know that, if they were caught, he would be injured, does not amount to even a scintilla of evidence tending to establish that such were the facts." Roth v. S. E. Barrett Mfg. Co. (1897) 96 Wis. 615, 71 N. W. 1034.

II. Testimony contrary to physical facts.

The numerous cases are excluded which hold that the testimony of a person injured by a train at a railway crossing, that he looked and listened, but did not see or hear the train, does not justify the submission to the jury of his contributory negligence where the other evidence unmistakably shows that, if he had looked and listened, he would have seen or heard the train.

Uncontradicted testimony which is contrary to physical facts may be disregarded.

Wisconsin.—Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. (1906) 127 Wis. 332, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 357, 106 N. W. 833.

The testimony of a witness which conflicts with natural law is not legitimate evidence, and cannot be considered. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Stick (1895) 143 Ind. 449, 41 N. E. 365; Emrich Furniture Co. v. Byrnes (1909) 44 Ind. App. 341, 87 N. E. 1042. Testimony of witnesses which is contrary to physical law is of little or no value whatever. McLeod v. Miller (1915) 40 Nev. 447, 153 Pac. 566, 167 Pac. 27. "The testimony of a witness or finding of a jury, contrary to manifest physical situations, common knowledge, or conceded facts, is efficiently impeached thereby." Samulski v. Menasha Paper Co. (1911) 147 Wis. 285, 133 N. W. 142.

A verdict against physical facts cannot stand. Schrager v. Foster (1917) 181 App. Div. 923, 168 N. Y. Supp. 240; Spitz v. United Electric Light & P. Co. (1919) 175 N. Y. Supp. 727. "When the testimony of a witness is confronted by admitted facts and circumstances which are totally repugnant to and entirely inconsistent therewith, then such pretended testimony must give way and be counted for nothing." Wray v. Southwestern Electric Light & Water Power Co. (1896) 68 Mo. App. 380, reversing a judgment for the plaintiff.

The court is not bound to find in accordance with the defendant's testimony if he believes it to be contradicted by the circumstances. Friemel v. Coker (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 218 S. W. 1105.

The court on appeal will test the testimony of witnesses by the physical possibilities (Dyrez v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1911) 238 Mo. 33, 141 S. W. 861); it will reverse a judgment founded on evidence of a physical impossibility (Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Anderson (1896) 93 Va. 650, 25 S. E. 947, 8 Am. Neg. Cas. 651), or contrary to scientific facts (Chybowski v. Bucyrus Co. (1906) 127 Wis. 332, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 357, 106 N. W. 833).

Evidence which is opposed to well-known and recognized scientific facts about which there is no conflict, and which was a basis of a judgment in the lower courts, will be reviewed and the judgment reversed if justice requires. Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1895) 145 N. Y. 408, 40 N. E. 8.

In Sexton v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1912) 245 Mo. 254, 149 S. W. 21, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff for personal injuries, said of the testimony of one of his witnesses: "No legal rule can stifle the conscience of a court when it comes to deal with testimony of this character. No court should be bound by testimony demonstrated to be false by all other facts in the case, and further demonstrated to be false by our own common knowledge of scientific facts."

The court is not required to send the case to the jury where the only evidence upon which the plaintiff "rests his right to succeed consists of a statement of alleged facts, inherently impossible and absolutely at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical laws. In such case, that which purports to be evidence is insufficient to constitute a compliance with the requirements of the scintilla rule, for it is the essence of that rule that there must be some evidence (however slight) upon which the jury might rationally find a verdict for the party producing it." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Chambers (1915) 165 Ky. 703, 178 S. W. 1041, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 471.

"The statements by a witness [for the plaintiff] of the existence or the nonexistence, the occurrence or non-occurrence, of a given thing as a fact that contravenes all laws of mechanics and philosophy that are so generally recognized that courts cannot ignore them, cannot be said to be matters of fact that must go to the jury for their consideration as to their credibility, on the proposition that the jury are the triers of all facts in a suit at law." Nugent v. Kauffman Mill. Co. (1895) 131 Mo. 241, 38 S. W. 428.

In Scroggins v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1909) 138 Mo. App. 215, 120 S. W. 781, the court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a personal-injury case, because it considered the plaintiff's account of the accident "too unreasonable to pass muster."

It was held, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Collier (1907) 88 C. C. A. 127, 157 Fed. 347, writ of certiorari denied in (1908) 209 U. S. 545, 52 L. ed. 920, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571, that neither a court nor a jury will be permitted to credit testimony that the witness, who was near the track when the collision occurred, saw a certain signal given, where cars of a train on a sidetrack intervened between the place where the witness stood and the spot indicated by his testimony as that at which the signal was given.

The plaintiff's testimony that he looked for the elevator which struck him, but did not see it, cannot save him from nonsuit as against the physical fact that the elevator was only a few feet distant. McLennon v. Whitney-Steen Co. (1917) — Colo. —, 167 Pac. 771.

In Wabash R. Co. v. McDoniels (1914) 183 Ind. 104, 107 N. E. 291, the court said, in affirming a judgment in a case where a witness had testified to a statement as made by an injured person, that to believe that the person injured "could give an intelligent account of the accident would test human credulity to the limit. The jury has the right to disregard the testimony of a witness whose statement is contrary to the laws of nature."

The trial court properly directed a verdict for the defendant street railway company, though the plaintiff and his brother testified that they were thrown out of their buggy 50 or 60 feet in front of the car, when it appeared that the buggy struck the car, and that the plaintiff was thrown out rather under than in front of the car. McGlade v. Waterloo (1916) 178 Iowa, 11, 156 N. W. 680.

The court set aside a verdict given upon the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff, an experienced laborer, that he did not know that striking a hard blow with a heavy hammer upon a small chisel held against iron would cause splinters to fly, where ordinary observation and thought would have revealed that fact to him. L'Houx v. Union Constr. Co. (1910) 107 Me. 101, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 800, 77 Atl. 636.

Testimony on the defendant's part that an electric car was moving so rapidly that, under ordinary conditions of wind and weather, it threw up a cloud of dust in advance of it, so as to obscure the headlight, was held, in Zalotuchin v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 127 Mo. App. 577, 106 S. W. 548, to be so opposed to physical laws as to be unworthy of belief.

Testimony that a boy successfully boarded a freight train running at the speed of an express train, and that the train was brought to a dead stop within 10 feet, is so repugnant to the laws of physics of common knowledge that a reasonable mind must reject it as wholly impossible of belief. Giles v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 24, 154 S. W. 852.

In Falkenstern v. Greenfield (1911) 145 Wis. 232, 130 N. W. 61, the plaintiff's testimony as to the manner of the injuries to the buildings on his dam from water was disbelieved by the appellate court as incredible on the physical facts, and a verdict which had been directed for the defendant was approved.

While it is not intended to take up decisions holding the testimony in question to be not contrary to physical facts, the following cases may be here referred to:

It has been held that a trial court ought not to withdraw the testimony of a witness from the jury as contrary to physical facts unless it is so improbable as to warrant a declaration as matter of law that it is unworthy of belief. Wolf v. City R. Co. (1907) 50 Or. 64, 67, 85 Pac. 620, 91 Pac. 460, 15 Ann. Cas. 1181.

"To declare sworn testimony of a fact incredible, we must be convinced that it is so in conflict with the uniform course of nature or with fully established physical facts that no reasonably intelligent man could give it credence." Salchert v. Reinig (1908) 135 Wis. 194, 115 N. W. 132.

In referring to the testimony of the plaintiff, and affirming a judgment for him, the court said: "The credibility of a witness being for the jury, courts are not authorized to reject his testimony and refuse to submit the case to the jury on the ground that the facts stated are highly improbable. It is only where the facts testified to are utterly at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical laws, and, therefore, inherently impossible, that courts may refuse to submit the case to the jury." Wasieto & B. M. R. Co. v. Hall (1916) 167 Ky. 819, 181 S. W. 629.

And while reversing on other grounds a judgment for the plaintiff, entered on a verdict, the court, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Quinn (1920) — Ky. —, 219 S. W. 789, said: "It is only where the facts testified to are utterly at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical laws, and therefore inherently impossible, that courts may refuse to submit the case to the jury."

In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the court said: "While the facts testified to by the plaintiff and her witnesses may be untrue, they are in no sense a contradiction of the physical facts in the case. They are at most only improbable; but that the improbable and unlooked-for do sometimes occur is common experience." Berger v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1902) 97 Mo. App. 127, 71 S. W. 102.

III. Cases favoring the trier of facts.

a. In general.

There are many cases illustrating the principle that the testimony of a witness, though uncontradicted, is for the triers of facts, whether court or jury, who are not bound thereby.

United States. — Tracy v. Phelps (1885) 23 Blatchf. 71, 22 Fed. 634 (jury); Waters v. Davis (1906) 76 C. C. A. 444, 145 Fed. 912 (court).

Arkansas. — Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Click (1909) 93 Ark. 162, 124 S. W. 764 (jury).

California. — Blankman v. Vallejo (1860) 15 Cal. 639 (court); Baker v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. (1889) 79 Cal. 34, 21 Pac. 357 (court).

Iowa. — Oleson v. Hendrickson (1861) 12 Iowa, 222 (jury).

Kentucky. — Campbell v. Mobile & O. R. Co. (1915) 162 Ky. 53, 171 S. W. 1002 (jury).

Maryland. — Charleston Ins. & T. Co. v. Corner (1844) 2 Gill, 410 (jury); William J. Lemp Brewing Co. v. Mantz (1913) 120 Md. 176, 87 Atl. 814 (jury, case reversed on other grounds).

Massachusetts. — Harding v. Brooks (1828) 5 Pick. 244 (jury); Saures v. Stevens Mfg. Co. (1907) 196 Mass. 543, 82 N. E. 694 (jury); Lindenbaum v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1908) 197 Mass. 314, 84 N. E. 129 (jury); Ryan v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1908) 200 Mass. 188, 86 N. E. 310 (jury); Whitten v. Haverhill (1910) 204 Mass. 95, 90 N. E. 409 (jury); Giles v. Giles (1910) 204 Mass. 383, 90 N. E. 595 (jury).

Michigan. — Woodin v. Durfee (1881) 46 Mich. 424, 9 N. W. 457 (jury); Zart v. Singer Sewing Mach. Co. (1910) 162 Mich. 387, 127 N. W. 272 (jury); Yonkers v. McKay (1915) 186 Mich. 203, 152 N. W. 1031, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 458 (jury).

Missouri. — Bryan v. Wear (1835) 4 Mo. 106 (jury); Gannon v. Laclede Gaslight Co. (1898) 145 Mo. 502, 43 L.R.A. 505, 46 S. W. 968, 47 S. W. 907 (jury); Hunter v. Wethington (1907) 205 Mo. 284, 103 S. W. 543, 12 Ann. Cas. 529 (court); Holzemer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1914) 261 Mo. 379, 169 S. W. 102 (jury); Staehlin v. Major (1917) — Mo. App. —, 199 S. W. 427 (jury); Quisenberry v. Stewart (1920) — Mo. —, 219 S. W. 625 (jury); Central Nat. Bank v. F. W. Drosten Jewelry Co. (1920) — Mo. App. —, 220 S. W. 511 (jury).

folk & N. B. Hosier Co. (1882) 36 N. J. Eq. 188 (court).

North Carolina.—Rogers v. Briley (1795) 2 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 256 (jury); Noland v. McCracken (1836) 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L. 594 (jury); American Nat. Bank v. Fountain (1908) 148 N. C. 590, 62 S. E. 738 (jury).

Oregon.—Wolf v. City R. Co. (1907) 50 Or. 67, 85 Pac. 620, 91 Pac. 460, 15 Ann. Cas. 1181 (jury).

Pennsylvania.—West Branch Bank v. Donaldson (1847) 6 Pa. 179 (jury); Reel v. Elder (1869) 62 Pa. 308, 1 Am. Rep. 414 (jury); Grambs v. Lynch (1884) 4 Pennyp. 243 (jury); Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Evans (1896) 176 Pa. 28, 34 Atl. 999 (jury); Lautner v. Kann (1898) 184 Pa. 334, 39 Atl. 55 (jury); Bartlett v. Rothschild (1906) 214 Pa. 421, 63 Atl. 1080 (jury); Carter v. Henderson (1909) 224 Pa. 319, 78 Atl. 554 (jury); Newman v. Romanelli (1914) 244 Pa. 147, 90 Atl. 556 (jury); Nydes v. Royal Neighbors (1917) 256 Pa. 381, 100 Atl. 944 (jury); McGlinn Distilling Co. v. Derwin (1918) 260 Pa. 414, 103 Atl. 872 (jury).

Texas.—Cheatham v. Riddle (1854) 12 Tex. 112 (jury); Sovereign Camp W. W. v. Jackson (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 1137 (jury).

England. — Lacey v. Forrester (1835) 3 Dowl. P. C. 668, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 59, 150 Eng. Reprint, 25 (jury).

This principle has illustration in cases holding that the presiding judge has no right to withdraw from the jury the testimony of a witness as unworthy of belief. Waters v. Davis (1906) 76 C. C. A. 444, 145 Fed. 912; Campbell v. Mobile & O. R. Co. (1915) 162 Ky. 58, 171 S. W. 1002; Holzemer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1914) 261 Mo. 379, 169 S. W. 102.

So in cases holding it proper to send the case to the jury to determine the truth of the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses. Tracey v. Phelps (1885) 23 Blatchf. 71, 22 Fed. 634; William J. Lemp Brewing Co. v. Mantz (1913) 120 Md. 176, 87 Atl. 814; Yonkus v. McKay (1915) 186 Mich. 203, 152 N. W. 1031, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 458; Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Evans (1896) 176 Pa. 28, 34 Atl. 999; Newman v. Romanelli (1914) 244 Pa. 147, 90 Atl. 556.

So in cases holding it proper to send the case to the jury to determine the truth of the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant's witnesses.

Massachusetts.—Harding v. Brooks (1827) 5 Pick. 244; Lindenbaum v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1908) 197 Mass. 314, 84 N. E. 129; Ryan v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1908) 200 Mass. 188, 86 N. E. 310; Whitten v. Haverhill (1910) 204 Mass. 95, 90 N. E. 409.

Minnesota.—Schwartz v. Germania L. Ins. Co. (1895) 21 Minn. 215.

Missouri.—Gannon v. Laclede Gaslight Co. (1898) 145 Mo. 502, 43 L.R.A. 505, 46 S. W. 968, 47 S. W. 907; Hunter v. Wethington (1907) 205 Mo. 284, 103 S. W. 543, 12 Ann. Cas. 529; Quisenberry v. Stewart (1920) — Mo. —, 219 S. W. 625.

Pennsylvania.—West Branch Bank v. Donaldson (1847) 6 Pa. 179; Reel v. Elder (1869) 62 Pa. 308, 1 Am. Rep. 414; Lautner v. Kann (1898) 184 Pa. 334, 39 Atl. 55; Carter v. Henderson (1909) 224 Pa. 319, 73 Atl. 554; Nydes v. Royal Neighbors (1917) 256 Pa. 381, 100 Atl. 944.

So in cases holding it error to direct a verdict on the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses. Oleson v. Hendrickson (1861) 12 Iowa, 222; Charleston Ins. & T. Co. v. Corner (1844) 2 Gill. (Md.) 410; Giles v. Giles (1910) 204 Mass. 383, 90 N. E. 595; Woodin v. Durfee (1881) 46 Mich.

424, 9 N. W. 457 (claimant's witness); Bryan v. Wear (1835) 4 Mo. 106; Staehlin v. Major (1917) — Mo. App. —, 199 S. W. 427; Central Nat. Bank v. F. W. Drosten Jewelry Co. (1920) — Mo. App. —, 220 S. W. 511; Bartlett v. Rothschild (1906) 214 Pa. 421, 63 Atl. 1030; McGlinn Distilling Co. v. Dervin (1918) 260 Pa. 414, 108 Atl. 872.

Or in cases holding it error for the court to assume in his charge as true the uncontradicted testimony of a witness for the plaintiff. American Nat. Bank v. Fountain (1908) 148 N. C. 590, 62 S. E. 738.

So in cases holding it error to direct a verdict for the defendant on the uncontradicted testimony of his witnesses. Grambs v. Lynch (1884) 4 Pennyp. (Pa.) 243.

"A jury is not bound to accept as true the literal statements of witnesses, but may reject the same, when inconsistent with reason or with facts which have been duly established to their satisfaction." Macon Consol. Street R. Co. v. Barnes (1901) 113 Ga. 212, 38 S. E. 756.

In Shultz v. Wall (1890) 134 Pa. 262, 8 L.R.A. 97, 19 Am. St. Rep. 686, 19 Atl. 742, the court said that juries "cannot base verdicts on surmise or conjecture without evidence, but they are not bound to believe an incredible story because no witness contradicts it."

The jury are not compelled to believe uncontradicted testimony that is suspicious. Sovereign Camp, W. W. v. Jackson (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 1137.

"The law has no rule which the court may lay down in instructions to the jury that there is a presumption that an unimpeached witness has testified truly, and such instructions infringe upon the province of the jury to determine the credibility of the witnesses and the weight and value of their testimony." Chicago Union Traction Co. v. O'Brien (1906) 219 Ill. 303, 76 N. E. 341.

In Noland v. M'Cracken (1836) 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 594, it was held to be error to instruct the jury "that when a witness was heard by a jury, who was neither impeached nor contradicted, whose story was credible, and in whose manner there was nothing to shake their confidence, they were bound to believe him."

"The credibility of a witness is for the jury; and where the issue depends upon the facts the existence of which is not admitted, even though testified to by a credible witness who is unchallenged, the question is for the jury." Second Nat. Bank v. Smith (1917) 91 N. J. L. 531, 1 A.L.R. 470, 103 Atl. 862.

"If a statement is merely inconsistent with reasonable probabilities, and the circumstances are such that it might be believed by a jury, the court could not ignore it on a motion to direct a verdict." Chicago City R. Co. v. Hagenback (1907) 228 Ill. 290, 81 N. E. 1014.

The jury "are not bound to believe a witness whose testimony is inconsistent with the circumstances, although there is no other testimony bearing on the same question." Zart v. Singer Sewing Mach. Co. (1910) 162 Mich. 387, 127 N. W. 272.

In Yeager v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1909) 148 Iowa, 231, 123 N. W. 974, the court said: "Of course, the testimony of a witness is not to be rejected arbitrarily; but it may be rejected when the witness has been impeached in any of the recognized methods, or owing to the inherent improbability of his testimony and the manner and appearance of the witness while testifying, and when so rejected the jury is under no obligation to undertake to reconcile other testimony therewith in order to uphold the credibility of the impeached witness."

Where the witness's own statements create an impression of the improbability of the facts to which he testifies, his evidence may be disregarded. Beatty v. Beatty (1913) 151 Ky. 547, 162 S. W. 540.

"It does not follow, because a witness is not directly contradicted by another witness, that his testimony is undisputed. His manner on the stand, his lapses of memory, the improbability of his story, its self-contradiction, the evidence afforded by circumstances, all these things, or some of them, may rightly lead the jury to reject his testimony." Smucker v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1898) 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 529.

A jury is not bound by uncontradicted testimony as against the other facts in the case. Logue v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1906) 102 Me. 34, 63 Atl. 522.

The jury is not absolutely bound by the testimony of a witness, although it is not contradicted by direct evidence, where the evidence itself indicates that it is unworthy of belief. Kennedy v. Modern Woodmen (1909) 243 Ill. 560, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 181, 90 N. E. 1084.

In reversing a judgment entered upon a directed verdict, the court, per Cooley, J., said: "The most of these facts the claimant insists are entirely undisputed on the evidence; and she claims that they establish beyond question the liability of Staley on the bond, and that the judge was at liberty to so instruct the jury. But the difficulty is that the facts were not conceded or beyond dispute: there was evidence of them which probably ought to have satisfied anyone to whom it was addressed; but evidence is for the jury, and the trial judge cannot draw conclusions for them. It is said that on some points there was no evidence of a conflicting nature; but that does not aid the claimant. A jury may disbelieve the most positive evidence, even when it stands uncontradicted; and the judge cannot take from them their right of judgment. If they return what he thinks is a perverse verdict, he may set it aside and order a new trial; but he cannot take upon himself their functions, as was done here." Wordin v. Durfee (1881) 46 Mich. 424, 9 N. W. 457.

In Lacey v. Forrester (1835) 3 Dowl. P. C. (Eng.) 668, the court refused to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff where the jury evidently declined to believe the defendant's uncontradicted witness. Abinger, C. B., said that as "the secondary distinctly left it to the jury upon the credit of the witness, we cannot grant a new trial, unless we are prepared to say that in every case where the jury disbelieve a witness we are bound to grant a new trial."

A typical illustration of the "double rule" may be found in Gorman v. Hand Brewing Co. (1907) 28 R. I. 180, 66 Atl. 209, when the court, in sustaining the jury, who evidently disbelieved one of the defendant's witnesses, said: "We have found no better statement of the principle under consideration than is made by Mitchell, J., in Anderson v. Liljengren (1892) 50 Minn. 3, 52 N. W. 219. He says: 'The rule undoubtedly is that, where the positive testimony of a witness is uncontradicted and unimpeached, either by other positive testimony or by circumstantial evidence, either intrinsic or extrinsic, it cannot be disregarded, but must control the decision of the court or jury. But a witness may be contradicted by the facts he states as completely as by direct adverse testimony. A court or jury is not bound to accept it as true merely because there is no direct testimony contradicting it, where it contains inherent improbabilities or contradictions, which alone, or in connection with other circumstances in evidence, satisfy them of its falsity.'"

In Blankman v. Vallejo (1860) 15 Cal. 639, the appellate court said, referring to the trial court as a trier of facts: "We do not understand that the credulity of a court must necessarily correspond with the vigor and positiveness with which a witness swears. A court may reject the most positive testimony, though the witness be not discredited by direct testimony impeaching him or contradicting his statements. The inherent improbability of a statement may deny to it all claims to belief." Quoted and followed in Baker v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. (1889) 79 Cal. 34, 21 Pac. 357.

In Earle v. Norfolk & N. B. Hosiery Co. (1882) 36 N. J. Eq. 188, affirmed in (1883) 37 N. J. Eq. 315, the court, in dismissing a bill, said of a witness for the complainants: "His story is so inherently improbable, and the character he has written for himself in this case renders him an object of such extreme suspicion, that I am unwilling by any judgment to deprive any person of his rights, especially rights evidenced by a solemn deed, on testimony so improbable and unsatisfactory."

In an equity case the Connecticut court said: "The trial court is at liberty to discredit any witness or multitude of witnesses, if it deems that it has cause to do so." Allis v. Hall (1903) 76 Conn. 322, 56 Atl. 637.

Where apparently the case was tried without a jury, it was held that the trial court had the right to disregard the testimony of a witness for the defendant on account of his manner and his statements. Donohue v. Henry (1855) 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 162, affirming a judgment for the plaintiff.

The court is not bound to believe testimony so improbable on its face as to be unworthy of belief. Le Brun v. Romero (1907) 3 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 225.

In Busigo v. Jordan (1914) 20 P. R. R. 274, the court said: "The statements of Emiliano Nazario are too vague and indefinite, and, as we have seen, the court gave no credence to these and other statements. It is not sufficient ground to reverse a judgment merely because a witness is uncontradicted, unless his testimony is strong and convincing."

c. Illustrations.

Whether or not the plaintiff has proved his case in forcible entry and detainer is a question for the jury, although all the defendant's evidence has been ruled out. Oleson v. Hendrickson (1861) 12 Iowa, 222.

In ejectment the uncontradicted testimony of adverse possession on the part of the defendant does not make a defense; it is for the trier of facts, which here was the court. Hunter v. Withington (1907) 205 Mo. 284, 108 S. W. 543, 12 Ann. Cas. 529, reversing judgment for plaintiff on other grounds.

Where the agent of the defendant insurance company and his brother testified to what would have been a good defense, that his instructions from the defendant were not to deliver policies unless the insured was in good health, it was held that the jury were justified in finding a verdict for the plaintiff, although such testimony was not contradicted or controlled by counter evidence. Schwartz v. Germania L. Ins. Co. (1875) 21 Minn. 215.

The defense to an action on a life insurance policy was that the premium receipt three years old had been given by mistake, in the absence of payment. The jury found for the plaintiff, but, on appeal, the court reversed the judgment on the ground that a verdict should have been directed for the defendant. But, on rehearing, the court sustained the verdict, concluding "that the testimony given by the witnesses in contradiction of the receipt is not reasonable and consistent; or, at least, when we can see that the jury could have regarded it as unreasonable." Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Click (1909) 93 Ark. 162, 124 S. W. 764.

In Rogers v. Briley (1795) 2 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 256, on an issue of devisavit vel non, the court charged the jury, referring to the testimony of an attesting witness who was the son of the legatee: "Though a fact may be positively sworn to by one or two witnesses, and though these witnesses may concur in many of the circumstances, the jury are not absolutely bound to believe the fact they swear to, if they have reason, either from the character of the witness, or the circumstances with regard to that case, to disbelieve them."

Where the plaintiff claimed that the seller to him of the bonds in suit was a bona fide purchaser, the court said: "The court refused to rule, as matter of law, that Post was a bona fide purchaser of the bonds, and left the question as one of fact to the jury. This was not error, because the jury were at liberty utterly to reject his testimony as incredible, although he was not impeached or contradicted by direct evidence. It was enough to authorize the jury to do this, that there was some intrinsic improbability in Post's narrative, and he had shown himself unworthy of credit by his attempt to falsify the transaction respecting the sale of the bonds made by him to the plaintiff." Tracy v. Phelps (1885) 23 Blatchf. 71, 22 Fed. 634.

While beyond the scope of this note, reference may be here made to Kuehne v. Malach (1918) 286 Ill. 120, 121 N. E. 391, where the only surviving attesting witness to a will contradicted the attestation clause and the will was refused probate. On appeal the circuit court admitted the will. In affirming this decision the supreme court said: "The argument of counsel for appellants that, as there was no positive testimony contradicting that of Bettendorf as to the execution of the will except the attestation clause, the circuit court was necessarily bound to follow the testimony of Bettendorf and refuse probate, we consider unsound. While it is true the general rule is that positive testimony of a witness, uncontradicted and unimpeached either by positive or uncontradicted evidence, cannot be disregarded, it is also true that there may be such an inherent improbability in the testimony of the witness as to induce the court or jury to disregard it, even in the absence of conflicting testimony. He may be contradicted by the facts he states as well as by adverse testimony, and there may be so many omissions in the account of the particular transactions, or in his own conduct, as to discredit his whole story. People v. Davis (1915) 269 Ill. 256, 110 N. E. 9, and cases there cited. A review of the testimony of Bettendorf, as found in the record, shows it to be so unreasonable and on its face so contradictory, even without the contradiction over his own signature, found in the attestation clause, that we believe it does not present the true facts in many particulars."

In an action for wrongful death, where testimony tending to show contributory negligence was somewhat contradicted, the court said: "The rule seems to be, as stated in 38 Cyc. 1570; namely, that a verdict will not be directed where the only person who could have contradicted the witness is dead." Clark v. Public Service Electric Co. (1914) 86 N. J. L. 144, 91 Atl. 83.

The court, when a trier of the facts, is not bound to believe incredible testimony as to a transaction with a decedent. Todd v. Sykes (1899) 97 Va. 143, 33 S. E. 517.

In McCormick v. Kampmann (1908) 102 Tex. 215, 115 S. W. 24, it was held that where the testimony of interested parties as to conversations with a deceased person has been received without objection, the jury is not bound to believe it.

In Re Bailey (1906) 98 N. Y. Supp. 725, also briefly reported in 111 App. Div. 909, where there was a trial by the court, it was said that where the only person who could directly dispute a witness is dead, close scrutiny should be given to the testimony and its probability.

In Hughes v. Davenport (1896) 1 App. Div. 182, 37 N. Y. Supp. 243, the court, in affirming a judgment on the report of a referee rejecting claims against the estate of a decedent, said: "The rule that a fact testified to by a disinterested witness who is not discredited, which is not in conflict with other evidence, is to be taken as legally established, and cannot be disregarded by the court or jury, is not applicable to this class of cases. The person who could contradict the witness, if his testimony is false, is not living, and the courts have uniformly enforced the rule that claims withheld during the life of an alleged debtor, and sought to be enforced after his death, must be established by satisfactory proof. . . . But the rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a disinterested witness is to be believed, is always subject to the limitation that the evidence is not improbable."

But in Colorado & S. R. Co. v. Thomas (1805) 33 Colo. 517, 70 L.R.A. 681, 81 Pac. 801, 3 Ann. Cas. 700, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 316, it was held that the jury had no right to disregard the uncontradicted testimony of the disinterested witnesses of the accident which killed the plaintiff's intestate. See also Mackey v. New York C. R. Co. (1858) 27 Barb. (N. Y.) 523, infra, IV.

And see, as holding that the jury have no right to disregard the evidence of defendant's employees in actions for killing the plaintiff's intestate, cases cited infra, V. d (2).

In a few jurisdictions there has been an effort to make a definite rule that the credibility of uncontradicted witnesses, at least in the first instance, is for the jury. This effort seems to have been effectual in Massachusetts. Lindenbaum v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1908) 197 Mass. 314, 84 N. E. 129; Ryan v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1908) 200 Mass. 188, 86 N. E. 310; Whitten v. Haverhill (1910) 204 Mass. 95, 90 N. E. 409; Giles v. Giles (1910) 204 Mass. 383, 90 N. E. 595; Cain v. Southern Massachusetts Teleph. Co. (1914) 219 Mass. 504, 107 N. E. 380; Morrison v. Boston Ins. Co. (1920) — Mass. —, 125 N. E. 698. So for the judge when there is no jury. Bearse v. Mabie (1908) 198 Mass. 451, 84 N. E. 1015.

In Ryan v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1908) 200 Mass. 188, 86 N. E. 310, supra, it was held that the defendant's request to the effect that, there being uncontradicted testimony on the part of the defendant that the loom was started by the act of a fellow servant, the plaintiff could not recover, was properly refused, for the reason that the jury may have disbelieved this testimony, even though uncontradicted.

"In the absence of a presumption or of an admission by the other party as to facts or evidence, a verdict cannot be ordered in favor of a party who has the burden of proof, and relies on evidence introduced by himself." Whitten v. Haverhill (1910) 204 Mass. 95, 90 N. E. 409, supra.

"Where a proposition is only to be established by testimony of witnesses, the judge cannot properly direct a jury to decide that the fact is proved affirmatively by testimony. It is for the jury to say whether the witnesses are entitled to credit. . . . We know of no case in this commonwealth in which it has been determined that a jury can be directed to return a verdict, upon the oral testimony of witnesses, in favor of a party who has the burden of proving the facts to which they have testified. This direction [of a verdict] was erroneous and the exception must be sustained." Giles v.

In this connection it is of interest to refer to an early Massachusetts case on this subject. In Harding v. Brooks (1827) 5 Pick. 244, where the defendant in slander proved by a witness a statement of the plaintiff which justified the words used by the defendant, the court, in nevertheless sustaining a verdict for the plaintiff, said: "The general rule is, that when a fact is sworn to by a witness of fair fame, and who is uncontradicted by other testimony, or any circumstances in which he may stand, the jury are not at liberty to disregard his testimony. The rule, and an exception to it, are laid down in the case of Wait v. M'Neil (1811) 7 Mass. 261. We think a qualification of the rule may grow out of the nature or subject-matter of the testimony. If it relate to declarations or conversations happening some time before the witness is called to testify, and the precise words are important to the point in issue, and the witness, though confident, is not positive in his testimony, the jury are at liberty to refuse such entire credit as may be necessary to satisfy them that the words in question are fully proved."

The same rule is laid down in Maryland. Thus: "The sufficiency of evidence to satisfy a jury, or the circumstance that it is all on one side, does not authorize the court to direct the jury that it proves the fact. They have the power to refuse their credit, and no action of the court should control the exercise of their admitted right to weigh the credibility of evidence." Charleston Ins. & T. Co. v. Corner (1844) 2 Gill, 410.

In William J. Lemp Brewing Co. v. Mantz (1913) 120 Md. 176, 87 Atl. 814, the court, in reversing a judgment for the defendant on other grounds, said that with the burden "on the plaintiff, the claimant, the case at bar could not, at the instance of the plaintiff, have been withdrawn from the jury, for although the evidence adduced by the plaintiff was practically uncontradicted, the rule in this state is that the court cannot assume the existence of facts and take away from the jury the finding of the same. In the case of Calvert Bank v. Katz (1905) 102 Md. 56, 61 Atl. 411, the court said: "Doubtless the jury would have found these facts according to the testimony, but the sufficiency of the evidence to satisfy the jury, or the circumstance that it was all on one side, does not authorize the court to direct the jury that it proves a fact."

The definite rule that the credibility of witnesses is for the jury is supported in Pennsylvania by the great weight of authority. West Branch Bank v. Donaldson (1847) 6 Pa. 179; Reel v. Elder (1869) 62 Pa. 308, 1 Am. Rep. 414; Grambs v. Lynch (1884) 4 Pennyp. 243; Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Evans (1896) 176 Pa. 28, 34 Atl. 999; Lautner v. Kann (1898) 184 Pa. 334, 39 Atl. 55; Bartlett v. Rothschild (1906) 214 Pa. 421, 63 Atl. 1080; Carter v. Henderson & Co. (1909) 224 Pa. 319, 73 Atl. 554; Newman v. Romanelli (1914) 244 Pa. 147, 90 Atl. 556; Nydes v. Royal Neighbors (1917) 256 Pa. 381, 100 Atl. 944; McGlinn Distilling Co. v. Dervin (1918) 260 Pa. 414, 103 Atl. 872.

In West Branch Bank v. Donaldson (1847) 6 Pa. 179, supra, the court said: "The principal exception to the charge is the submission to the jury of a question of fact, the evidence of which is said to be all on one side. But the jury were to judge of the credibility of the witnesses, and might possibly have disbelieved every word of their testimony; in which event it would have been their duty to find against the parties who were to maintain the affirmative of the issue."

"However clear and indisputable may be the proof when it depends upon oral testimony, it is nevertheless the province of the jury to decide, under instructions from the court, as to the law applicable to the facts, and subject to the salutary power of the court to award a new trial if they should deem the verdict contrary to the weight of the evidence." Reel v. Elder (1869) 62 Pa. 308, 1 Am. Rep. 414, supra.

"The credibility of a witness is for the jury, and they are not bound to accept his statements because he is unimpeached and uncontradicted by other witnesses. He may impeach and contradict himself on the witness stand, or the jury may believe that he is honestly mistaken. His manner, the motive or bias, the inherent improbability of his story, or the want of accurate recollection, may discredit his testimony and justify a jury in disregarding it altogether. The question is for the jury, and not for the court." Lautner v. Kann (1898) 184 Pa. 334, 39 Atl. 55, supra.

In reversing a judgment for the plaintiff upon a directed verdict the court said: "Where plaintiff's claim rests upon oral testimony, the credibility of the witnesses is always a matter to be passed on by the jury, and the court cannot relieve them of it." Bartlett v. Rothschild (1906) 214 Pa. 421, 63 Atl. 1080, supra.

"Where the proof in support of a plaintiff's claim is by oral testimony, it is the province of the jury to decide under instructions by the court." Newman v. Romanelli (1914) 244 Pa. 147, 90 Atl. 556, supra.

But in Lonzer v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1900) 196 Pa. 610, 46 Atl. 937, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 335, the court set aside a verdict for the plaintiff where the jury had disregarded testimony of the defendant's employees to the effect that a killed employee knew of a certain notice, and that the same had been duly posted, and said: "When the testimony is not in itself improbable, is not at variance with any proved or admitted facts, or with ordinary experience, and comes from witnesses whose candor there is no apparent ground for doubting, the jury is not at liberty to indulge in a capricious disbelief. If they do so, it is the duty of the court to set the verdict aside."

And it was held in another case, where there was suggestive if not corroborating written evidence, and the uncontradicted, unimpeached testimony of disinterested witnesses for the defendant's defense was that the negligence claimed was that of an independent contractor, that the jury would not be permitted capriciously to disbelieve their testimony. Walters v. American Bridge Co. (1902) 234 Pa. 7, 82 Atl. 1103, where judgment for the defendant was ordered notwithstanding a verdict for the plaintiff.

In Missouri some of the cases lay down the rigid rule, but the result of the matter seems in doubt. It was held in Bryan v. Wear (1835) 4 Mo. 106, that it was error for the court to tell the jury they must believe witnesses' uncontradicted testimony. In Gannon v. Laclede Gaslight Co. (1898) 145 Mo. 502, 43 L.R.A. 505, 46 S. W. 968, 47 S. W. 907, it was held that where the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case in negligence, and the defendant puts in a defense of uncontradicted testimony, sufficient if true, the plaintiff is entitled to have the case sent to the jury.

In Staehlin v. Major (1917) — Mo. App. —, 199 S. W. 427, it was said where the "allegations of the petition were denied by the answer, and the burden of proof rested upon plaintiff, who, to make out his case, relied upon oral testimony not admitted to be true," that the trial court was without "power to peremptorily direct a verdict in favor of the party having the burden of proof is a rule of decision firmly established in this state. Such has been the law of this state since the decision of the supreme court in the early case of Bryan v. Wear, supra."

But in Reichenbach v. Ellerbe (1898) 115 Mo. 588, 22 S. W. 578, it was held that a jury had no right to disregard the uncontradicted evidence of the defendant's witness. And the existence of the double rule seems recognized in Hammett v. Wabash R. Co. (1908) 128 Mo. App. 1, 106 S. W. 1106, where the court said, in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff after trial by the court: "The question was one for the court, sitting as a jury, whose duty it was to weigh the testimony and to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses, but in doing so had no right to arbitrarily reject competent and credible evidence. We are justified in presuming that the court, in weighing the testimony, was not satisfied that the evidence of the [defendant's] witness Loomis, which was mainly a detail of what was contained in certain memorandums, was accurate and was of such a reliable character as ought to prevail against plaintiff prima facie case. Besides, the court may not have given full credit to the said witness, as he was somewhat contradictory in his statements. It is held in Adams County Bank v. Hainline (1896) 67 Mo. App. 483: 'In a case where the evidence so far as appears by the record to be uncontradicted, and the trial court refuses the peremptory instructions, the appellate court will assume that the trial court saw something in the manner of the witnesses to impair their testimony, and will not interfere with the verdict.'"

In Baird v. Wilks (1920) — Mo. App. —, 218 S. W. 918, in affirming a judgment upon a verdict for the defendant, the court said: "Where plaintiff's right to recover is put in issue, and the evidence in his favor comes from interested witnesses, and leaves a well-grounded suspicion as to its truthfulness, or is such that the jury has a right to say that it is inherently weak or improbable, then the jury has a right to disbelieve and reject such evidence and find for defendant. In so holding we do not go as far in upholding the right of a jury to disbelieve and reject uncontradicted evidence as have the courts in some of the cases cited."

IV. Cases favoring uncontradicted testimony.

a. In general.

There are many cases illustrating the principle that the triers of facts, whether court or jury, have no right arbitrarily to reject the uncontradicted testimony of a witness. This has been held in cases where the court was the trier of facts. United States v. 53 Boxes of Havana Sugar (1870) 2 Bond, 346, Fed. Cas. No. 15,098; Peter v. Wright (1855) 6 Ind. 183; Lussee v. Hays (1870) 22 La. Ann. 307; Second Nat. Bank v. Donald (1894) 56 Minn. 491, 58 N. W. 269; Newton v. Pope (1823) 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 109; Spring v. Millington (1904) 44 Misc. 624, 90 N. Y. Supp. 152; Miller's Will (1907) 49 Or. 452, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1051, 90 Pac. 1002, 14 Ann. Cas. 277.

In Dolhoude v. Lemoine (1880) 32 La. Ann. 251, which is not clearly reported, the court declined to disregard testimony of highly improbable or eccentric conduct.

In Newton v. Pope (1823) 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 109, supra, the court said, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for injuring the plaintiff's horse in driving him: "The justice had no right, entirely and arbitrarily, to disregard the testimony of two unimpeached witnesses, on the ground 'that he was satisfied that they were biased in favor of the defendant.' There was no attempt to impeach their characters. The facts sworn to by them were not contradicted by any other witnesses, either directly or indirectly; nor was there any intrinsic improbability in the narration given by them. It is difficult to establish a rule which shall regulate and limit the discretion of a court or jury, in the degree of credit to be given to the testimony of different witnesses. Much must depend on the particular circumstances of the case. But there is no difficulty in saying that where (as in this case) the witness is unimpeached, the facts sworn to by him, uncontradicted, either directly or indirectly by other witnesses, and there is no intrinsic improbability in the relation given by him, neither a court nor jury can, in the exercise of a sound discretion, disregard his testimony. It is no less the duty of a court than of a jury to decide according to evidence. But it is mockery to talk of evidence if it is discretionary with the tribunal to which it is addressed to disregard it, upon the vague suggestion, unsupported by proof, of the bias of the witness."

In Peter v. Wright (1855) 6 Ind. 183, supra, the court said, in reversing a decree which dismissed a bill in chancery: "To justify the rejection of evidence, it must be either contradicted, or improbable in itself, or obnoxious according to some established legal mode of testing truth."

In Lussee v. Hays (1870) 22 Ia. Ann. 307, supra, the appellate court reversed a judgment for the defendant, as it declined to "ignore the positive sworn statements of five witnesses whose veracity has not been impeached."

In a garnishee case, where there was written corroborating evidence to the disregarded, uncontradicted testimony of the defendant and the claimant, the court, in reversing, said: "The plaintiff does not claim that, if the facts were as thus testified to, this money would be defendant's, and not Magraw's; but its contention is that the court was not bound to accept the testimony of defendant and Magraw as true, although there was no direct evidence contradicting it; that it contained such inherent improbabilities as to furnish a reasonable ground for concluding that it was not true. While recognizing the correctness of the general rule invoked, and the propriety of its liberal application, especially in cases of alleged frauds, yet it must be remembered that in all cases the positive testimony of an otherwise unimpeached witness can only be disregarded when its improbability or inconsistency furnishes a reasonable ground for doing so, and this improbability or inconsistency must appear from facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence in the case. It cannot be arbitrarily disregarded by either court or jury, for reasons resting wholly in their own minds, and not based upon anything appearing on the trial." Second Nat. Bank v. Donald (1894) 56 Minn. 491, 58 N. W. 269, supra. See also the quotation from Miller's Will (1907) 49 Or. 452, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1051, 90 Pac. 1002, 14 Ann. Cas. 277, supra, I.

In Spring v. Millington (1904) 44 Misc. 624, 90 N. Y. Supp. 152, supra, the court reversed a justice's judgment for the plaintiff, suing for balance due on a contract for work done, for the reason that the justice absolutely overlooked the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant and his witness that the work was improperly done.

In Moyle v. Hocking (1897) 10 Colo. App. 446, 51 Pac. 533, the court, in a case tried without a jury, reversed a judgment for the defendant where the only evidence produced was that of a witness for the plaintiff, who testified to a contract and its performance.

So the jury has no right arbitrarily to reject the uncontradicted testimony of a witness.

Canada.—Victor Mfg. Co. v. Regina Trading Co. (1913) 6 Sask. L. R. 302.

In Levy v. Cox (1886) 22 Fla. 546, supra, ejectment, the court reversed a judgment for the defendant, stating that "the jury, it is true, are the judges of the evidence, but when a plaintiff makes out a plain and uncontradicted case, and his witnesses are unimpeached, they have no right to disregard the evidence."

In Mitchell v. Brewster (1862) 28 Ill. 163, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, said of a witness for the defendant: "The only question would seem to be, was the jury justified in disregarding the testimony of this witness? He was not impeached in the least, in any way, so far as this record shows. Indeed, there is no intimation that he is not a truthful man. Can a jury, from mere caprice, entirely disregard the testimony of a witness unimpeached in any way? This they cannot lawfully do, although they are the judges of the credibility of witnesses. They must judge of that fact, as of any other in the case, from evidence. They cannot disregard the testimony of a witness without some cause. They must have some grounds for disbelieving him before they are authorized to do so. They must exercise their judgment, and not their will, when passing upon the credibility of a witness."

In Card v. Fowler (1899) 120 Mich. 646, 79 N. W. 925, the court thought the trial court ought to have given the following requested charge: "You are instructed that the uncontroverted testimony of a credible witness ought not to be lightly disregarded, and you have no right to substitute a fanciful hypothesis to account for facts which are explained by direct testimony. Your verdict should be based on the evidence, and that alone; and it is the duty of the jury to harmonize all proven facts, if possible, with the conditions found surrounding the case, and the circumstances proven to have existed at the time of the occurrence."

In Campbell v. Canadian Northern R. Co. (1914) 124 Minn. 245, 144 N. W. 772, the court said: "The discretion of the jury in the matter of credibility does not, however, warrant the disregard of the positive testimony of an unimpeached witness, unless its improbability furnishes a reasonable ground for so doing, which must ap-

b. Illustrations.

In Sleeper v. Des Moines (1903) — Iowa, —, 93 N. W. 585, the court affirmed an order granting a new trial after a verdict for the defendant where the jury had disregarded the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff and his witnesses as to the nature and extent of his injury.

Where the only evidence was the testimony of the plaintiff's daughter in favor of her father, and the jury found for the defendant, the court ordered a new trial. Sweany v. Bledsoe (1848) 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 612.

Similarly, in Dunbier v. Day (1882) 12 Neb. 596, 41 Am. Rep. 772, 12 N. W. 109, the court reversed a judgment for the defendant when the jury disregarded the uncontradicted evidence of the plaintiff, his wife and daughter, that the money sued for was in his possession after he had entered the defendant's inn as a guest.

Where, in a suit on a benefit insurance certificate, the uncontradicted evidence shows an assessment notice to the insured and his failure to pay, thus forfeiting the insurance, a verdict for the plaintiff cannot stand. Reichenbach v. Ellerbe (1883) 115 Mo. 588, 22 S. W. 573, supra.

Where the defendant in an action on a promissory note proved by the uncontradicted testimony of himself and an uncle that he was not of age when the note was made, but the jury found for the plaintiff, a new trial was ordered. Algeo v. Duncan (1868) 39 N. Y. 313, supra.

Compare cases cited infra, V. a, 2.

In Mackey v. New York C. R. Co. (1858) 27 Barb. (N. Y.) 528, it was held that the jury had no right to disregard the uncontradicted testimony of a witness that he warned the plaintiff's intestate, killed at a railway crossing, of the approach of the train which killed him.

Where the defense to a check, that it was given for a gambling loss, was proved without contradiction by the defendant and a disinterested witness, it was held not necessary to send the case to the jury, and their verdict for the plaintiff was set aside. Cunningham v. Gans (1894) 79 Hun, 434, 29 N. Y. Supp. 979.

The court set aside a verdict for the plaintiff where scales at first inaccurate were afterwards moved and tested and found to be correct, saying: "Even if the jury should have believed the testimony that the scales were untrue while they were located in front of the store of Gray, they are not authorized to reject the testimony of the weight after the scales were removed and placed where they were afterwards legally tested and found to be accurate." Kelly v. Saugerties (1906) 110 App. Div. 561, 97 N. Y. Supp. 177.

In Victor Mfg. Co. v. Regina Trading Co. (1913) 6 Sask. L. R. 302, it was held as to a counterclaim that the jury were not justified in disbelieving the uncontradicted evidence of the defendant's witness.

It is on the principle that the jury may not disregard uncontradicted testimony that the court in such cases has been sustained in ordering the result. Kesterson v. Hays (1919) — Ark. —, 209 S. W. 721; Brown v. Petersen (1905) 25 App. D. C. 359, 4 Ann. Cas. 980; Johnson v. Buffalo Center State Bank (1907) 134 Iowa, 731, 112 N. W. 165 (verdict directed for plaintiff); BOUDEMAN v. ARNOLD (reported herewith) 789; McDermott v. Third Ave. R. Co. (1887) 44 Hun (N. Y.) 107 (case dismissed on uncontradicted testimony for defendant); Davis v. Hardy (1827) 6 Barn. & C. 225, 108 Eng. Reprint, 436, 9 Dowl. & R. 380, 5 L. J. K. B. 91, 30 Revised Rep. 306.

The court was sustained in taking from the jury the question of the ownership of the property for the conversion of which the plaintiff claimed damages, on the testimony of the plaintiff and three other witnesses, where the defendant introduced no testimony on that issue, but attacked the plaintiff's credibility. Kesterson v. Hays (Ark.) supra.

In Johnson v. Buffalo Center State Bank (1907) 134 Iowa, 731, 112 N. W. 165, in affirming a judgment on a verdict directed for the plaintiff, the court said: "The rule in this state seems to be that where the evidence in favor of the party having the burden of proof on an issue is in no way contradicted or its credibility affected by impeachment, the court may assume the fact relied upon to be proven, and need not submit the question to the jury, for a verdict against such evidence would be set aside."

In affirming a judgment entered upon a verdict directed by the court in favor of a claimant of property seized under an execution, the court said: "Undoubtedly the case was not above suspicion as to some understanding between Petersen and Hood; but that understanding may have been entirely proper and legitimate, and it has long since been well established in our law that suspicion is not proof and cannot be allowed to take the place of proof. The appellant's contention would require that every case of uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony should be submitted to a jury, when there is no countervailing testimony. But this is not the law. The law is that positive testimony uncontradicted, and not inherently improbable, is prima facie evidence of the fact which it seeks to establish, and the jury is not at liberty to disregard it." Brown v. Petersen (1905) 25 App. D. C. 359, 4 Ann. Cas. 980.

In Davis v. Hardy (1827) 6 Barn. & C. 225, 108 Eng. Reprint, 436, the court approved the decision of the trial court in ordering a nonsuit in a case of malicious prosecution, on the uncontradicted evidence of a witness for the defendant, showing probable cause. Abbott, Ch. J., said: "Where a witness is unimpeached in his general character, and uncontradicted by testimony on the other side, and there is no want of probability in the facts which he relates, I think that a judge is not bound to leave his credit to the jury, but to consider the facts he states as proved, and to act upon them accordingly." Bayley, J., said: "If there is nothing in the demeanor of a witness, or in the story he tells, to impeach his credit, and he is not contradicted by testimony on the other side, it is not a case for a jury to deliberate upon. If the case had been submitted to the jury, and they had disbelieved this witness, I think that we should have been bound to send the case down to a new trial."

1. In general.

There are many cases illustrating the principle that the testimony of an interested witness, though uncontradicted, is for the triers of facts, whether court or jury, who are not bound thereby.

2. Court as trier of facts.

This principle has had frequent illustration where the court was the trier of the facts.

Examples may be given in the case of the pilot, or the master and pilot of a vessel in collision (The Dauntless (1903) 121 Fed. 420; The Helen R. Cooper (1870) 7 Blatchf. 378, Fed. Cas. C. 541); and, in equity cases, Smyth v. Oliver (1857) 31 Ala. 39; Vreeland v. Vreeland (1891) 48 N. J. Eq. 56, 21 Atl. 627; Harris v. Barrett (1909) 75 N. J. Eq. 386, 72 Atl. 956; Keene v. Behan (1905) 40 Wash. 505, 82 Pac. 884.

The court is not bound to hold that a father contracted to give his son certain land when the only direct testimony in an action of the son against the father's estate is that of the son's wife. All the circumstances are to be considered. Bremer v. Haag (1911) 151 Iowa, 449, 131 N. W. 667.

The trial court is not required to believe the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant that he was an infant. Levy v. Abramsohn (1903) 39 Misc. 781, 81 N. Y. Supp. 344; Waterman v. Waterman (1903) 42 Misc. 195, 85 N. Y. Supp. 377; Lovell v. Davis (1892) 52 Mo. App. 342.

So, as to the uncontradicted testimony of the defendants and their mother to the same effect. Garbarsky v. Simkin (1901) 86 Misc. 195, 73 N. Y. Supp. 199. Compare Algeo v. Duncan (1868) 39 N. Y. 313, supra, IV. b; Union Bank v. Mandel (1910) 139 App. Div. 684, 124 N. Y. Supp. 459, infra, V. d, 2.

While without the scope of this annotation, it may be noted that in affirming the judgment, where the referee disregarded the plaintiff's evidence of value of hotel furniture, etc., the court said: "Appellant testified that the property, though it had been in use in a hotel from one to five years, was worth as much as when new, and his values were put upon that basis. The evidence was clear, to be sure, but clearly outside the realms of all reasonable probabilities." Bourda v. Jones (1901) 110 Wis. 52, 85 N. W. 671.

"The court or jury has the right, in view of the interest of the witness, to disregard his evidence, as not entitled to credit. The credibility of the witness in such a case is to be determined by the court or jury." Blount v. Medbery (1908) 16 S. D. 562, 94 N. W. 423.

In reversing a judgment in an equitable action the court said: "Respondent is an interested party; hence, in weighing the testimony, we are not compelled to accept his statements, if they do not bear the stamp of credibility, even though uncontradicted." Keene v. Behan (1905) 40 Wash. 505, 82 Pac. 884.

In sustaining a judgment for the defendant after a trial by the court without a jury, the court said: "It is a well-established principle of law that neither courts nor jurors are bound by the uncontradicted testimony of an interested party when such testimony, upon being carefully weighed, does not commend itself as worthy of belief. If, by reason of improbable and inconsistent statements, the testimony of an interested party appears to be lacking in the element of truthfulness, courts and jurors may, in their discretion, reject the same." Gosline v. Dryfoos (1907) 45 Wash. 396, 88 Pac. 634. Quoted in J. S. Brown & Bros. Mercantile Co. v. Sherrod (1909) 53 Wash. 132, 101 Pac. 481.

In Zimmerman v. Bannon (1898) 101 Wis. 407, 77 N. W. 735, where the witness was a party, the court said: "A court is not bound to accept a statement as true because there is no direct testimony contradicting it. It may be inherently improbable, or it may be impeached by the attendant circumstances. Courts are never bound to accept the statement of a witness which is against all reasonable probability."

In Alexander v. Blackman (1906) 26 App. D. C. 541 (a patent case), the court said of interested witnesses: "We shall follow the rule laid down by this court in Beals v. Finkenbinder

(1897) 12 App. D. C. 23, 29: 'In weighing testimony we are not bound to believe a particular fact, testified to by one or more witnesses, simply because they may not have been directly contradicted therein, or impeached generally by evidence tending to show a want of reputation for veracity. The inherent probability or improbability of such a fact is to be tested by the unquestioned circumstances that surround the main transaction or occurrence, as well as "by the ordinary laws that govern human conduct." Atlantic Works v. Brady (1883) 107 U. S. 192, 203, 27 L. ed. 438, 442, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225; Telephone Cases (1888) 126 U. S. 567, 21 L. ed. 1000, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 778.'

In Harris v. Barrett (1909) 75 N. J. Eq. 386, 72 Atl. 956, the court said: "The sole question that I paused to consider after the trial and upon which I have taken the briefs of counsel, is whether, in view of the fact that Harris and Barrett each swore to that which would lead to a contrary decision, I was bound to take their testimony upon points which the defendant was not able to contradict. I have reached the conclusion that I am not so bound. Without attempting to formulate a doctrine, I find that a trier of facts must be left free to believe or not to believe testimony which is subject to question."

3. Jury.

So the principle has been often applied in the case of trial by jury.

It is upon the same principle that it is held to be error to direct a verdict for a party on his own testimony, though uncontradicted. Moore v. Robinson (1903) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 75 S. W. 890.

In Massachusetts it is the modern rule that the jury may disbelieve uncontradicted testimony; a fortiori, the testimony of a party. Sullivan v. Old Colony Street R. Co. (1908) 200 Mass. 303, 86 N. E. 511; O'Connell v. Casey (1910) 206 Mass. 520, 92 N. E. 804.

It may be noted that in Wait v. M'Neil (1911) 7 Mass. 261, the jury were sustained in refusing to believe the son of the defendant, who was not impeached.

In Sonnentheil v. Christian Moerlein Brewing Co. (1898) 172 U. S. 402, 43 L. ed. 493, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233, where the jury found against the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff's witness, the court, in holding it proper to submit the question to the jury, said: "While the jury has no right to arbitrarily disregard the positive testimony of unimpeached and uncontradicted witnesses . . . the very courts that lay down this rule qualify it by saying the mere fact that the witness is interested in the result of the suit is deemed sufficient to require the credibility of his testimony to be submitted to the jury as a question of fact."

In a negligence case the court said of the plaintiff: "The jury were not bound to accept his testimony, even though uncontradicted, as to any fact militating against his own prudence. A jury may properly reject any uncorroborated statement of a party to the action, even though there is no controverted testimony." Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cobleigh (1897) 24 C. C. A. 342, 51 U. S. App. 15, 78 Fed. 784.

Where the trial court refused to charge that "it is the duty of the jury to believe the testimony of said Nelson [an interested party], in the absence of evidence or facts tending to show his testimony to be false," the appellate court, in affirming, said: "The law has fixed no such artificial standard for measuring the credibility of oral testimony. The mental processes by which we believe, or refuse to believe, what is related before us, are not reducible to rules, nor are they susceptible of exact definition." Nelson v. Warren (1890) 93 Ala. 408, 8 So. 413.

1017, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 181, the court, in reversing a judgment where the trial court had directed a verdict for the defendant upon the uncontradicted testimony of one of its witnesses who was its president and general counsel, an ex-governor of the state, of the highest character, said: "It will hardly do to say that the character of a witness is the determining factor upon the question whether the facts testified to by him shall be determined by the court or by the jury. It cannot be that where the character of the witness for truth and veracity is known by the court to be unimpeachable, the facts sought to be established by his testimony are to be determined by the court, but that where, in the judgment of the court, the witness is not entitled to full faith and credit, the facts sought to be proved by him must be determined by the jury. No such rule of evidence exists. In every case where the issue depends upon the determination of facts the existence of which is not admitted, the jury, and not the court, must determine them."

In Greene v. Sigua Iron Co. (1896) 31 C. C. A. 458, 88 Fed. 208, it was said: "The testimony of a party on a material issue should always be submitted to the jury, even though uncontradicted, if his adversary so request."

In reversing a case where a verdict was directed for the plaintiff, the court said: "The courts of this state have established the principle that a case wholly dependent upon the uncorroborated testimony of a party interested in the litigation, though unopposed by other witnesses, is for the jury, and they have the right to weigh the credibility of the witness." First Nat. Bank v. McWhorter (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 179 S. W. 1147.

In Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Villeneuve (1902) 29 Tex. Civ. App. 128, 68 S. W. 203, the court said: "The jury were not bound to believe the witness Roseberry, though not contradicted, as to the contestability of the incontestable clause. He was an interested witness, and the jury could consider that fact in passing upon his testimony, and give it such credit as they deemed it deserved."

In Leavitt v. Thurston (1911) 38 Utah, 351, 118 Pac. 77, where the witness was a party, the court, thinking his testimony suspicious, said, while reversing a judgment against him on other grounds: "While a jury may not arbitrarily disbelieve a witness and reject his testimony, neither are they bound to accept a fact as established merely because he testifies to it, when the circumstances render its existence, or the testimony of the witness, improbable or doubtful."

It is error for the court to instruct the jury that a party's (defendant's) evidence must be disregarded unless corroborated. Prowattain v. Tindall (1876) 80 Pa. 295.

The court on a second trial has no right to order a nonsuit because the plaintiff's testimony is different from what it was on the first trial. It is for the jury to say which testimony was correct. Williams v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1898) 155 N. Y. 158, 49 N. E. 672.

In a suit by a county against its ex-treasurer and his bondsmen the jury were held warranted in disbelieving the suspicious testimony of the defendant and his wife, that he had been robbed of the missing money. Sonoma County v. Stofen (1899) 125 Cal. 32, 57 Pac. 681.

In Hawkins v. Sauby (1892) 48 Minn. 69, 50 N. W. 1015, it was held that the denials of principal and agent that the agent took usury by the principal's consent might be disbelieved by the jury when the circumstances were not free from suspicion.

Where the indorser of a note claimed fraud, it was held that a bank which offered its cashier as a witness to show that it was a holder in due course was not entitled to a directed verdict on his uncontradicted testimony; the matter was for the jury. Second Nat. Bank v. Hoffman (1911) 229 Pa. 429, 78 Atl. 1002.

Where the plaintiff, her daughter and her daughter-in-law testified as to the manner of a street car accident, the car starting with a jerk, nothing being said to the conductor or motorman at the time, and the jury found for the defendant, the conductor and motorman knowing nothing about the accident, and testifying that the car was not negligently or carelessly started at the point, the court said, inter alia: "As three witnesses testified to the fact that the car was suddenly started with a violent jerk, and there was no direct evidence to the contrary, counsel for appellant earnestly insist that the verdict was palpably against the evidence. In trials by jury it does not follow that because one or more witnesses testify positively concerning a fact, and there is no evidence to the contrary, that the verdict must be flagrantly against the evidence. The number of witnesses who testify to a fact is not necessarily a controlling feature in determining its truth, neither does the fact that their evidence may not be contradicted by word of mouth compel its acceptance as true. The jury have the right to disregard the whole or any part of the testimony of any witness, and it is their province to give such weight to the evidence as, in their judgment and discretion, it is entitled to." Howard v. Louisville R. Co. (1907) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 309, 105 S. W. 982.

The jury is not bound to believe the testimony of interested parties, received without objection, as to conversations with a person since deceased. McCormick v. Kampmann (1908) 102 Tex. 215, 115 S. W. 24.

It may be noted that in Klason v. Rieger (1875) 22 Minn. 59, it was held that, the defendant having testified without contradiction that he was an infant, the jury might disregard this, inasmuch as he was contradicted on other matters.

It may also be noted that in Barrett v. Connecticut Co. (1911) 85 Conn. 705, 81 Atl. 963, where the plaintiff in a negligence case testified that she slipped on grease on a car rail, the court said: "Under our rule the jury were at liberty to credit the uncorroborated testimony of the plaintiff, even though it seems at variance with the probabilities." But the judgment for the plaintiff was reversed, as there was not a preponderance of proof that the defendant placed the grease upon the rail.

1. In general.

There are other cases in which it was held that the triers of facts, whether court or jury, were not justified in disregarding the uncontradicted testimony of an interested witness.

Oregon.—Miller's Will (1907) 49 Or. 452, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1051, 90 Pac. 1002, 14 Ann. Cas. 277.

Texas.—McAfee v. Robertson (1874) 41 Tex. 355 (jury); Beene v. Rotan Grocery Co. (1908) 50 Tex. Civ. App. 448, 110 S. W. 162 (court).

On the same principle are the cases holding that the trial judge had power to order the result.

In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff on a directed verdict, referring to testimony of the attorney for the plaintiff, taken by deposition, the court said: "The jury may discredit the testimony of an interested witness. But it is not an absolute rule, applicable in all cases, that the jury may discredit an uncontradicted witness because he is interested, or in the employ of an interested party. . . . The rule invoked, it seems to us, ought not to be applied when the fact testified to is one which the opposing party is able . . . to introduce testimony to contradict, and fails to do so." San Antonio v. E. H. Rollins & Sons (1910) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 127 S. W. 1166.

2. Court as trier of facts.

In Larson v. Glos (1908) 235 Ill. 584, 85 N. E. 926, the court reversed a judgment based on a master's disregard of the testimony of an interested witness who "was not contradicted or impeached, and the facts testified to were not improbable in themselves or in connection with any circumstances in the case."

In Cooley v. Barcroft (1881) 43 N. J. L. 363, it was held that a justice trying a case could not arbitrarily reject the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant.

In Tracy v. Tracy (1901) 62 N. J. Eq. 807, 48 Atl. 583, it was held that the court in an equity case may not arbitrarily disregard the uncontradicted, unimpeached testimony of the plaintiff, not inconsistent nor improbable. And see also KELLY v. JONES (reported herewith) ante, 792.

In Beene v. Rotan Grocery Co. (1908) 50 Tex. Civ. App. 448, 110 S. W. 162, it was held that the court trying the case without a jury ought not to disregard the defendant's uncontradicted evidence of fraud, where his answer, charging the fraud, was filed months before trial, and the persons charged with fraud did not testify.

"Interested persons are by our law competent witnesses, and their testimony is binding on the court, unless overcome by counter testimony, or irreconcilable with the known facts of the case." Marks v. New Orleans Cold Storage Co. (1901) 107 La. 172, 57 L.R.A. 271, 90 Am. St. Rep. 285, 31 So. 671.

In Harrigan v. Gilchrist (1904) 121 Wis. 383, 99 N. W. 909, an equity case, the court said: "It seems that in setting aside Mr. Owen's evidence as false, the court overlooked the familiar rule that the undisputed reasonable evidence of one witness, though a party interested, should be given controlling weight in determining a question of fact."

3. Jury.

In Southwest Nat. Bank v. Lindsley (1915) 29 Idaho, 843, 158 Pac. 1082, the court reversed a judgment entered upon a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the jury, misled by passion or prejudice, had ignored the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff's president.

In Grover v. Bach (1901) 82 Minn. 299, 84 N. W. 909, the court, in setting aside, as without evidence to sustain it, a finding of the jury that the plaintiff was not the owner at a certain date of the note sued on, said as to his testimony: "There is nothing in his testimony to suggest that it was not entitled to full credence, or to justify its rejection as untrue, or to bring it within the rule that courts and juries are not bound to accept as true the testimony of a witness, although there is no direct contradiction, where it contains improbabilities and contradictions which, alone or in connection with other circumstances in evidence, furnish reasonable grounds for concluding that it is false."

In Engmann v. Immel (1884) 59 Wis. 249, 18 N. W. 182, it was held that the court properly charged the jury as to the testimony of the plaintiff's attorney: "You have heard the testimony of Mr. Frisby about the note, as to the genuineness of the signature. His testimony is uncontradicted, and unless there is something in the case which casts discredit on his testimony, you are bound to accept it as true."

Where a jury disregarded the defendant's account, proved by uncontradicted evidence, and gave judgment for the plaintiff, a new trial was ordered. Roe v. Cronkhite (1876) 55 Ind. 183.

Where the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant shows a good defense to a promissory note, the jury may not disbelieve him on account of their private knowledge of his bad reputation for truth. Pumphrey v. Walker (1887) 71 Iowa, 383, 32 N. W. 386.

The presumption of negligence in the setting of fire by a locomotive "may be met and overcome by satisfactory proof that the engine was properly constructed and managed, and in suitable repair; and, if the uncontradicted evidence on the part of the railway company clearly shows that it has fully performed its duty in these respects, the presumption of negligence is rebutted." Daly v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1890) 43 Minn. 319, 45 N. W. 611, reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on a verdict. But where the evidence as to construction and repairs is not entirely satisfactory, the jury is not bound by it. Cantlon v. Eastern R. Co. (1891) 45 Minn. 481, 48 N. W. 22.

1. Cases favoring the trier of facts.

It has been often held in actions for negligence that the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant's implicated employees was for the triers of facts, who were not bound thereby.

Washington. — Gibson v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1911) 61 Wash. 639, 112 Pac. 919.

In Princeton Coal & Min. Co. v. Roll (1903) 162 Ind. 115, 66 N. E. 169, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 271, supra, it was held that the jury was not bound to believe the defendant's engineer as to the way the accident happened. It might believe that the engineer, on the contrary, carelessly started his engine.

In Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Booth (1912) 149 Ky. 245, 148 S. W. 61, supra, it was held that the jury were not bound by the statement of the defendant's fireman that he was maintaining a lookout and did not see the plaintiff, "as the circumstances were such as to show that there was nothing to prevent his seeing appellee as the train approached him if a lookout had been maintained by him."

The truth of the explanation of the defendant's employee as to the purpose with which he did the act complained of is for the consideration of the jury; they are not bound by it. Hankinson v. Lynn Gas & E. Co. (1900) 175 Mass. 271, 56 N. E. 604, supra.

In Volkmar v. Metropolitan R. Co. (1891) 134 N. Y. 418, 30 Am. St. Rep. 678, 31 N. E. 870, supra, it was held to be error to direct a verdict for the defendant in a negligence case upon the uncontradicted evidence of its implicated employee.

In Diaz v. Fajardo Development Co. (1906) 2 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 152, supra, the court said, referring to defendant's employee: "It is settled law that the court, even when sitting as a jury to decide questions of fact, need not find the fact in accordance with uncontradicted testimony, if that testimony is by an interested witness, or is improbable or unreasonable."

In El Paso Foundry & Mach. Co. v. De Guereque (1907) 46 Tex. Civ. App. 86, 101 S. W. 814, the court, in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, said, referring to the testimony of the defendant's implicated employee: "The jury, under our system of laws, are the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony, and they have the authority to reject the testimony of a witness, although he is not contradicted by other witnesses, when the circumstances cast a suspicion upon his statements, or render them inconsistent with reason and common observation."

In considering the evidence of employees of the defendant in a negligence case the court said: "It seems to be well settled in this state that the jury are not required to believe a witness, although he made a plain statement of what is not impossible, and it is neither impeached nor contradicted; but may discredit him on account of the manner of giving the testimony and attendant circumstances." Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Murray (1906) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 99 S. W. 144, supra.

In the matter of proving inspection by the defendant's foreman in a negligence case the court, in reversing a judgment for the defendant on a directed verdict, said: "When the burden of proving some disputed fact in a jury case rests upon a party, and such fact is sought to be proven by no other evidence than the testimony of a single interested witness, a trial court is not warranted in determining, as a matter of law, that such fact has been proven. This rule, we apprehend, is subject to few, if any, exceptions." Gibson v.

Reference may be here made to the two following cases, although it does not appear that the witnesses in question were implicated:

In Brush v. Long Island R. Co. (1896) 10 App. Div. 535, 42 N. Y. Supp. 103, an action for damages for fire set by defendant's locomotives, it was held that the defendant was not entitled to an instruction that the facts testified to by its employees as to the construction of its locomotives were established by the proof although this was the only evidence on the subject.

In Gombert v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1909) 195 N. Y. 273, 133 Am. St. Rep. 794, 88 N. E. 382, it was held that the court was not bound to instruct the jury that there was no indirect evidence to the contrary of that of the defendant's gateman and his wife, both of whom testified that he went suddenly deaf about a month after the accident to the plaintiff. The court said: "There was no error or impropriety in leaving it for the jury to decide whether the gateman's sudden and complete deafness within a month after the accident was consistent with his possession of an unimpaired sense of hearing at the time of the accident. Although he was not a party to the action, he had testified to a fact which, if material to the issue, was so unusual in the natural course of events as to invite inquiry. The jury had the undoubted right to weigh the testimony of the witnesses in this behalf for the purpose of testing the truthfulness of the rest of the gateman's story."

2. Cases favoring uncontradicted testimony.

In other actions for negligence it was held that the triers of facts were bound by the uncontradicted evidence of the defendant's implicated employees. Haus v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. (1901) 46 C. C. A. 94, 105 Fed. 783; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey (1910) 96 Ark. 37, 131 S. W. 44, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 383; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Humbert (1911) 101 Ark. 532.

142 S. W. 1122; Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Wiggins (1901) 113 Ga. 842, 61 L.R.A. 513, 39 S. E. 551; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Scruggs (1903) 119 Ga. 70, 45 S. E. 689; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Mote (1904) 120 Ga. 593, 48 S. E. 136; St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Manly (1871) 58 Ill. 300; Bale v. Chicago Junction R. Co. (1913) 259 Ill. 476, 102 N. E. 808; Savage v. Rhode Island Co. (1907) 28 R. I. 391, 67 Atl. 633.

In Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Wiggins (1901) 113 Ga. 842, 61 L.R.A. 513, 39 S. E. 551, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, said: "One of the grounds of alleged error is, that the trial judge refused, on a proper request, to charge the jury that the evidence of persons in the employment of the railroad company, in the absence of anything to discredit or contradict such evidence, cannot be arbitrarily disregarded. Undoubtedly this is a sound proposition of law. The jury cannot arbitrarily disregard the evidence of any witness, which is not contradicted or discredited by other evidence or circumstances. The jury should regard the testimony of every witness sworn. They are not obliged to believe it, but it is their duty to give to the evidence of witnesses the weight to which, in their opinion as conscientious men, seeking after the truth, they believe it is entitled; but the employment or business of a witness affords no reason why his evidence should arbitrarily or without reason be disregarded."

In affirming a judgment in favor of the defendants in a case tried by the court without a jury, the court, referring to the testimony of the defendants, said as to their interest: "It is hardly necessary for us to remark that no court or jury would set aside or wholly ignore their testimony on this ground. If they are competent to testify at all to the facts, the very law authorizing it implies that under such circumstances some faith and credit are to be given to their statements. No court or jury are authorized to say: 'These parties are interested, and therefore, without considering any other fact or circumstance, we will discredit them.'" Daniels v. Foster (1870) 26 Wis. 686.

In Hausse v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. (1901) 46 C. C. A. 94, 105 Fed. 733, it was held that the court was not required to send a negligence case to the jury where it was claimed that the plaintiff's intestate was killed by the negligence of his employer, where the defendant's conductor had testified without contradiction that he had given notice and warning to the plaintiff's intestate, that being the only duty of the defendant in the premises. The court said, inter alia: "It is suggested here, for the first time in the progress of the case, that his credibility as a witness was put in issue by his relation to the parties and to the subject-matter of the controversy, and that the cause should have been submitted to the jury upon that issue. The suggestion is that the witness, as an employee of the defendant, whose duty it was to bring the bulletin concerning the work at Muncie to the knowledge of the trainmen, had an interest in showing that he had performed the duty, and strong motive to falsely represent that he had done so, if in fact he had not performed the duty, and that this interest and possible motive raised a question as to his credibility which should have been considered by the jury. The testimony of the witness was not contradicted by that of any other witness, nor was it brought in question by the cross-examination nor by the admitted facts of the case; and, outside of the suggested interest and motive, there is not a fact or circumstance in the case which tends to raise a doubt as to the truth of his testimony. . . . In the case at bar the question was neither made nor in any way suggested by the plaintiff or his counsel at the trial, nor do the facts and circumstances of the case justify an impeaching presumption against the credibility of the witness, founded upon his mere relation to the parties and to the subject-matter of the controversy, which should overcome the counter presumption that, as an uncontradicted witness, testifying under oath, he spoke the truth."

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v.

Ramsey (1910) 96 Ark. 37, 131 S. W. 44, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 383, the court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for the wrongful death of an employee of the defendant on the ground that the jury had arbitrarily disregarded the uncontradicted testimony of employees of the defendant. And on a further trial the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and this was affirmed on appeal. (1912) 105 Ark. 698, 151 S. W. 288.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Humbert (1911) 101 Ark. 532, 142 S. W. 1122, the court said, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff for the wrongful death of his intestate: "The burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the engineer discovered the helpless man on the track before he received the danger signal in time to stop before striking him. . . . This the plaintiff has not shown. The engineer's testimony is perfectly reasonable, and is uncontradicted. The jury had no right to arbitrarily reject it."

The presumption of negligence from the injury of an employee by the breaking of a lever or handle is repelled by the uncontradicted testimony of the foreman, showing testing. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Scruggs (1903) 119 Ga. 70, 45 S. E. 689, reversing judgment on verdict. Followed on principle in Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Mote (1904) 120 Ga. 593, 48 S. E. 136 (the testimony showing inspection).

Where decent, about to cross a railroad track, was warned by laborers in the employ of the defendant of the approach of a passenger train which killed him, it was held that the jury could not disregard the uncontradicted testimony of these laborers, although they were unable to speak English and testified through an interpreter. Bale v. Chicago Junction R. Co. (1918) 269 Ill. 476, 102 N. E. 808 (but three judges dissented on the ground that the testimony was contradicted).

In a case of the killing of a servant by negligence, where the defendant put in evidence of warning him of the danger, it was held that the jury were not entitled to disregard the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant's employee that he warned the plaintiff's intestate. Savage v. Rhode Island Co. (1907) 28 R. L. 391, 67 Atl. 633.

It may be noted that it was held in Mercier v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1916) 138 La. 1043, 71 So. 150, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for damages for the death of a trespasser on a railroad track, killed by a fast passenger train, that the testimony of the engineer, fireman, and station agent, that the deceased was in such a position as not to be visible in time to avert the accident, cannot be disregarded on an hypothesis of visibility, based on the location of the wound on the head of the deceased.

Reference may also be made to Wilson v. United Traction Co. (1904) 94 App. Div. 539, 88 N. Y. Supp. 122, but it seems the point of the decision was that the plaintiff had not made out a prima facie case.

Stock killed by railroads.

Where the law raises a presumption or prima facie case against railroad companies killing stock, juries should not arbitrarily reject the uncontradicted, reasonable, exonerating testimony of the defendant's employees. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Landers (1900) 67 Ark. 514, 55 S. W. 940; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Wall (1888) 80 Ga. 202, 7 S. E. 639; South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Powell (1899) 108 Ga. 437, 33 S. E. 994; Georgia S. & F. R. Co. v. Sanders (1900) 111 Ga. 128, 36 S. E. 458; Georgia S. & F. R. Co. v. Thompson (1900) 111 Ga. 731, 36 S. E. 945; Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Talbot (1880) 78 Ky. 621; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Packwood (1881) 59 Miss. 281; Miller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1907) 21 S. D. 242, 111 N. W. 553.

In such case it was held to be error not to direct a verdict for the defendant. Volkman v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1888) 5 Dak. 69, 37 N. W. 731; Huber v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1889) 6 Dak. 392, 43 N. W. 819. (See the limitation in scope in regard to presumptions, made in the first paragraph of this annotation.)

But in Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Whitley (1919) — Ark. —, 213 S. W. 369, it was held to be for the jury to say whether the testimony of the engineer of the locomotive which killed an animal was reasonable, consistent, and uncontradicted. The same was held in substance in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Chambliss (1891) 54 Ark. 214, 15 S. W. 469.

In the following cases it does not appear that there was a statutory presumption from the killing:

In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Atteberry (1891) 43 Ill. App. 80, it was held that the jury may not, from whim or caprice, reject the uncontradicted exonerating testimony of the defendant's engineer and fireman in case of stock alleged to have been killed by the locomotive.

In Blid v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1911) 89 Neb. 689, 131 N. W. 1027, the court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff for cattle killed by the defendant's locomotive and found from 60 feet to 150 feet from the crossing, it being the theory of the plaintiff that the cattle had passed from the highway over insufficient cattle guards. The defendant's fireman and engineer testified to striking the cattle at the crossing near a curve without time to prevent it, and that the cattle were carried on by the pilot, the engineer stating that he had known such bodies to be so carried for 100 yards. Another witness testified as an expert against bodies being carried so far. There were no cattle tracks on the railway, but there was hair on the cattle guards.

But, in affirming a judgment for damages for the loss of horses killed by the defendant's locomotive, the court said: "It is true the engineer and others upon the engine testified positively that they did not discover the horses until within 30 or 40 feet of them; but we are unwilling to say that even this unqualified statement might not be discredited by the jury, if they believed from the evidence that surrounding circumstances and conditions made its truthfulness improbable." Lighthouse v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1893) 3 S. D. 518, 54 N. W. 320.

1. In general.

In New York an effort was made to establish a rigid rule that the testimony of an uncontradicted interested witness involved a question of fact, to be determined by the jury or trier of the fact. This doctrine broke down with the decision in Hull v. Littauer (1900) 162 N. Y. 569, 57 N. E. 102, holding that the old rule was not inflexible. Since that time the decisions sometimes invoke the old rule and sometimes the new.

It may be said that two of the earlier cases sometimes cited as holding against the rigid rule may perhaps be considered as decided on the ground that the evidence in question was "undisputed," to wit: Lomer v. Meeker (1862) 25 N. Y. 361; Kelly v. Burroughs (1886) 102 N. Y. 93, 6 N. E. 109. But as much cannot be said of Plyer v. German American Ins. Co. (1890) 121 N. Y. 689, 24 N. E. 929 (decided ten years before the Hull Case), where the court reversed a judgment upon a verdict for the defendant on the ground that it was error not to have directed a verdict for the plaintiff upon the testimony of his uncontradicted witnesses, which was not undisputed, citing the Lomer and Kelly Cases, supra. For three or four cases in the appellate division, decided before the Hull Case, but taking a view similar to that case, see infra.

2. Old rule.

It was the apparent general theory of the old rule that the testimony of an uncontradicted interested witness involved a question of fact to be determined by the jury. Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1871) 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140; Kavanagh v. Wilson (1877) 70 N. Y. 177; Wohlfahrt v. Beckert (1893) 92 N. Y. 490, 44 Am. Rep. 406; Sipple v. State (1885) 99 N. Y. 284, 1 N. E. 892, 3 N. E. 657; Dean v. Van Nostrand (1886) 4 N. E. 134 (partially reported in 101 N. Y. 621); Dean v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (1890) 119 N. Y. 540, 23 N. E. 1054; McQuigan v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 618, 26 N. E. 13; Canajoharie Nat. Bank v. Diefendorf

(1890) 123 N. Y. 191, 10 L.R.A. 676, 25 N. E. 402; Page v. Krekey (1893) 137 N. Y. 307, 21 L.R.A. 409, 33 Am. St. Rep. 731, 33 N. E. 311 (recognizing the rule); Lesser v. Wunder (1880) 9 Daly, 70; Hodge v. Buffalo (1874) 1 Abb. N. C. 356; Michigan Carbon Works v. Schad (1885) 38 Hun, 71; Roseberry v. Nixon (1890) 58 Hun, 121, 11 N. Y. Supp. 523; Rumsey v. Boutwell (1891) 61 Hun, 165, 15 N. Y. Supp. 765; Meeteer v. Manhattan R. Co. (1892) 63 Hun, 533, 18 N. Y. Supp. 561; Bookheim v. Alexander (1892) 64 Hun, 458, 19 N. Y. Supp. 776; Stay v. Du Bois (1893) 74 Hun, 134, 26 N. Y. Supp. 240; Goldsmith v. Coverly (1894) 75 Hun, 48, 27 N. Y. Supp. 116; Miller v. Boyer (1894) 79 Hun, 131, 29 N. Y. Supp. 479; Halsey v. Hart (1895) 85 Hun, 46, 32 N. Y. Supp. 665; Kingsland Land Co. v. Newman (1896) 1 App. Div. 1, 36 N. Y. Supp. 960; Schmitt v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (1897) 13 App. Div. 120, 43 N. Y. Supp. 318; Gulliver v. Blauvelt (1897) 14 App. Div. 523, 43 N. Y. Supp. 935, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 652; Lamb v. Prudential Ins. Co. (1897) 22 App. Div. 552, 48 N. Y. Supp. 123; Moran v. Abbott (1898) 26 App. Div. 570, 50 N. Y. Supp. 337; Kennedy v. McAllaster (1898) 31 App. Div. 453, 52 N. Y. Supp. 714.

Thus it was held that a verdict ought not to be directed for the plaintiff on the uncontradicted testimony of an interested witness. Kavanagh v. Wilson (1877) 70 N. Y. 177; Hodge v. Buffalo (1874) 1 Abb. N. C. 356; Joy v. Diefendorf (1891) 130 N. Y. 6, 27 Am. St. Rep. 484, 28 N. E. 602; Lesser v. Wunder (1880) 9 Daly, 70; Michigan Carbon Works v. Schad (1885) 38 Hun, 71; Rumsey v. Boutwell (1891) 61 Hun, 165, 15 N. Y. Supp. 765; Bookheim v. Alexander (1892) 64 Hun, 458, 19 N. Y. Supp. 776; Goldsmith v. Coverly (1894) 75 Hun, 48, 27 N. Y. Supp. 116; Miller v. Boyer (1894) 79 Hun, 131, 29 N. Y. Supp. 479; Kingsland Land Co. v. Newman (1896) 1 App. Div. 1, 36 N. Y. Supp. 960.

So it was held that a verdict for the defendant ought not to be directed upon the uncontradicted testimony of an interested witness. Wohlfahrt v. Beckert (1893) 92 N. Y. 490, 44 Am. Rep. 406; Lamb v. Prudential Ins. Co. (1897) 22 App. Div. 552, 48 N. Y. Supp. 123. And that there should not be a dismissal on the defendant's uncontradicted testimony. Stay v. Du Bois (1892) 74 Hun, 134, 26 N. Y. Supp. 240; Kennedy v. McAllaster (1898) 31 App. Div. 453, 52 N. Y. Supp. 714.

So it was held that the trier of fact was not bound by the uncontradicted testimony of an interested witness. Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1871) 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140 (jury); McNulty v. Hurd (1881) 86 N. Y. 547 (court); Sipple v. State (1885) 99 N. Y. 284, 1 N. E. 892, 3 N. E. 657 (court); Dean v. Van Nostrand (1886) 4 N. E. 134 (partially reported in 101 N. Y. 621) (jury); Dean v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (1890) 119 N. Y. 540, 23 N. E. 1054 (jury); McQuigan v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 618, 26 N. E. 18 (jury); Canajoharie Nat. Bank v. Diefendorf (1890) 123 N. Y. 191, 10 L.R.A. 636, 25 N. E. 402 (jury); Roseberry v. Nixon (1890) 58 Hun, 121, 11 N. Y. Supp. 523 (jury); Gulliver v. Blauvelt (1897) 14 App. Div. 523, 43 N. Y. Supp. 935, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 652 (jury); Halsey v. Hart (1895) 85 Hun, 46, 32 N. Y. Supp. 665 (jury).

Where the plaintiff was the only witness to a fact, the court, in affirming a dismissal of the complaint, said: "The fact that the only witness called to testify to the loss was the plaintiff himself was enough to preclude this court from reviewing the decision of the trial judge and general term. For the court below was not bound, as matter of law, to credit the statements of a witness thus interested, given in his own behalf, though uncontradicted by any other witness." Kearney v. New York (1883) 92 N. Y. 617.

In an action for negligently sending a false and fraudulent telegram, where it was claimed by the defendant that, in finding against him, the jury had disregarded the positive, uncontradicted testimony of three of his employees, the court said: "It is undoubtedly the general rule that where unimpeached witnesses testify distinctly and positively to a fact and are uncontradicted, their testimony should be credited and have the effect of overcoming a mere presumption. . . . But this rule is subject to many qualifications. There may be such a degree of improbability in the statements themselves as to deprive them of credit, however positively made. The witnesses, though unimpeached, may have such an interest in the question at issue as to affect their credibility. The general rules laid down in the books at the time when interest absolutely disqualified a witness necessarily assumed that the witnesses were disinterested. The qualification must, in the present state of the law, be added. And furthermore, it is often a difficult question to decide when a witness is, in a legal sense, uncontradicted. He may be contradicted by circumstances as well as by statements of others contrary to his own. In such cases, courts and juries are not bound to refrain from exercising their judgment, and to blindly adopt the statements of the witness, for the simple reason that no other witness has denied them, and that the character of the witness is not impeached." The court stated further that each of the witnesses in question, "if guilty of the negligent act, would have the strongest motive to deny it, as the admission would subject him or her to severe responsibility for the consequences. This is a controlling consideration in determining whether the statements of these witnesses should be taken as conclusive." Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1871) 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140.

"It cannot be said there is any peremptory rule of law which requires a tribunal to accept as true the testimony of an interested witness, delivered from unfaithful memory." McNulty v. Hurd (1881) 86 N. Y. 547.

In Roseberry v. Nixon (1890) 58 Hun, 121, 11 N. Y. Supp. 523, the court refused to disturb a judgment for the plaintiff where the defendant claimed that the court should have directed a verdict for her, the court saying: "It is undoubtedly true that the general rule is that where a witness testifies distinctly and positively to a fact, and is uncontradicted, his testimony should be credited; but this rule is subject to many qualifications. One is, that where a witness may be biased by his interest, the case is one for the jury. Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra. The same principle has been held in numerous other cases. This interest need not necessarily be pecuniary; it may arise from the relationship of the witness to one of the parties. The only witness to prove the defendant's case was the husband and agent of the defendant, having an interest in the success of the defense; in fact, a party to it. The court was bound, under this condition of the evidence, to submit the question to the jury."

In Kennedy v. McAllaster (1898) 31 App. Div. 453, 52 N. Y. Supp. 714, the court said: "The rule is general, if not universal, that where the witness is interested in the matter in controversy, and although his testimony is uncontradicted, his credibility is a question for the jury, and the court is not warranted in directing a verdict upon his testimony alone when the testimony may be improbable in itself or inconsistent with other things or other circumstances of the case. . . . Facts testified to by a party, though uncontradicted, cannot be deemed established as matter of law, if his testimony alone supports them, where there are other things or circumstances in the case which might render his testimony inconsistent or improbable, but must be submitted to the jury in order that it may determine what effect, if any, such things and other circumstances, and his interest in the result of the controversy, should have upon his credibility and upon the final disposition and result of the action."

In Kavanagh v. Wilson (1877) 70 N. Y. 177, it was held to be error to direct a verdict for the plaintiff, suing a decedent's estate for commissions as a real estate broker whose claimed rate of pay depended upon the uncontradicted testimony of his son, who was somewhat interested in the result.

In Wohlfahrt v. Beckert (1893) 92

N. Y. 490, 44 Am. Rep. 406, it was held that a verdict for the defendant ought not to be directed upon the uncontradicted testimony of a witness who was in danger of criminal prosecution, the court quoting from the Elwood Case, supra, on the point.

In Sipple v. State (1885) 99 N. Y. 284, 1 N. E. 892, 3 N. E. 657, it was held that the court trying the case was "under no legal obligation to give implicit credit" to the uncontradicted testimony of a witness in danger of civil and criminal prosecution.

There are some decisions after the Hull Case which seem to belong to the earlier rule.

Thus, in Saranac & L. P. R. Co. v. Arnold (1901) 167 N. Y. 368, 60 N. E. 647, in reversing a judgment for defendants, entered upon a dismissal of the complaint upon the uncontradicted testimony of the defendants, the court said, not referring to the Hull Case: "The general rule is that where a witness is interested in the question, although he is not impeached or contradicted, his credibility is a question for the jury, and the court is not warranted in directing a verdict upon his testimony alone."

Gordon v. Ashley (1908) 191 N. Y. 186, 83 N. E. 686, which does not refer to the Hull Case, seems distinctly to have been decided upon the old theory. In the Gordon Case, after the plaintiff had established a prima facie case, there was a nonsuit on the defendant's testimony, and the court, in sending the case back for a new trial, said: "While the testimony of a single witness, if believed, is sufficient to establish any fact in a civil action, still it need not be believed if the witness is interested, or his statements, even if uncontradicted, are inconsistent with his own conduct, or so improbable as to require explanation. If a fair argument can be made against the probability of his story, his credibility presents a question for the jury. Even if they do not think that he intended to speak falsely, still they may reject his testimony if they are satisfied that he was mistaken owing to interest, bias, a defective memory, or any other reason springing from the evidence." (Quoted and followed in MacReynolds v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. (1915) 170 App. Div. 314, 155 N. Y. Supp. 655, where the Gordon decision is stated to be "quite in harmony with both the rule and limitation as declared and discussed in Hull v. Littauer.")

So, in Burt v. Quackenbush (1902) 72 App. Div. 547, 75 N. Y. Supp. 1081, affirmed in (1903) 175 N. Y. 490, 67 N. E. 1081, the court said, in affirming a judgment, where the case was tried without a jury, that "the court was not bound to credit the testimony of the parties."

And in Becker v. Woarms (1902) 72 App. Div. 196, 76 N. Y. Supp. 438, it was held that the defendant was entitled to an instruction to the effect that the jury were not bound to accept the testimony of the plaintiff as true, although uncontradicted or unimpeached (but it seems to have been contradicted).

It may be noted in this connection that it was held in Fuller Buggy Co. v. Waldron (1906) 112 App. Div. 814, 99 N. Y. Supp. 561, affirmed in (1907) 188 N. Y. 680, 81 N. E. 1165, that it was error to direct a verdict for the defendants on their uncontradicted testimony.

3. Rule of Hull v. Littauer.

It is the rule of Hull v. Littauer (1900) 162 N. Y. 569, 57 N. E. 102, that the uncontradicted testimony of an interested witness is not necessarily for the trier of fact. Second Nat. Bank v. Wilson (1902) 172 N. Y. 250, 64 N. E. 949; Littlefield v. Lawrence (1903) 83 App. Div. 327, 82 N. Y. Supp. 25; Electric Fireproofing Co. v. Smith (1906) 113 App. Div. 615, 99 N. Y. Supp. 37; Block v. Galitzka (1906) 114 App. Div. 799, 100 N. Y. Supp. 173; Buckley v. Doig (1906) 115 App. Div. 413, 100 N. Y. Supp. 869, affirmed in (1907) 188 N. Y. 238, 80 N. E. 913, 11 Ann. Cas. 263; Maher v. Benedict (1908) 123 App. Div. 579, 108 N. Y. Supp. 228; Eisenberg v. Lefkowitz (1911) 142 App. Div. 569, 127 N. Y. Supp. 595; Abramovitz v. Tenzer (1911) 144 App. Div. 170, 128 N. Y. Supp. 951; Wood v. Wise (1912) 153 App. Div. 223, 137 N. Y. Supp. 1017, affirmed in (1913) 208 N. Y. 586, 102

N. E. 1117; Pierson v. Mitsui & Co. (1920) 181 N. Y. Supp. 273.

In Hull v. Littauer (1900) 162 N. Y. 569, 57 N. E. 102, the court, in affirming a judgment for the defendants, entered upon a directed verdict, said: "Generally, the credibility of a witness, who is a party to the action, and therefore interested in its result, is for the jury; but this rule, being founded in reason, is not an absolute and inflexible one. If the evidence is possible of contradiction in the circumstances,—if its truthfulness or accuracy is open to a reasonable doubt upon the facts of the case, and the interest of the witness furnishes a proper ground for hesitating to accept his statements,—it is a necessary and just rule that the jury should pass upon it. Where, however, the evidence of a party to the action is not contradicted by direct evidence, nor by any legitimate inferences from the evidence, and it is not opposed to the probabilities, nor, in its nature, surprising or suspicious, there is no reason for denying to it conclusiveness. Though a party to an action has been enabled, since the legislation of 1857 (Laws 1857, chap. 353), to testify as a witness, his evidence is not to be regarded as that of a disinterested person, and whether it should be accepted without question depends upon the situation as developed by the facts and circumstances and the attitude of his adversary." The court pointed out certain circumstances of the case, and said further: "The only evidence as to the contract was given by the defendant. There was nothing to contradict, or to discredit, his evidence. Those circumstances were sufficient to distinguish the case and to take it from without the operation of the general rule. If this position were not true, then the rule might be reduced to an obvious absurdity in its consequences, and verdicts might be rendered only to be set aside as against evidence."

In Second Nat. Bank v. Weston (1902) 172 N. Y. 250, 64 N. E. 949, it was held to be error not to direct a verdict for the plaintiff on the testimony of an interested witness, to some extent aided by written evidence.

The jury have no right to disregard the exonerating evidence of the employees of the defendant in an action for injuries caused by the alleged kicking of the plaintiff off defendant's train, when the plaintiff was stealing a ride, and did not identify his alleged assaulter. Johnson v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1903) 173 N. Y. 79, 65 N. E. 946, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 379, citing the Hull Case.

In Mendoza v. Levy (1906) 111 App. Div. 449, 97 N. Y. Supp. 753, where it was held that the court should not direct a verdict on uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff which is suspicious, the court referred to what is described as "the general rule as stated" in Saranac & L. P. R. Co. v. Arnold (1901) 167 N. Y. 368, 60 N. E. 647 (see supra, b), or "that general rule as modified and expressed" in the Hull Case.

It may be noted that in McConnell v. Hellwig (1920) 190 App. Div. 244, 179 N. Y. Supp. 882, where the trial court had directed a verdict for the defendant against the plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony, the appellate court, in reversing the judgment, said that "the credibility of the plaintiff was not for the court, but for the jury, under the rule of Hull v. Littauer (N. Y.) supra."

Even before the decision in the Hull Case there are some cases taking the same view.

Thus, in sustaining a judgment of the county court for the plaintiff, reversing a decision of a justice, the court said: "The plaintiff's testimony was not contradicted or sought to be. She was not impeached, and there is no circumstance in the record which tends to impeach her credibility, and, under such circumstances, the justice was not at liberty to disbelieve her simply because she was interested in the event of the action." Van Nosstrand v. Hubbard (1898) 35 App. Div. 201, 54 N. Y. Supp. 739. And see, to a somewhat similar effect, Berzevizy v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1897) 19 App. Div. 309, 46 N. Y. Supp. 27. So, in Denton v. Carroll (1896) 4 App. Div. 532, 40 N. Y. Supp. 19, it was held that the jury had no right to find that furniture seized for taxes as the property of a taxed boarder belonged to her when there was the positive, uncontradicted testimony of the landlady (the plaintiff) that she owned the furniture.

Where the testimony of the defendant is "not contradicted by direct evidence, nor by any legitimate inferences from the evidence, and it is not opposed to the probabilities, nor, in its nature, surprising or suspicious," the credibility thereof was not necessarily for the jury." Maher v. Benedict (1908) 123 App. Div. 579, 108 N. Y. Supp. 228.

In Eisenberg v. Lefkowitz (1911) 142 App. Div. 569, 127 N. Y. Supp. 595, the court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, entered upon a verdict directed on his uncontradicted testimony.

Where the facts as to time were testified to by one of the defendants, and he was not contradicted or discredited, it was held that the court erred in not disposing of the question of reasonable time as a matter of law. Electric Fireproofing Co. v. Smith (1906) 113 App. Div. 615, 99 N. Y. Supp. 37.

So, where one of the plaintiffs executed the contract sued on for himself and his brother, the coplaintiff, and the brothers both testified as to his authority and as to the ratification of it, it was held proper to take that question from the jury, although the witnesses were interested. Wood v. Wise (1912) 153 App. Div. 223, 137 N. Y. Supp. 1017, affirmed in (1913) 208 N. Y. 586, 102 N. E. 1117.

In Buckley v. Doig (1906) 115 App. Div. 413, 100 N. Y. Supp. 869, affirmed in (1907) 188 N. Y. 238, 80 N. E. 913, 11 Ann. Cas. 263, the trying referee whose decision was affirmed held that the plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony on a certain point must be accepted as conclusive.

The court may not disregard arbitrarily the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff's assignor, proving the plaintiff's case, and give judgment for the defendant. Block v. Galitzka (1906) 114 App. Div. 799, 100 N. Y. Supp. 173.

In Abramovitz v. Tenzer (1911) 144 App. Div. 170, 128 N. Y. Supp. 951, the court, following the Hull Case, reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a case tried without a jury, holding that the trial justice was not justified in rejecting the uncontradicted testimony of the defendant's interested witnesses.

Where the defendant was held liable for the loss of the plaintiff's horse, the jury found a verdict for $25. The plaintiff testified that the horse was worth $175. The defendant claimed that the horse was balky, and "the only evidence offered on the part of the defendant, to contradict the value of the horse, as testified to by the plaintiff, was his own testimony, in which he stated, when asked as to the value: 'I do not see how he could be worth anything if he refused to work;' and the testimony of his witness Wagner, who said: 'I would not give anything for him; he would not work.' But, on cross-examination, when asked if the horse would work well in a team, if he would then say he was worthless, he answered: 'Not as a team horse. I would not. No.'" The court, in reversing the judgment on the plaintiff's appeal, said: "It is true that the credibility of the uncontradicted testimony of a party to an action is usually a question for the jury. So is the credibility of every witness, whether interested or not; but a jury is not at liberty to disregard the testimony of any witness, even though he be a party, who is in no wise impeached, and whose testimony is such that its truth is highly probable." Littlefield v. Lawrence (1903) 83 App. Div. 327, 82 N. Y. Supp. 25 (this case is, of course, not strictly within the scope of this annotation).

But the trial court should not give judgment for the plaintiff on his uncontradicted testimony when it passes credibility. Punsky v. New York (1908) 129 App. Div. 558, 114 N. Y. Supp. 66.

In Strong v. Walton (1908) 47 App. Div. 114, 62 N. Y. Supp. 353, in holding that the case was not one where the uncontradicted testimony of a party should be accepted by the jury, the court said: "The plaintiff's testimony in its entirety might have suggested doubt of the truth of his main statement instead of dispelling it, and his manner may have confirmed the doubt. It was for the jury to decide, and we think their verdict should control."

In Union Bank v. Mandel (1910) 139 App. Div. 684, 124 N. Y. Supp. 459, the court considered that, under the circumstances, the jury were justified in disregarding the testimony of the defendant and his mother, to the effect that he was an infant at the time of the indorsement in question.

VI. Miscellaneous.

In Graham v. Coos Bay R. & Nav. Co. (1914) 71 Or. 393, 139 Pac. 337, the court said: "Under § 704, L. O. L., making the jury exclusive judges of the credibility of witnesses, the jury may disregard uncontradicted testimony where it is unsatisfactory to their minds. A jury is not bound to find a verdict in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce a conviction in their minds as against a less number, or against a presumption or other evidence that does satisfy their minds. L. O. L. § 868, subd. 2."

"Jurors are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2." Sterling v. Cole (1909) 12 Cal. App. 93, 106 Pac. 602.

In Anniston Nat. Bank v. Durham (1897) 121 N. C. 107, 28 S. E. 134, the court said: "If the party upon whom the burden of proof rests has offered no evidence to prove the issue, or no such evidence as the jury ought to find a verdict upon (as in Wittkowsky v.

Wasson (1874) 71 N. C. 451), the court should say so, and direct a finding in the negative. State v. Shule (1849) 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 153. But, no matter how strong and uncontradictory the evidence is in support of the issue, the court cannot withdraw such issue from the jury and direct an affirmative finding. To do this is to violate the Act of 1796 (§ 413 of the Code)."

It appears by the official headnote in Frazier v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. (1899) 108 Ga. 807, 33 S. E. 996, that it was there held that "when a plaintiff's right to recover depended upon the establishment of a particular fact, and the only proof offered for this purpose was circumstantial evidence from which the existence of such fact might be inferred, but which did not demand a finding to that effect, a recovery by the plaintiff was not lawful, when, by the positive and uncontradicted testimony of unimpeached witnesses, which was perfectly consistent with the circumstantial evidence relied on by the plaintiff, it was affirmatively shown that no such fact existed."

The appellate court will reverse a judgment on a referee's report sustaining a claim against decedent on doubtful and improbable testimony of the claimant. Dougall v. Dougall (1901) 61 App. Div. 282, 70 N. Y. Supp. 336.

It may be noted that on appeal from a judgment in a separation case granting the wife the custody and control of the children, the court said: "The judgment is supported by uncontradicted evidence, making absolute proof that the defendant defamed his wife and treated her so cruelly that her living with him became intolerable." Schmalz v. Schmalz (1920) 146 La. —, 84 So. 166.

EX PARTE WALTER MCGEE et al.

Kansas Supreme Court — November 8, 1919.

(105 Kan. 574, 185 Pac. 14.)

1. Chapter 205 of the Laws of 1917 undertakes to protect public health by preventing dissemination of dangerous communicable diseases, through isolation and quarantine measures, nonobservance of which is declared to be a misdemeanor, and is not unconstitutional, on the ground that it delegates legislative power, because it confers on the state board of health authority to designate such diseases as are infectious, contagious, or communicable in their nature, and to prescribe proper control measures.

Health — rules of board — reasonableness.

2. Rules of the state board of health, adopted and published pursuant to the statute, and provisions of a city ordinance framed in accordance with the rules of the state board of health, considered and held, not to be unreasonable because they authorize isolation of men infected with venereal disease at an institution provided by the state for isolation and treatment of such diseases.

— findings of health officer — conclusiveness.

3. The finding of a city health officer that a person has been examined and has been found to be infected with a dangerous, communicable venereal disease is conclusive as to the facts found, in the absence of a charge of bad faith, or conduct equivalent to bad faith, on the part of the officer.

Habeas corpus — release from quarantine.

4. A person regularly ordered to be isolated at the state institution is not entitled to a writ of habeas corpus for his discharge, because he is able to provide himself with proper treatment at an isolated place in the locality of his residence.

Health — misnomer of place of isolation.

5. The facts considered, and held, that certain misnomers of the state institution, the "State Quarantine Camp for Men, at Lansing," do not render the place of isolation indefinite, or otherwise invalidate the isolation orders under which the petitioners are held.

Headnotes by BURCH, J.

APPLICATION by petitioners for a writ of habeas corpus to secure their release from custody to which they had been committed, and to forestall execution of an isolation order contemplating their further detention. Writ denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Elisha Scott for petitioners.

Mr. D. H. Branaman for respondents.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners presented an application for a writ of habeas corpus to free them from present detention by the chief of police of the city of Topeka, and to forestall execution of an isolation order contemplating further detention. The cause was heard on the application for the writ. The isolation order relating to one of the petitioners is in the following form:

November 10, 1919.

The Chief of Police,

Topeka, Kansas.

Sir:—

By authority of the rules and regulations for the control and suppression sion of venereal diseases in the state of Kansas, enacted by the Kansas state board of health March 29, 1918, under authority of chapter 205, Session Laws of 1917 (and Ordinance No. 4,832, city of Topeka), I hereby notify you that George Buckner, now in custody at the city jail at Topeka, Kansas, has been examined and found to be infected with a dangerous, communicable disease, viz., chronic gonorrhœa.

In further pursuance of said rules and regulations, I hereby designate the state penitentiary at Lansing, Kansas, as the place and limit of the area in which the above-named person is to be isolated.

I request that you take the necessary action to transfer said person to the state penitentiary in accordance with the above-cited authority.

Respectfully,

[Signed] Earle G. Brown, M. D.,
City Health Officer.

Constitutionality of the statute, validity of the rules of the state board of health, and validity of the city ordinance, referred to in the order, are questioned.

Section 1 of the statute, which became effective on February 28, 1917, reads as follows: "For the better protection of the public health and for the control of communicable diseases, the state board of health shall designate such diseases as are infectious, contagious or communicable in their nature and the state board of health is herewith authorized to make and prescribe rules, regulations and procedures for the isolation and quarantine of such diseases and persons afflicted with or exposed to such diseases as may be necessary to prevent the spread and dissemination of diseases dangerous to the public health. Such rules, regulations and procedures shall be published in the official state paper, and when so published shall be in full force and effect." Laws 1917, chap. 205.

Section 2 provides penalties for violating, or refusing or neglecting to obey, any of the rules, regulations, or procedures prescribed by the state board of health.

It will be observed the statute is general, and contemplates protection of the public health by control of all dangerous diseases which are infectious, contagious, or communicable. It was not long until specific application of the statute to venereal diseases became urgent, on account of social conditions attending concentration of large bodies of troops at the three United States military establishments in the state, Fort Leavenworth, Fort Riley, and Camp Funston. The state board of health declared syphilis, gonococcus infection, and chancroid to be infectious, contagious, or communicable in their nature, and notifiable diseases dangerous to the public health, and made and published rules and regulations for the control and suppression of such diseases. The rules necessarily involved isolation of diseased persons, and facilities for isolation in the localities where such persons were found were totally inadequate. Desiring to co-operate with the state board of health and with the government of the United States in dealing with the venereal disease problem, the state board of administration, which is the central body having control of all correctional, charitable, and educational institutions of the state, placed at the disposal of all authorities concerned the facilities existing on the penitentiary reservation at Lansing. Provision was made for the quarantine and medical treatment of women at the industrial farm for women. Provision was made for the isolation of men in one of the penitentiary buildings, for their treatment at the penitentiary hospital, and for certain liberties outside the walls of the institution in connection with a few hours' work each day on the penitentiary farm. The portions of the state property thus set apart for the use of men were designated the "Kansas State Quarantine Camp for Men at Lansing," and the portion set apart for the use of women was designated the "Kansas State Quarantine Hospital for Women at Lansing." Experience demonstrated that the men sent to the quarantine camp thus established were, generally speaking, a bad lot, and the board of administration provided that they should be subject to such rules for the discipline and control of the institution as the warden, with the approval of the board, might adopt.

The rules and regulations for the control of venereal diseases adopted by the state board of health cover the subject in detail. A portion of rule 36 reads as follows:

"Section 1. Local county and city health officers throughout the state and deputy state health officers appointed for that purpose are hereby authorized and directed to use every available means to ascertain the existence of and immediately investigate all suspected cases of syphilis in communicable form, gonococcus infection or chancroid within their respective jurisdictions, and to ascertain the source of such infections.

"Section 2. In such investigations said local health officers, deputy state health officers, or their duly authorized representatives, are hereby vested with full powers of inspection, examination, isolation and disinfection of all places, persons, and things, and as such inspectors said local health officers, deputy state health officers, or their duly authorized representatives, are hereby authorized:

"(a) To make examinations of all persons reasonably suspected of having syphilis in communicable form, gonococcus infection, or chancroid. Owing to the prevalence of such diseases among pimps and prostitutes, all such persons may be considered in the above class.

"(b) To isolate such persons whenever in the opinion of said local health officer, deputy state health officer, the state board of health or its secretary, isolation is necessary to protect the public health. In establishing isolation the health officer shall define the place and the limits of the area in which the person reasonably suspected or known to have syphilis, gonococcus infection, or chancroid, and his or her attendant, are to be isolated, and no persons, other than the attending physicians, shall enter or leave the area of isolation without the permission of the health officer having jurisdiction. Provided: That women may be quarantined at the Kansas State Quarantine Hospital for Women at Lansing, and men may be quarantined in the Kansas State Quarantine Camp for Men at Lansing."

In September, 1918, the board of commissioners of the city of Topeka passed an ordinance, No. 4,832, dealing with the subject of venereal diseases which followed closely the rules and regulations of the state board of health. A part of § 8 and §§ 9 and 10 read as follows:

"Sec. 8. Powers and Duties of City Health Officer.—It is hereby made the duty of the city health officer and he is hereby directed and empowered: (a) To make examinations of persons reasonably suspected of having syphilis in the infectious stages, or gonococcus infection. Owing to the prevalence of such diseases among prostitutes, all prostitutes may be considered within the above class. (b) To isolate persons infected with any of said diseases whenever isolation is necessary to protect the public health. In establishing isolation, the city health officer shall define the limits of the area in which the persons reasonably suspected or known to have syphilis or gonococcus infection and his or her immediate attendant are to be isolated, and no person other than the attending physician shall enter or leave the area of isolation without the permission of the city health officer. . . .

"Sec. 9. Detention Hospital.—It shall be the duty of the city health officer to use only such building or buildings for quarantine purposes under this ordinance as shall first be provided or accepted by the board of commissioners, provided, however, that the state industrial farm for women, at Leavenworth, may be used for such quarantine purposes.

"Sec. 10. Quarantine.—Whenever it is necessary for the protection of the public health that persons infected with venereal diseases be quarantined, the city health officer shall quarantine such diseased person[s] in said detention hospitals or at said industrial farm, and cause to be administered to such persons a proper course of treatment."

In May, 1919, the board of commissioners adopted a resolution reciting that the city had no suitable place to isolate and treat persons afflicted with venereal diseases, and designated and accepted as such places the "farm for interned men at Lansing," for men, and the "state industrial farm for women," for women.

The statute is assailed as delegating legislative power to the state board of health. The statute belongs to the well-known class in which the legislature enacts a law in general terms, confers on an officer or administrative body power to enforce the law, and to accomplish that end, to adopt necessary rules and regulations, and prescribe penalties for violations of the regulations so adopted. 12 C. J. 844, 848. The necessity for legislation of this character is demonstrated by very recent events. If, when the statute under consideration was before the legislature, it had designated all the infectious, contagious, and communicable diseases it knew, and had prescribed regulations for their suppression and control, it would have omitted the deadly influenza which soon afterwards made such appalling inroads on the lives and health of the people of the state. To meet emergencies of this character, it is indispensable to preservation of the public health that some administrative officer or board should be clothed with authority to make adequate rules which have the force of law, and generally the public welfare is best promoted by delegating power to make administrative regulations to fulfil the expressed intention of the legislature. While in this instance the terms of the statute are somewhat meager, it undertakes to protect public health by preventing dissemination of dangerous communicable diseases, through isolation and quarantine measures, non-observance of which is declared to be a misdemeanor; and the authority given the state board of health to specify such diseases as measure up to the standard of infectious, contagious, and communicable, and to prescribe appropriate control measures, is well sustained. The following cases, chosen from a constantly lengthening list, discuss and apply the principles involved:

Constitutional law—quarantine of communicable diseases—delegation of legislative power.

Isenhour v. State, 157 Ind. 517, 87 Am. St. Rep. 228, 62 N. E. 40—authority to state board of health to adopt measures necessary to facilitate enforcement of pure food law, and to define specific adulterations (milk).

Red "C" Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 222 U. S. 380, 56 L. ed. 240, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 152—authority of state board of agriculture to determine what oils are safe, pure, and afford sufficient light.

Carstens v. De Sellem, 82 Wash. 643, 144 Pac. 984—authority of commissioner of agriculture to specify diseases and pests injurious to nursery stock, trees, etc.

Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349—authority of Secretary of Treasury, on recommendation of board of experts, to establish standards of tea.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 210 U. S. 281, 52 L. ed. 1061, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616—authority of Interstate Commerce Commission, in conjunction with American railway association, to designate and promulgate standard height and maximum variation of freight-car drawbars.

Richards v. Fleming Coal Co. 104 Kan. 330, 179 Pac. 380—rules and regulations relating to use of dynamite and other detonating explosives in mines, agreed on between employer and employees and approved by state mine inspector.

In the case of State v. Crawford, 104 Kan. 141, 2 L.R.A. 880, 177 Pac. 360, it was held that the principles under discussion could not be extended to validate a code of rules relating to electric wiring, promulgated and revised from time to time by a body composed of private individuals and voluntary unofficial organizations, which meets occasionally somewhere in the United States.

The rules of the state board of health and the city ordinance are assailed as unreasonable. In this instance, only those provisions of the rules of the state board of health and of the city ordinance are involved, which relate to isolation of persons who have been examined and have been found to be diseased. Reasonableness of provisions relating to discovery and to examination of suspects need not be determined. It may be observed, however, that while provisions of the latter class cut deeply into private personal right, the subject is one respecting which a mincing policy is not to be tolerated. It affects the public health so intimately and so insidiously that considerations of delicacy and privacy may not be permitted to thwart measures necessary to avert the public peril. Only those invasions of personal privacy are unlawful which are unreasonable, and reasonableness is always relative to gravity of the occasion. Opportunity for abuse of power is no greater than in other fields of governmental activity, and misconduct in the execution of official authority is not to be presumed.

It is urged that the regulations in question are unreasonable, in that they authorize isolation in remote places beyond the limits of the city in which the petitioners reside. The court knows of no law or rule of public policy or private right which requires a person who, for the protection of the public, must be isolated and treated for loathsome communicable disease, to be interned in the locality in which he may reside. It would have been competent for the state board of health to designate a single hospital for the detention of all persons in the state found to be so diseased, and it is entirely reasonable for cities having inadequate facilities, or having no facilities of their own, to take advantage of those provided by state authority. In this instance the city health officer's power to isolate is restrained by ordinance, which requires the city commission to approve detention hospitals other than those provided by the city.

In the application for the writ it is stated that the petitioners are not diseased. The question is one of fact, determinable by practically infallible scientific methods. The city health officer was authorized to ascertain the fact. He has certified to the existence of disease, and, in the absence of a charge of bad faith, or conduct equivalent to bad faith, on his part, his finding is conclusive.

In the application for the writ it is stated that, if the petitioners be diseased, they are able to provide themselves with proper treatment in an isolated place in the city of Topeka. The answer is: The public health authorities are not obliged to take chances.

Finally, it is said that the isolation orders are bad because they direct quarantine in the state penitentiary, and the petitioners may not be confined in the penitentiary for disease. The orders ought not to have used the term "state penitentiary," and should be amended by employing the official designation, the "State Quarantine Camp for Men at Lansing." While it is true that physical facilities constituting part of the penitentiary equipment are utilized, interned persons are in no sense confined in the penitentiary, and are not subject to the peculiar obloquy which attends such confinement. Since, however, the isolation orders specify the authority under which they are issued, there is no doubt about the place. Neither is there any doubt that the place is the identical place approved by the city commissioners under the name, "Farm for Interned Men at Lansing." Consequently, the confusion and misapplication of names, which should be avoided in the future, are not sufficient to entitle the petitioners to discharge.

The writ is denied.

ANNOTATION.

General delegation of power to guard against spread of contagious disease.

I. Introductory, 836.

II. Validity of general delegation, 836.

III. Scope of general delegation:

a. Measure other than vaccination:

1. Measures held authorized, 837.

2. Measures held not authorized, 839.

b. Vaccination, 841.

I. Introductory.

This note discusses the validity of a general legislative delegation to officers or bodies having locally the function of protecting the public health, of the power to make and enforce regulations to prevent the spread of communicable diseases, and the extent of the power which may be exercised under such a delegation. In treating the extent of the power conferred, not only have powers expressly granted been excluded from consideration, but the discussion has been confined to the existence of the power, excluding questions as to its abuse. The note is also confined to a consideration of powers looking specifically to the prevention of the spread of contagion, and does not consider the delegation of powers to protect the public health generally. Questions as to the validity of local health regulations, made under a general delegation of power, which conflict with those made by statute, are also excluded.

II. Validity of general delegation.

A general statutory delegation of power to make regulations for the protection of the public health from contagious or infectious diseases is not unconstitutional, as a delegation of legislative power.

Michigan.—Hurst v. Warner (1894) 102 Mich. 238, 26 L.R.A. 484, 47 Am. St. Rep. 525, 60 N. W. 440.

Missouri.—Metcalf v. St. Louis (1847) 11 Mo. 102; St. Louis v. McCoy (1853) 18 Mo. 238.

Washington.—State ex rel. McBride v. Superior Ct. (1918) 103 Wash. 409, 174 Pac. 973.

Thus, in People v. Tait (Ill.) supra, it was held that the provisions of a statute, giving the board of county commissioners in certain counties the general power to make rules and regulations to prevent the spread of communicable diseases, including the power to quarantine any house where an infected person might be, was not an unlawful delegation of legislative power.

So, in Blue v. Beach (Ind.) supra, the court held that an act providing that the state board of health should make rules and by-laws to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases did not delegate legislative power in violation of the Constitution.

Similarly, in Metcalf v. St. Louis (Mo.) supra, it was held that a statute delegating to the city of St. Louis the power to adopt by ordinance regulations to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, and to make quarantine laws for that purpose, was not a delegation of legislative authority in violation of the constitutional prohibition. See to the same effect, St. Louis v. McCoy (Mo.) supra.

In like manner, the court held in State ex rel. McBride v. Superior Ct. (Wash.) supra, that the provisions of a statute creating a state board of health, and rendering its rulings final as to the existence of contagious diseases, were not violative of the Constitution, as a delegation of legislative power.

In the reported case EX PARTE MCGEE, ante, 831), the court sustains a statute delegating to the state board of health the power to define such diseases as it deems to be contagious or infectious, and to adopt such regulations as may be proper to control those diseases.

But in State ex rel. Adams v. Burdge (1879) 95 Wis. 390, 37 L.R.A. 157, 60 Am. St. Rep. 123, 70 N. W. 347, the court held that an act which authorized the state board of health to make such regulations as it might deem necessary for the preservation of the public health from contagious diseases, and which further authorized the board to designate such diseases as were to be considered contagious and dangerous, was unconstitutional as an attempt to delegate legislative power.

III. Scope of general delegation.

a. Measure other than vaccination.

1. Measures held authorized.

Quarantine.

Under a general delegation of the power to take measures necessary to prevent the spread of contagious disease, health officers have the power to provide for the isolation of persons afflicted with such a disease. Ex parte Johnston (1919) — Cal. App. —, 180 Pac. 644.

Affirming that power, the court in State v. Racskowski (1913) 86 Conn. 677, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 530, 86 Atl. 606, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 410, said: "Our health officers are not only bound to make all necessary and proper regulations to prevent the spread of disease, but they are bound to exercise the highest diligence in enforcing these regulations. Common knowledge tells us that contagious diseases may be communicated by those who have been exposed to the disease; and it is the common practice for the health authorities to detain all such persons from going abroad so long as the danger of contagion is imminent from those who have been exposed." It was, however, held in that case that this delegation of power to order a person into quarantine could be exercised only when the health officer had a reasonable belief that the person ordered into confinement was actually afflicted with a contagious or infectious disease.

Applying the rule just stated, it has been held that a general delegation of power to take measures against the spread of contagion authorizes a regulation requiring the removal of smallpox patients to a pesthouse. Board of Health v. Ward (1900) 107 Ky. 477, 54 S. W. 725; Hengehold v. Covington (1900) 108 Ky. 752, 57 S. W. 495.

So, under a general delegation of authority to make and enforce regulations for the prevention and spread of infectious or contagious diseases, it has been held that a board of health was authorized to direct the isolation of a person infected with anesthetic leprosy. Kirk v. Board of Health (1909) 83 S. C. 372, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1188, 65 S. W. 387.

In the reported case (EX PARTE MCGEE, ante, 831), the court holds that a regulation of the state board of health, acting under its delegated power to prevent the dissemination of contagious or infectious diseases, and a city ordinance following the regulation of the state board, which direct the quarantine in a state hospital of men afflicted with venereal disease, are reasonable measures.

So, in Ex parte Brown (1919) — Neb. —, 172 N. W. 522, it was held that, under a similar delegation of power, the city of Omaha was authorized to provide by ordinance for the detention of persons "found to be infects with communicable venereal virus." See also Ex parte Johnston (1919) — Cal. App. —, 180 Pac. 644.

In Highland v. Schlute (1900) 123 Mich. 360, 82 N. W. 62, it appeared that by a special statute the board of health of the city of Detroit was authorized, in case of epidemic disease, to make such provisions as it might deem necessary, though such provisions were not otherwise authorized by the general statute relative to all cities whose charter provisions were not inconsistent therewith. Under this special act the Detroit board of health adopted a regulation providing that, whenever smallpox broke out in one half of a double frame house, the entire house should be quarantined. The court held that this regulation was a proper exercise of the power delegated to the board of health.

Under an act providing that the health officer of the port of New York "shall, in the presence of immediate danger, take the responsibility of applying such additional measures as may be deemed indispensable for the protection of the public health," it has been held that the delegated powers justified the action of the health officer in landing and isolating passengers from cholera-infected ships, on Fire island, in the county of Suffolk, despite the order of the board of health of that county that such passengers should not be landed. Young v. Flower (1893) 3 Misc. 34, 22 N. Y. Supp. 332. So, in Metcalf v. St. Louis (1847) 11 Mo. 102, the court held that under the delegation of power to the city of St. Louis "to make regulations to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into the city; to make quarantine laws for that purpose,"—an ordinance providing for the quarantine of vessels whose crew or passengers had been exposed to contagion, for a period not exceeding thirty days, was properly adopted.

Closing of store.

Under the provisions of a statute delegating to county boards of health the right to inaugurate and execute "such sanitary regulations as the local board may consider expedient, to prevent the outbreak of and spread of cholera, smallpox, yellow fever, scarlet fever, diphtheria, and other epidemic and communicable diseases," it has been held that a county board of health might compel the closing of a store for disinfection, and quarantine the storekeeper, where such person had recently come from an infected locality. Allison v. Cash (1911) 143 Ky. 679, 187 S. W. 245.

Disinfection.

Where the board of health of a city has been authorized by statute to take such measures as it deems necessary to prevent the spread of dangerous communicable diseases, and to make quarantine regulations, it may properly adopt a regulation requiring the disinfection of all imported rags, at the expense of the owner. Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. (1887) 144 Mass. 523, 59 Am. Rep. 113, 11 N. E. 929.

So, the delegation of power to enact all laws or ordinances necessary to preserve the health of the city and to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, contained in the charter of the city of Baltimore, has been held to authorize an ordinance imposing on the captain, owner, or consignee of any vessel coming to quarantine with persons on board afflicted with smallpox, the expenses incurred in disinfecting persons or property on board the vessel. Harrison v. Baltimore (1848) 1 Gill (Md.) 264.

Contract or expenditure.

In Hazen v. Strong (1830) 2 Vt. 427, wherein it appeared that the selectmen of a town had been delegated by statute the authority to take measures to prevent the spreading of smallpox when any person in the town should become infected therewith, the court held that the delegation of power carried with it the right to vote a tax to defray the expenses of inoculating the inhabitants with kinpox, as a measure to prevent the spreading of the disease.

So, under a statute delegating to cities and villages the power to make all regulations which may be necessary for the suppression of disease, a city may lease property for the purpose of providing a smallpox hospital thereon. Chicago v. Peck (1900) 98 Ill. App. 434, affirmed in (1902) 196 Ill. 260, 63 N. E. 711. See to the same effect, Anderson v. O'Conner (1884) 98 Ind. 168, and Turner v. Toledo (1898) 8 Ohio C. D. 196.

Likewise, the power given to a local board to "make such regulations as are necessary for the protection of the public health respecting . . . causes of sickness . . . and quarantine; to proclaim and establish quarantine against all infectious or contagious diseases dangerous to the public, and maintain and remove the same," has been held to be sufficient to authorize the action of the board in refusing to permit a city to locate a pesthouse on land owned by it within the township. Warner v. Stebbins (1900) 111 Iowa, 86, 82 N. W. 457.

Where a statute required the common council to adopt measures for the preservation of the public health, the court held that the power of the council was commensurate with its duty, and it might properly engage the services of individuals to stay a contagion, for which services the city would be liable. Rae v. Flint (1883) 51 Mich. 526, 16 N. W. 887. See to the same effect, Elliott v. Kalkaska (1885) 58 Mich. 452, 55 Am. Rep. 706, 25 N. W. 461, and Turner v. Toledo (Ohio) supra.

2. Measures held not authorized.

Quarantine.

A general delegation of power to guard against the spread of contagion cannot validly be exercised by the adoption of arbitrary or oppressive quarantine regulations. See, generally, State v. Kirby (1903) 120 Iowa, 26, 94 N. W. 254, and Hurst v. Warner (1894) 102 Mich. 238, 26 L.R.A. 484, 47 Am. St. Rep. 525, 60 N. W. 440.

In People v. Tait (1913) 261 Ill. 197, 103 N. E. 750, the court, in discussing the statutory delegation of power to county boards to make rules regulating quarantine, said: "Boards of health may not exercise the powers vested in them, arbitrarily, and without reference to existing conditions. It never was the intention of the legislature to grant unlimited discretion to these boards, the exercise of which might deprive citizens of legal rights, when no public necessity existed for so doing. Such boards have neither legislative nor judicial powers. Their functions are purely ministerial, and must be exercised within reasonable limits, for the purpose of suppressing diseases and preserving the health of the people, which is the purpose for which they are created."

Thus, it has been held that a provision of a city charter, delegating to the health commissioner the duty of taking measures to preserve the public health from impending contagion, and a further statutory provision delegating to local boards of health the duty of guarding against the introduction of contagious and infectious diseases, are alike inadequate to authorize the act of a health commissioner in quarantining a person because of his refusal to submit to vaccination. Re Smith (1895) 146 N. Y. 68, 28 L.R.A. 820, 48 Am. St. Rep. 769, 40 N. E. 497.

The holding in Re Smith (N. Y.) supra, was followed in Smith v. Emery (1896) 11 App. Div. 10, 42 N. Y. Supp. 258, an action between the same parties to recover as for a false imprisonment, the court stating that the board delegation of power to the health authorities to quarantine persons exposed to contagion was to be exercised only where an individual had been exposed to the disease under circumstances which would have permitted the communication of it.

So, in Sumner v. Philadelphia (1873) 9 Phila. (Pa.) 408, the court, saying that a broad statutory delegation of power to a board of health to administer quarantine regulations does not give unlimited authority, and is not to be exercised arbitrarily, held that, where an infected vessel is detained after it has been completely cleansed, such further detention is unauthorized.

Likewise, in Wragg v. Griffin (1919) — Iowa, —, 2 A.L.R. 1327, 170 N. W. 400, it was held that statutes providing for state and local boards of health, which should make such rules as might be found necessary, including quarantine, to preserve the public health, did not delegate the power to restrain a person suspected of having a contagious disease, for the purpose of extracting blood from his veins by way of determining his affliction.

So, in Ex parte Dillon (1919) — Cal. App. —, 186 Pac. 170, it was said that, while it is true, "where sufficient cause exists to believe that a person is afflicted with a quarantinable disease, there is no doubt of the right of the health authorities to examine into the case," the power depends on the existence of reasonable ground to believe that the person is so afflicted. It was accordingly held that a local board of health had no authority, under a general delegation of power to protect the public health, to detain and examine for venereal disease all persons arrested on charges of sexual crime.

And see Taylor v. Adair County (1905) 119 Ky. 374, 84 S. W. 299, wherein the court held that a county board of health, which was authorized by statute to establish quarantines and to determine the necessities of each situation from the facts then existing, must act as a board on each case or epidemic as it arose, and that such power could not be delegated to a single health officer. That holding was approved and followed in Hickman County v. Scarborough (1912) 150 Ky. 1, 149 S. W. 1116.

Excluding other methods of treatment.

In Trabue v. Todd County (1907) 125 Ky. 809, 102 S. W. 309, the court held that a county board of health, authorized by statute to inaugurate and execute such rules as it deemed necessary to prevent the spread of contagious diseases, did not have the right to adopt a resolution placing the health officer of the county in exclusive charge of all contagious diseases and the methods of attending thereto, since the power delegated by the statute was not intended to prevent persons from attending to such diseases by any reasonable means of their own.

Seizure of property.

The fact that a local board of health had been given the power to prescribe such measures as it deemed necessary for the protection of the inhabitants from dangerous diseases has been held not to authorize a member of the board to take control of the premises of a person, merely because smallpox existed thereon, the court saying: "By the general authority to take such measures as are deemed necessary for the safety of the inhabitants, it is not intended to confer unlimited authority on the board to control persons and property at its discretion." Brown v. Murdock (1885) 140 Mass. 314, 3 N. E. 208.

So, it has been held that a statute, authorizing the selectmen to make regulations governing the quarantine of vessels arriving in port, did not authorize them to take a contaminated vessel into their own possession and control, to the exclusion of the owner. Mitchell v. Rockland (1856) 41 Me. 363, 66 Am. Dec. 252. On a further appeal in (1858) 45 Me. 496, a new trial was granted because of erroneous instructions, but the rule of law stated was affirmed, and later reaffirmed in (1860) 52 Me. 118.

Likewise, it has been held that a statute delegating to local boards of health the power to make provisions for the safety of the inhabitants where a person became infected with a disease dangerous to others, and to provide a hospital for the infected persons, and to take such other measures as they might judge to be necessary for the safety of the public, did not delegate the right to take possession of a dwelling house and the furniture therein, to the exclusion of the occupant or owner, and without his consent, and to use the dwelling as a hospital. Spring v. Hyde Park (1884) 137 Mass. 554, 50 Am. Rep. 334.

Prohibiting sale or importation of property.

In Kosciusko v. Slomberg (1891) 68 Miss. 469, 12 L.R.A. 528, 24 Am. St. Rep. 281, 9 So. 297, it appeared that a municipality, pursuant to the authority vested therein by its charter, to establish and enforce quarantine and regulations necessary to the health of its people, enacted an ordinance de-declaring it unlawful to bring in or offer for sale secondhand clothing, without proof that it did not come from a locality in which contagion or infection was or had been prevailing. There was no epidemic or other circumstances rendering the ordinance necessary to preserve the public health, and the court held that such an exercise of power was not authorized, in the absence of a real necessity therefor.

It seems to be the better rule that, during an epidemic of smallpox, a general delegation of power to take measures against the spread of contagion authorizes an order requiring vaccination as a prerequisite to attendance in the public schools. Blue v. Beach (1900) 155 Ind. 121, 50 L.R.A. 64, 80 Am. St. Rep. 195, 56 N. E. 89; Highland Park Graded Common School Dist. v. McMurtry (1916) 169 Ky. 457, 184 S. W. 390; State ex rel. Cox v. Board of Education (1900) 21 Utah, 401, 60 Pac. 1013.

In the leading case of Blue v. Beach (Ind.) supra, the court held that under the statutory power vested in the state board of health to adopt rules to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases, and in view of a rule adopted by the state board, requiring local boards of health to compel the vaccination of all persons in their districts in case of threatened contagion, the promulgation of such an order by the local board was, under such circumstances, a proper exercise of its delegated power.

So, in Highland Park Graded Common School Dist. v. McMurtry (1916) 169 Ky. 457, 184 S. W. 390, the question arose whether a county board of health, by virtue of its general delegated power to inaugurate such rules as might be necessary to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious disease, might direct the vaccination of all school children as a condition precedent to attending school. The court held that when there existed a reasonable apprehension of a smallpox epidemic, such power might properly be exercised, saying: "Although we have no direct statutory direction on this subject, a reasonable construction of the liberal powers conferred by the statute in the creation of these boards would imply a grant of authority to adopt, in reference to public schools, such measures as were here taken. Indeed, it would be extremely unfortunate if the legislature had limited the power of these boards in respect to dealing with situations such as this, or if the court should restrain them from taking such measures as might be by them deemed necessary to prevent an outbreak and epidemic of this disease in public schools, because there is scarcely any place where an outbreak of smallpox would spread with more rapidity, or over a wider territory, than if it found a starting place in one of the public schools, attended by hundreds of children. . . . Of course, these boards cannot adopt unreasonable or arbitrary rules or regulations or, without cause, harass the public, or needlessly subject individuals to expense or inconvenience, or act unless they have reasonable grounds to believe that the action taken is necessary to prevent or suppress the disease sought to be controlled. And we have no doubt of the jurisdiction of the courts to restrain these boards if they should undertake to exert authority not fairly within the powers conferred by the statute, or plainly not needed for the purpose of conserving or protecting the health of the people, or preventing the outbreak or spread of infectious or contagious diseases."

The statute under consideration in State ex rel. Cox v. Board of Education (Utah) supra, provided that local boards of health, with the assistance of the public officers of the district, should enforce the necessary rules and regulations concerning cholera, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases, and should have jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to the preservation of the health of those attending public schools, and, in addition, might exclude from the schools any persons liable to convey such disease. During a time when smallpox was prevalent, the board of health and the board of education resolved that no pupil should be admitted to the schools without having been vaccinated. The court held that the resolution was justified by a reasonable construction of the statute.

In State ex rel. Freeman v. Zimmerman (1902) 86 Minn. 353, 58 L.R.A. 78, 91 Am. St. Rep. 351, 90 N. W. 783, the court held that a general grant of power to make such rules and regulations as might be deemed necessary for the protection of the public health was sufficient to authorize the local authorities, under circumstances rendering such action reasonably necessary, to make and enforce a regulation prescribing vaccination as a condition precedent to the admission of children to the public schools. As to the construction of statutes granting such general powers, the court said: "In view of the importance of the interests confided to the care of health officers, the various statutes conferring such powers should, notwithstanding the individual liberty of the citizens is in a large measure involved, receive a broad and liberal construction in aid of the beneficial purposes of their enactment."

The action of a county board of health in enforcing a regulation adopted by the state board of health, which required the vaccination of all school children as a condition precedent to their admission to the public schools, was upheld in Hill v. Bickers (1916) 171 Ky. 703, 188 S. W. 766, though smallpox was not prevalent at the time, where the state board of health, in promulgating the rule, was acting under a broad delegation of power to make regulations for the prevention of disease. But the court said: "Unless such power is clearly conferred, local bodies may not require vaccination, in the absence of smallpox or the apprehension of an immediate outbreak thereof."

In other jurisdictions, it seems that a general delegation of the health power does not warrant a requirement of vaccination, except in the presence of a serious epidemic. Thus, under the provisions of an Illinois statute that the state board of health "shall have charge of all matters pertaining to quarantine, and shall have authority to make such rules and regulations, and such sanitary investigations, as they may from time to time deem necessary for the preservation or improvement of public health," it has been held that an order of the state board of health that after a certain date no pupil should be admitted to any public school in the state without previous vaccination, when the pupil had not been exposed to smallpox and the disease was not prevailing in the locality, was unreasonable, and not within the delegated power of the board of health. School Directors v. Breen (1895) 60 Ill. App. 201, affirmed in (1897) 167 Ill. 67, 39 L.R.A. 152, 59 Am. St. Rep. 262, 47 N. E. 81. On similar facts, the holding in School Directors v. Breen (Ill.) supra, was approved and followed in Lawbaugh v. Board of Education (1899) 177 Ill. 572, 52 N. E. 850.

In People ex rel. Jenkins v. Board of Education (1908) 234 Ill. 422, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 709, 84 N. E. 1046, 14 Ann. Cas. 943, it appeared that, under its statutory power to make all regulations necessary for the promotion of health and suppression of disease, a city passed an ordinance requiring vaccination as a condition precedent to the admission of pupils to the public schools, and further empowering the commissioner of health to make such rules as he deemed necessary for the public safety, in case of emergency from impending contagious diseases. The court held that the action of the commissioner in declaring smallpox to be epidemic in the district, and in giving instructions to exclude unvaccinated children from the public schools, was not a lawful exercise of any power conferred on the municipality, saying that the existence of a few cases of smallpox in a large city did not create an emergency.

Similarly, in Waldschmidt v. New Braunfels (1918) — Tex. —, 207 S. W. 303, reversing (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 193 S. W. 1077, it was held that, under a general statutory grant of authority "to do all acts and make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease," a city might adopt an ordinance requiring vaccination as a condition precedent to the admission of pupils to the public schools, at a time when smallpox was more or less prevalent in the state, although there was but one case in the city, and that was "isolated, and practically convalescent."

The power to compel vaccination was also denied in Osborn v. Russell (1902) 64 Kan. 507, 68 Pac. 60, wherein it was held that the authority granted to the state board of health by a statute providing that "the state board of health shall supervise the health interests of the people of the state, and that the state board of health shall adopt and publish such rules and order of business as may be necessary to make this act effective," was not sufficient to uphold a regulation of the board that every pupil who had not been successfully vaccinated should be excluded from the public schools. The existence of an epidemic was alleged in that case, but the alleged fact was not referred to by the court. R. E. B.

CHARLES F. RUDDY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HERMAN J. ROSSI.

1. The exemption of homestead lands, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2296, from liability to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent, extends to debts incurred by a homesteader after obtaining the receiver's final receipt and certificate, but before the patent has actually been issued.

2. Congress has power to prevent the sale of lands on execution to satisfy a judgment obtained after final patent had issued upon debts incurred prior to that time, but after the receiver's final receipt and certificate have been obtained.

[See 22 R. C. L. 265-267.]

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Idaho to review a judgment which, modifying a judgment of the District Court for Shoshone County, held that homestead lands could be sold on execution to satisfy a judgment upon debts incurred by a homesteader after obtaining the receiver's final receipt and certificate, but before the patent had actually issued. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles E. Miller and A. H. Featherstone, for plaintiff in error:

It is within the jurisdiction and power, and is the duty, of the Land Department, to inquire into and determine questions brought to its attention touching the legality or validity of claims asserted under the Public Land Laws, at any time prior to the issuance of patent.

Re Hyde, 33 Land Dec. 639.

The action of the local land officers upon questions of law or fact respecting the disposal of the public lands does not conclude their superior officers or the government. Such action is, in all cases, reviewable by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and by the Secretary of the Interior, as the proper administration of the law or demands of justice may require.

Mr. Carlton Fox also for plaintiff in error.

No appearance for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

By "An Act to Secure Homesteads to Actual Settlers on the Public Do-main," approved May 20, 1862, 12 Stat. at L. 392, chap. 75, Comp. Stat. § 4530, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 543, Congress prescribed the conditions under which citizens could acquire unappropriated public lands in tracts of not exceeding 160 acres. A manifest purpose was to induce settlement upon and cultivation of these lands by those who, five years after proper entry, would become owners in fee through issuance of patents. The great end in view was to convert waste places into per-manent homes. Such occupancy and use constituted a most important consideration and were rightly ex-pected to yield larger public benefits than the small required payment of $1.25 per acre.

Decision of this cause requires us to consider the meaning and validity of § 4 of the act [Rev. Stat. § 2296, Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575], which provides: "No lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor."

Plaintiff in error made preliminary homestead entry of designated land within the state of Idaho August 6, 1913; submitted final proofs October 4, 1909; obtained final receipt and certificate November 12, 1909; final patent issued August 26, 1912. In 1914 two judgments were obtained against him: the first upon indebtedness incurred prior to November 12, 1909; the second upon debts contracted subsequent to that date and prior to patent. Executions were issued and levied upon the homestead; and thereupon the original proceeding was begun to declare asserted liens invalid and a cloud upon the title. The court below held the first judgment unenforceable against the land, since it represented indebtedness which accrued prior to final entry. It further held the second judgment could be so enforced, as it was based upon debts contracted after final entry, at which time the homesteader became legally entitled to his patent: 28 Idaho, 376, 154 Pac. 977.

The language of § 4 is clear, and we find no adequate reason for thinking that it fails precisely to express the lawmakers' intention.

Did Congress have power to restrict alienation of homestead lands after conveyance by the United States in fee simple? This question undoubtedly presents difficulties which we are not disposed to minimize. In Wright v. Morgan, 191 U. S. 55, 58, 48 L. ed. 89, 93, 24 Sup.

Ct. Rep. 6, a similar point was suggested, but not decided.

The Constitution declares: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States;" and it is settled that Congress has plenary power to dispose of public lands. United States v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. 526, 537, 10 L. ed. 573, 578. They may be leased, sold, or given away upon such terms and conditions as the public interests require. Instead of granting fee-simple titles with exemption from certain debts, long leases might have been made or conditional titles bestowed in such fashion as practically to protect homesteads from all indebtedness.

"The sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421, 4 L. ed. 579, 605.

Acting within its discretion, Congress determined that, in order promptly to dispose of public lands and bring about their permanent occupation and development, it was proper to create the designated exemption; and we are unable to say that the conclusion was ill-founded, or that the means were either prohibited or not appropriate to the adequate performance of the high duties which the legislature owed to the public.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause re-

Reversed and remanded.

Mr. Justice Holmes:

This case involves a question of theory that may be important, and I think it desirable to state the considerations that make me doubt.

The facts needing to be mentioned are few. On August 26, 1912, the United States conveyed land in Idaho to Ruddy in fee simple, in pursuance of a homestead entry by Ruddy on August 6, 1903, final proof on October 4, 1909, and final receipt of the purchase price on November 12, 1909. In September, 1912, after the conveyance, Rossi began suits against Ruddy, attaching this land, and in June, 1914, levied executions upon the same. The debts for which the suits were brought were incurred before the issue of the patent, and the present proceeding is to prevent Rossi from selling the land to satisfy the judgments. The question arises under Rev. Stat. § 2296, Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575, providing that no lands acquired under that chapter shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor. The supreme court of Idaho narrowed the issue to the case of debts contracted after final proof, but that distinction is not important to the difficulty in my mind.

My question is this: When land has left the ownership and control of the United States and is part of the territory of a state, not different from any other privately owned land within the jurisdiction, and no more subject to legislation on the part of the United States than any other land, on what ground is a previous law of Congress supposed any longer to affect it in a way that a subsequent one could not? This land was levied upon not on the assertion that any lien upon it was acquired before the title passed from the United States, but merely as any other land might be attached for a debt that Rossi had a right to collect, after the United States had left the premises. I ask myself what the United States has to do with that. There is no condition, no reserved right of re-entry, no reversion in the United States, saved either under the Idaho law, as any private grantor might save it, or by virtue of antecedent title. All interest of the United States as owner is at an end. It is a stranger to the title. Even in case of an escheat the land would not go to it, but would go to the state. Therefore the statute must operate, if at all, purely by way of legislation, not as a qualification of the grant. If § 2296 is construed to apply to this case, there is simply the naked assumption of one sovereignty to impose its will after whatever jurisdiction or authority it had has ceased and the land has come fully under the jurisdiction of what for this purpose is a different power. It is a pure attempt to regulate the alienability of land in Idaho by law, without regard to the will of Idaho, which we must assume on this record to authorize the levy if it is not prevented by an act of Congress occupying a paramount place.

I believe that this court never has gone farther in the way of sustaining legislation concerning land within a state than to uphold a law forbidding the inclosure of public lands, which little, if at all, exceeded the rights of a private owner, although it was construed to prevent the erection of fences upon the defendants' own property, manifestly for the sole purpose of inclosing land of the United States. Canfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. ed. 260, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864. At most it was a protection of the present interests of the United States under a title paramount to the state. On the other hand, it is said in Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. 212, 224, 11 L. ed. 565, 571, that no power in the nature of municipal sovereignty can be exercised by the United States within a state; that such a power is repugnant to the Constitution. This case was referred to in Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. 84, 15 L. ed. 816, and it was decided that the act of Congress authorizing the formation of the state of Mississippi, and providing that the Mississippi river should be forever free, "could have no effect to restrict the new state in any of its attributes as an independent sovereign government," and both these cases were cited upon this point with approval in Ward v. Racehorse, 163 U. S. 504, 511, 512, 41 L. ed. 244, 246, 247, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1076. See also Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 27, 38 L. ed. 331, 341, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548. In Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How. 558, 15 L. ed. 994, where it was held that the laws of a territory abolishing constructive trusts were ineffectual to protect the holder of a certificate from the United States against the establishment of such a trust, it was said that "when the subject, and all control over it, shall have passed from the United States, and have become vested in a citizen or resident of the territory, then indeed the territorial regulations may operate upon it;" and later in the decision there is cited a passage from Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 498, 517, 10 L. ed. 264, 273, to the same effect,—a passage also cited and relied upon by the four justices who dissented and held that the territorial laws governed even then. It has been repeated ever since. McCune v. Essig, 199 U. S. 382, 390, 50 L. ed. 237, 241, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 78; Buchser v. Buchser, 281 U. S. 157, 161, 58 L. ed. 166, 167, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46.

Coming to the precise issue, the question of the power of the United States to restrict alienation of land within a state after it had conveyed the land in fee was left open in Wright v. Morgan, 191 U. S. 55, 58, 48 L. ed. 89, 93, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, but it was said that the clearest expression would be necessary before it would be admitted that such a restriction was imposed. In Buchser v. Buchser, 231 U. S. 157, 58 L. ed. 166, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46, it was held that the laws of the United States did not prevent homestead land becoming community property at the moment that title was acquired, and it was said that, the acquisition under the United States law being complete, that law had released its control. The statement in Wilcox v. Jackson, supra, that when the title has passed, the land, "like all other property in the state, is subject to state legislation," was repeated. In Alabama v. Schmidt, 232 U. S. 168, 58 L. ed. 555, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, following Cooper v. Roberts, 18 How. 173, 15 L. ed. 338, it was held that land conveyed to the state by the United States for the use of schools could be acquired by adverse possession under state law, and that the trust, although, as was said in the earlier case, "a sacred obligation imposed on its public faith," imposed only an honorary obligation on the state. Northern P. R. Co. v. Townsend, 190 U. S. 267, 47 L. ed. 1044, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 671, was distinguished as having been decided on the ground that in the grant to the railway there was an implied condition of reverter in case the company ceased to hold the land for the purpose for which it was granted,—a ground which, as I have said, is absent here.

It is said that where a statute is susceptible of two constructions, by one of which grave constitutional questions arise and by the other of which they are avoided, our duty is to adopt the latter. United States ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & H. Co. 213 U. S. 366, 408, 53 L. ed. 836, 849, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527. I am aware that this principle, like some others, more often is invoked in aid of a conclusion reached on other grounds than made itself the basis of decision, but it seems to me that it properly should govern here. It might without violence. When the Act of 1862 [12 Stat. at L. 393, chap. 75], now Rev. Stat. § 2296, Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575, was passed, the United States owned territories to which it could be applied with full scope. Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How. 558, 15 L. ed. 994. The greater part of the public land was in those territories. Without stopping to suggest other possibilities of construction, this fact is enough to explain and give validity to the act when passed. There is no need to import to it the intent to anticipate the future, and to reach the states that were still in the bosom of time.

Of course, the United States has power to choose appropriate means for exercising the authority given to it by the Constitution. But I see no sufficient ground for extending that authority to a case like this. It is not the business of the United States to determine the policy to be pursued concerning privately owned land within a state. According to all cases in this court, so far as I know, when the patent issued its authority was at an end.

I am aware that my doubts are contrary to manifest destiny and to a number of decisions in the state courts. I know also that when common understanding and practice have established a way it is a waste of time to wander in bypaths of logic. But as I have a real difficulty in understanding how the congressional restriction is held to govern this case,—a question which nothing that I have heard as yet appears to me to answer,—I think it worth while to mention my misgivings, if only to show that they have been considered and are not shared.

NOTE.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the reported case (RUDDY v. ROSSI, ante, 843), to the effect that the exemption of homestead lands under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2296 (Comp. Stat. § 4551, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 575) from liability for debts contracted prior to the issuance of the patent, extends to debts incurred after obtaining the receiver's final receipt or certificate, but before the patent has actually been issued, settles a question as to which some doubt was previously entertained, as is shown by the decision of the state court (28 Idaho, 376, 154 Pac. 977), which is reversed by the reported decision.

STATE OF KANSAS

v.

MRS. L. O. HEITMAN, Appt.

(105 Kan. 139, 181 Pac. 630.)

Constitutional law — different punishments for men and women.

Chapter 298 of the Laws of 1917, establishing an institution known as the state industrial farm for women, for the detention and care of women convicted of criminal offenses, does not violate any of the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, because a woman convicted of misdemeanor is sentenced to the farm for an undetermined period, with a maximum limit, while a man convicted of the same misdemeanor is sentenced, under the general law, to the county jail for a definite period, within the same maximum limit.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County (Garver, J.) assessing the penalty, after conviction, for keeping and maintaining a liquor nuisance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Edward Rooney, for appellant:

Chapter 298 of the Session Laws of 1917 is unconstitutional and in contravention of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, abridging the privileges of defendant and denying her the equal protection of the law.

Messrs. Richard J. Hopkins, Attorney General, and Hugh T. Fisher for the State.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of keeping a liquor nuisance. She was sentenced to pay a fine of $100, and was committed to the state industrial farm for women until discharged according to law. She appeals from the portion of the judgment assessing penalty.

The statute under which the defendant was convicted is § 1 of chapter 232 of the Laws of 1901. After declaring what places are common nuisances, the statute provides as follows: "Every person who maintains or assists in maintaining such common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, and by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty days nor more than six months, for each offense." Gen. Stat. 1915, § 5524.

The fine was assessed under this statute. The commitment was adjudged under the provisions of § 5 of chapter 298 of the Laws of 1917, reading as follows: "Every female person, above the age of eighteen years, who shall be convicted of any offense against the criminal laws of this state, punishable by imprisonment, shall be sentenced to the state industrial farm for women, but the court imposing such sentence shall not fix the limit or duration of the sentence. The term of imprisonment of any person so convicted and sentenced shall be terminated by the state board of administration, as authorized by this act, but such imprisonment shall not exceed the maximum term provided by law for the crime for which the person was convicted; provided, that where the person, so convicted and sentenced to said industrial farm for women, is not more than twenty-five years of age and said conviction is for her first offense, the board of administration may parole or release such person under rules and regulations prescribed by said board before the expiration of the minimum term, but in all other cases, the person so committed to said institution shall not be eligible to parole by the board of administration until the expiration of the minimum term fixed by law for the punishment of the offense for which she has been convicted; provided further, that where any person has been committed to such institution on conviction for murder in the first or second degree, such person shall not be released from said institution until the expiration of the term for which such person is sentenced, except by action of the governor exercising his pardoning or parole power."

The detention portion of the defendant's sentence was therefore indeterminate, with a maximum limit of six months. If the defendant had been a man, the sentence would have been to the county jail for some definite period within the maximum and minimum limits fixed by the statute in 1901. Because the defendant was sentenced to detention for an undetermined period at the state industrial farm for women, she contends she has been denied the equal protection of the law, and that her privileges and immunities have been abridged, contrary to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Some other objections to the industrial farm law are proposed, but they have already been disposed of in the cases of State v. Dunkerton, 103 Kan. 748, 175 Pac. 981, and Re Dunkerton, 104 Kan. 481, 3 A.L.R. 1611, 179 Pac. 347.

In support of the defendant's contention, the familiar decisions are cited which declare that, in the administration of criminal justice, no different or higher punishment shall be imposed on one than that which is prescribed for all, for the same offense. The reason for striving to base justice on equality is probably best stated in Rudolf von Ihering's "Law as a Means to an End," chapter VII. § 11, translated from the German and published as volume 5 of the Modern Legal Philosophy Series:

"What is there so great in equality that we measure the highest concept of right—for this is what justice is—by it? Why should law strive after equality, when all nature denies it? And what value has equality independently of any particular content? Equality may be as much as anything else equality of misery. Is it a consolation for the criminal to know that the punishment which has overtaken him will also strike all others in the same position? The desire for equality seems to have its ultimate ground in an ugly trait of the human heart; in ill will and envy. No one shall be better or less badly off than I; if I am miserable, everybody else, too, shall be so.

"But the reason we want equality in law is not because it is something worth striving after in itself, for it is not so at all. We see to it that, with all the equalizing powers of the law, inequality finds its way back again by a thousand paths. But, indeed, our reason for wanting it is because it is the condition of the welfare of society. When the burdens which society imposes upon its members are distributed unequally, not only does that part suffer which is too heavily laden, but the whole of society. The center of gravity is displaced, the equilibrium is disturbed, and the natural consequence is a social struggle for the purpose of re-establishing equilibrium; which under certain conditions becomes a highly dangerous menace, and is always a shock to the existing social order." Page 276.

Differences, however, cannot be denied or disregarded, and the very principle of equality not only approves, but necessitates, classification, without which fixation of the social center of gravity and stable equilibrium of the social order would be impossible. It would revolt justice if youthful first offenders were subjected to the same penal regimen as mature recidivists. Hence the decisions are numerous and familiar that equal protection of the law is secured if the law operate in the same way on all who belong in the same class. Classes may not be created arbitrarily or unreasonably, or the principle of equality would be violated. There must be some difference in character, condition, or situation to justify distinction, and this difference must bear a just and proper relation to the proposed classification and regulation; otherwise, the classification is forced and unreal, and greater burdens are, in fact, imposed on some than on others of the same desert. The defendant asserts that sex does not constitute a just and reasonable ground for substituting an indeterminate sentence, within a stated limit, to the industrial farm for women, in place of a definite sentence, within the same limit, to the county jail.

In the years between enactment of the Statutes of 1901 and 1917, application of the scientific method in dealing with the subjects of crime and punishment has produced noteworthy results. Crime is no longer treated abstractly, according to the a priori method, and punishment no longer consists of penalties sawed into stock lengths and corded up by the judges' bench, for use in passing sentence.

Every act condemned by our Penal Code is proper, perhaps laudable, somewhere in the world. Each civil society governmentally organized has a conception, more or less definite, of its own best interest and welfare, and sets up standards of conduct to which the individual is supposed to conform. Failure to measure up to the prescribed standards may be of such public concern that the state must attach sanctions to its regulations. When the state shall do this is a practical question, to be determined with respect to circumstances and conditions. Departure from the standard thus sanctioned we call crime, and the nonconformist we call a criminal.

Investigation of the facts discloses that the nonconformist generally acts through the prompting of some perfectly natural instinct, such as the pugnacious instinct, the sex instinct, or the inquisitive instinct. The state itself, by the creation or toleration of untoward conditions, may contribute to delinquency. Statistics have been published showing that, in the year 1916, in the state of Massachusetts, 176,000 arrests were made. Of these, 104,000 were for drunkenness; and consequently the legally recognized sale of intoxicating liquor under government license was directly responsible for crime. Conditions resulting from social and economic pressure are contributing causes of crime; but the nonconformist fails to measure up to the normal standard, primarily and principally, on account of some personal subnormality or abnormality of body or mind or both. The result is that the study of crime, not neglecting the social factor, becomes largely the study of individuals.

Individuals cannot be studied en masse. They may be classified into groups, on the basis of common characteristics; but the individual cannot be assigned to his proper group until he has been segregated, and his peculiar physical and mental endowments, or lack of endowments, have been considered in the light of his heredity and environment.

The method which has just been described must be employed in affixing punishment. Care must be taken that, in denouncing punishment, which is done in the interest of society, society itself does not suffer, for punishment is a two-edged sword. In ancient barbarous days it was discovered that it was to the advantage of the conqueror not to kill his captives; they were more profitable kept alive, fed well, well cared for, and put to work. In the same way, society now loses if it punish one of its members in a way that crushes him, when it might rehabilitate him and restore him to conformity and usefulness.

The old theory of vengeance and retribution, carried out in medieval times in torture chambers with implements of torture, and in modern times by means more degrading, if less severe, wholly failed to better social conditions. The theory of deterrence by horrible example did no better. In the reign of Henry VIII. 70,000 thieves were hung, and it was found more pockets were picked during the hangings than at any other time. For a remarkably long time our criminal and penal jurisprudence suffered from the paralysis of outgrown traditions, the application of antiquated methods, and the employment of archaic equipment. As the results of patient, careful, scientific study and experiment, sifted, compared, and corrected in conferences and congresses, national and international, became generally known, and the practical work of individual criminologists, penologists, and social reformers commenced to attract general attention, the public mind and conscience slowly awakened. State legislatures commenced to take notice. In very recent years progress has been rapid, and there are now few to deny that it is best for society—is simply common sense—to try to float from off the rocks of the penal law and save, if possible, for future profitable voyaging, human vessels stranded there, whether by fog, or ill wind, or defective steering gear, or bad seamanship.

Quite obviously it is of fundamental importance that the nature of the particular vessel be considered, in order that proper measures may be adopted to save it; and Mrs. Jessie D. Hodder, superintendent of the reformatory for women at Framingham, Massachusetts, made the following classification of women sentenced to reformatories for crime: With reference to intellect, they may be imbecile, moron, sub-normal, dull, fair, or good; with reference to nervous organization, they may be normal, neuropathic, psychopathic, epileptic, or hysterical. These are only some of the factors which determine whether or not a delinquent woman needs permanent custodial care, may safely be returned to society after training, or presents a special and peculiar disciplinary problem. Proceedings of International Conference of Social Work, 45th Annual Session (1918) page 117.

The one unqualifiedly reprobated and repudiated punitive institution is the county jail. It has no defenders, except local officials, jealous of centralized authority, and the sheriff, elected irrespective of qualifications to rehabilitate men and women, even if he had facilities and opportunity, and whose compensation depends in part on fees for keeping and boarding prisoners. There is no opportunity for segregation, differentiation, and proper classification. There is no opportunity for discipline at all, much less discipline appropriate to individual need. There is nothing but detention, and detention in caged and demoralizing idleness, injurious to body and mind, crushing to the spirit, and tending to moral contamination and induration, rather than to moral upbuilding. The consensus of enlightened opinion is that the county jail is impossible as a place of punishment, and has no justification for its existence, except as a place of temporary keeping, in default of bail, pending final conviction.

Another relic of the stone age of penological theory and practice is the definite sentence for a fixed period for a specific crime. It has been well said that it is just as stupid, and infinitely more cruel, to sentence misdemeanants to jail for fixed periods as it would be to sentence sick people to a hospital for fixed periods. All penologists agree that the definite sentence should be abolished, because, if the primary object be to return to society as future assets those who are present liabilities, there must be classification, and there must be time, according to susceptibility and capability, for the remedial, reformatory, and educational processes to have their effect. In a given case, the period of detention may be quite short; but, according to need, the brain must be cooled, the nerves nourished and quieted, the clouded or deadened conscience cleared or quickened, the weakened will strengthened, the disordered mind, with its confused notions of right and morality, stabilized, and fresh impulses given outward, away from the old self, forward to new and hopeful things, and upward to self-respect and self-control.

Comprehension of the fact that punishment ought to fit, in some degree, not simply the crime, but the offender, led the legislature to adopt the system of maximum and minimum penalties found in the Crimes Act and related statutes. Clearer comprehension led it to adopt, in recent years, the indeterminate sentence for felonies, except murder and treason (1903), and the parole system (1907).

Experience teaches that the greatest evil of prison life is idleness, and that the greatest benefaction which can be conferred on a prisoner is work adapted to his abilities and performed under clever plan and guidance. Work is indispensable to order and discipline, to physical and mental health, and to growth in moral strength and stature. Work should not be merely useless or formal, but should be at something capable of arousing interest and generating the feeling that what is done is worth while. There should even be some division of the profit from labor between the workman and his employer, the state. The best results are attained when work is performed in an environment as nearly as possible natural and normal, and the results of work done in the sunshine and wind and free air of the open outdoors, away from barred cells and frowning, guard-mounted walls, have been most gratifying. Some of the states are able to present records of success attending this method of treatment which, contrasted with old prison policies, are quite marvelous.

The circumstance that the new method of dealing with convicts happens to be more humanitarian than the old does not detract from its virtue. It has been adopted after trial, not from sentiment, but because of its demonstrated efficiency in protecting and promoting the true and ultimate welfare of society as a whole.

Long ago the legislature made the first and most obvious classification of delinquents, and provided for segregation of youthful offenders, and treatment of boys and girls in separate corrective institutions. By enactment of the industrial farm statute, the legislature made the next most obvious classification, based on the distinction between male and female, and abolished the county jail and the penitentiary as places for the reformatory treatment of women.

The industrial farm law puts into practice the most advanced tenets of the new penology. The farm is under supervision of the state board of administration, the central body having control of all correctional, charitable, and educational institutions of the state. The superintendent is a woman. The farm is in fact a farm, and the buildings are constructed on the cottage plan. Provision is made against overcrowding, and there are no cells or bars or restraining walls. Careful classifications are made, according to the results of searching physical, mental, and moral diagnosis, and complete records are kept of all facts throwing light on cause of detention, proper plan of treatment, and progress of the individual. Medical and surgical treatment is administered. The discipline is educative and reformatory, and the work includes agriculture, dairying, poultry raising, manufacturing, and practice of domestic arts and sciences. Small wages are allowed, and provision is made for parole and final discharge whenever compatible with the welfare of society, with full restoration of all civil rights.

It required no anatomist, or physiologist or psychologist, or psychiatrist to tell the legislature that women are different from men. In structure and function human beings are still as they were in the beginning, "male and female created He them." It is a patent and deeplying fact that these fundamental anatomical and physiological differences affect the whole psychic organization. They create the differences in personality between men and women, and personality is the predominating factor in delinquent careers. It was inevitable that, in the ages during which woman has been bearer of the race, her unique and absolutely personal experiences, from the time of conception to the time when developed offspring attains maturity, should react on personality, and produce what we understand to be embraced by the term "womanhood." Woman enters spheres of sensation, perception, emotion, desire, knowledge, and experience, of an intensity and of a kind which man cannot know. Her individualities and peculiarities are fostered by education and by social custom,—whether false and artificial or not is of no consequence here; and the result is a feminine type radically different from the masculine type, which demands special consideration in the study and treatment of nonconformity to law.

It is not worth while discussing the necessity of preventing promiscuous association of the sexes in prison. There must be complete segregation. Female wards in men's prisons, and female annexes to men's prisons, merely separate the sexes. They do not differentiate the problem of the delinquent female from the problem of the delinquent male. In 1869 the legislature of the state of Indiana undertook to do this, by establishing a separate prison for women, to be officered and managed by women, and conducted according to the reformatory method as then apprehended. Since 1869 some thirteen other states have established separate institutions for the treatment of delinquent women, on the definite principle of reclamation as opposed to naked punishment. The industrial farm, with buildings constructed on the cottage plan, has become an accepted type, and the indeterminate sentence has been almost, though not quite, universally adopted. An extended analysis of the statutes in existence prior to January 1, 1917, which therefore does not include the later statutes of Connecticut, Kansas, Michigan, and Rhode Island, may be found in volume 8 of the Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology, at page 518.

Many facts might be marshaled leading to the conclusion that the female offender not merely requires, but deserves, on account of matters touching the perpetuation and virility of the human species, correctional treatment different from the male offender, both in kind and in degree; but the general considerations, merely outlined above, are sufficient. Let it be conceded that the industrial farm for women may fail to accomplish the results hoped for; the statute represents a serious effort on the part of the legislature to deal justly with a subject of great public concern, the proposed regulations are justified by reasoning apparently sound, supported by experience apparently verifying, and this court is not authorized to declare that the classification which the statute establishes is either arbitrary or unreasonable.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statute as affected by discrimination in punishment for same offense based upon age, color, or sex.

The present annotation supplements that to Re Dunkerton, 3 A.L.R. 1614. The only decisions in point since that annotation are: The reported case (*STATE v. ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver to review a judgment affirming an order of the County Court, fixing the amount due the state as inheritance taxes on the estate of John U. Brookman, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William N. Vaile, for plaintiffs in error:

The assessment of these bonds is not authorized by the language of the Inheritance Tax Statute of Colorado.

People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 314; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 267; Eidman v. Martinez, 184 U. S. 578, 583, 46 L. ed. 697, 701, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515; Kennedy v. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. 62 Ill. 395; Heinssen v. State, 14 Colo. 282, 23 Pac. 995; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1012.

The proper subject of the tax is the inheritance; but even if the bonds be regarded as themselves the subject of the tax, they are not within the intent or language of the act, because they are not "property within the state."

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding to review a judgment of the district court affirming an order of the county court fixing the amount due the state as inheritance taxes in the estate of John U. Brookman, deceased. Brookman was a resident of the state of New York. Included in his estate were certain unregistered bonds of a Colorado corporation, the payment of which was secured by mortgage on certain real property situated in the states of Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico. The decedent held these bonds in the state of his residence. Upon the theory that they were property within this state because of the situs of some of the real property mortgaged to secure their payment, the inheritance tax appraiser imposed a tax upon their transfer by inheritance. In substance the executors contend that the tax is not authorized by the statute, on the ground that the bonds are not property within the state, within the meaning of the statute, and that to give the law a construction necessary to include and cover the bonds would be a violation of both the state and Federal Constitutions.

The Inheritance Tax Law of 1913, Laws 1913, page 539, under which the appraiser assessed the tax, is, so far as applicable, as follows: "A tax shall be, and is hereby, imposed upon the transfer of any property, real, personal, or mixed, or of any interest therein or income therefrom, in trust or otherwise, to any person or persons, institution or corporation, except as hereinafter exempted, in the following cases:

When the transfer is by will or intestate laws of property within the state, and the decedent was a nonresident of the state at the time of his death."

There is no dispute of the state's right to impose an excise on the bonds passing by inheritance, if they are to be considered as property within the state. As was stated in Brown v. Elder, 32 Colo. 527, at page 532, 77 Pac. 855: "First, an inheritance tax is not one on property, but one on the succession; second, the right to take property by devise or descent is a creature of the law, and not a natural right, and therefore the authority which confers it may impose conditions upon it. From these principles it is deduced that the state may tax privileges, discriminate between relatives, and grant exemptions, and is not precluded from this power by the provisions of the respective state constitutions requiring uniformity of taxation."

Decedent was a resident and citizen of the state of New York. The bonds, drawn to bearer, were payable in New York, and were kept by him at his domicile there. Prior to his death they manifestly were beyond the reach of the taxing power of this state, for any purpose. Upon his decease the right of succession was governed by, and subject to, the laws of New York, not of Colorado, and neither the bonds, as the measure of the tax, nor the right to take them by inheritance, which is the thing actually taxed, have any situs in this state. The rule is stated in 37 Cyc. 1562, as follows: "Shares of stock in a domestic corporation are subject to the tax at the domicile of the corporation on their transfer by will or under the intestate laws, although the decedent was a nonresident, and this is without regard to the place where the certificate may be kept. But a different rule applies to bonds of a corporation. The bonds of a domestic corporation are not taxable at the domicile of the corporation if kept at the domicile of a nonresident owner, but are subject to the tax if physically present in the state, although belonging to a nonresident decedent."

testate law, of property within the state, and the decedent was a nonresident of the state at the time of his death." Laws 1896, chap. 908, § 220, as amended by Laws 1897, chap. 284, § 2.

The court held in substance that this class of indebtedness was taxable in the state where the debtor resides, when the property is actually physically there. It is urged by the state that this case is decisive of the one at bar, and that it in effect overrules the authority relied upon by plaintiffs in error, which is primarily State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179, in which case a tax was levied upon bonds of a corporation doing business in Pennsylvania, when the bonds were kept at the domicile of the owner in another state. At page 319 the court said: "Corporations may be taxed, like natural persons, upon their property and business. But debts owing by corporations, like debts owing by individuals, are not property of the debtors in any sense; they are obligations of the debtors, and only possess value in the hands of the creditors. With them they are property, and in their hands they may be taxed. To call debts property of the debtors is simply to misuse terms. All the property there can be, in the nature of things, in debts of corporations, belongs to the creditors, to whom they are payable, and follows their domicile, wherever that may be. Their debts can have no locality separate from the parties to whom they are due. This principle might be stated in many different ways, and supported by citations from numerous adjudications, but no number of authorities, and no forms of expression could add anything to its obvious truth, which is recognized upon its simple statement.

"The bonds issued by the railroad company in this case are undoubtedly property, but property in the hands of the holders, not property of the obligors. So far as they are held by nonresidents of the state,

It is contended by the state that the fact that the payment of the bonds is secured upon property within this state brings them, as evidences of this debt, within its power for the purpose of taxation, on the ground, among others, that creditors are compelled to invoke local laws to enforce the obligation. Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, is cited and relied upon in support of this contention. The question in that case was whether a debt due an Illinois decedent by a copartnership in New York, and money deposited by him in a New York Trust Company, were taxable under a clause in the New York Inheritance Tax Statute, imposing a tax: ". . . Upon the transfer of any property, real or personal. . . . When the transfer is by will or in-

they are property beyond the jurisdiction of the state."

This principle, unless overruled by Blackstone v. Miller, supra, clearly precludes the taxation of the Brookman bonds as property within this state. That the court, in Blackstone v. Miller, supra, had no intention to overturn its decision in State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, supra, so far as it affected bonds, is clearly evident from the opinion therein, where (188 U. S. 206) the court says: "There is no conflict between our views and the point decided in the case reported under the name of State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, supra. The taxation in that case was on the interest on bonds held out of the state. Bonds and negotiable instruments are more than merely evidences of debt. The debt is inseparable from the paper which declares and constitutes it, by a tradition which comes down from more archaic conditions. Bacon v. Hooker, 177 Mass. 335, 337, 83 Am. St. Rep. 279, 58 N. E. 1078. Therefore, considering only the place of the property, it was held that bonds held out of the state could not be reached. The decision has been cut down to its precise point by later cases. Savings & L. Soc. v. Multnomah County, 169 U. S. 421, 428, 42 L. ed. 803, 805, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 392; New Orleans v. Stempel, 175 U. S. 309, 319, 320, 44 L. ed. 174, 180, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110."

The cases cited by defendant in error are all distinguishable by some vital and controlling fact from the case at bar. Thus, in Blackstone v. Miller, supra, ancillary administration was in progress in the courts of the taxing state. This is also true in Re Rogers, 149 Mich. 305, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1134, 119 Am. St. Rep. 677, 112 N. W. 931; Alvany v. Powell, 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 51; State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82, and in the Massachusetts cases.

It is settled law that it is the succession which is the subject of the tax, and not the thing inherited. In the case at bar there is no ancillary <sup>-what</sup> subject. administration here.

The decedent, the legatees, and the bonds themselves, now are, and have been at all times, beyond this jurisdiction. So far as the bonds in question are concerned, there is no property, or evidence of indebtedness belonging to the Brookman estate physically within this jurisdiction, nor is this state concerned in any manner with the process of succession. In substance it is urged by defendant in error that the state has authority under the statute to tax the right of nonresident legatees to inherit property outside of the state, under the foreign-probated will of a nonresident testator. The bonds, being unregistered, pass upon delivery, just like money. They are manifestly transitory and fugitive, and this state is powerless to place its hand upon them, for the purpose of taxation, in the absence of direct, specific legislation to that effect. For taxing purposes the debt which the bonds represent is the property of the bondholder, and not of the debtor. The situs of the bonds is the domicile of the owner, and they are taxable there. This is the rule except when such property is not in the custody of the nonresident owner, but is physically present in the state proposing to levy the tax.

Cases in state courts denying the right to tax evidences of indebtedness secured by local real estate, but held abroad, are the following: In Re Preston, 75 App. Div. 250, 78 N. Y. Supp. 91, the syllabus reads as follows: "Bonds of a private individual secured by a mortgage on real estate situated in New York, both bonds and mortgages being kept in good faith outside of the state, are not subject to the taxable transfer acts."

The court, citing Re Bronson, 150 N. Y. 1, 34 L.R.A. 238, 55 Am. St. Rep. 632, 44 N. E. 707, said it was unable to distinguish this case from that "where it was held that the bonds of a domestic corporation, owned and held in a foreign state, could not be reached by the former taxable transfer act," citing, also, State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, supra.

Gilbertson v. Oliver, 129 Iowa, 568, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 953, 105 N. W. 1002, was decided under a statute providing that "all property within the jurisdiction . . . and any interest therein, whether belonging to the inhabitants of this state or not, and whether tangible or intangible, which shall pass by will or by the statutes of inheritance of this or any other state, or by deed, grant, sale, or gift, . . . in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor or donor, to any person in trust or otherwise . . ." (Code, § 1467), is subject to a collateral inheritance tax. Part of the property involved was notes and mortgages owned by residents of Iowa and secured by property situated therein. The court admitting that "there is a conflict in the adjudicated cases as to whether such evidences of indebtedness are taxable at the domicil of the owner, or whether the actual situs of such property . . . determines the liability to taxation," says: "The great weight of authority, however, supports the holding of our own cases that this species of personal property, which is in a sense intangible and incorporeal, is taxable at the domicil of the owner, and not elsewhere, unless the owner has himself given it a different situs."

The court then quotes Davenport v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 12 Iowa, 539, to the following effect: "It is true that the situs of the property mortgaged is within the jurisdiction of the state, but the mortgage itself, being personal property, a chose in action, attaches to the person of the owner."

The court also quotes with approval from Hunter v. Board of Supervisors, 33 Iowa, 376, 11 Am. Rep. 132, to the following effect: "The debt due, of which the notes are the evidence, is property, vested in the owner wherever he may reside. This property in the right—the chose in action—is as absolute a property therein, and he is as well entitled to it, as he is to tangible property in possession; and this species of property—debts due—must, in the nature of things, follow and be with the owner; except, perhaps, where he has conferred authority upon someone else as his agent to loan, manage, receive, and collect the same for him. . . . The right to the 'money due' being in the appellant, the property in the right must, of necessity, be in the place where he resides, irrespective of the situs of the evidence."

In Re Fearing, 200 N. Y. 340, 93 N. E. 956, it is stated in the syllabus: "Transfer Tax Law (Laws 1892, chap. 399), § 1, provides that a tax shall be imposed on the transfer by will or intestate law of property within the state, where the decedent was a nonresident at the time of his death. Held, that bonds passing under the will of a nonresident pursuant to a power of appointment were not property within the state within such act, and subject to taxation because the bonds were secured by mortgages on lands located in New York."

At page 344 of 200 N. Y., the court said: "Whether the bonds are secured . . . of corporate property, or . . . by mortgages of the property of individuals, they represent, equally, debts of their makers, which, as choses in action, under the general rule of law, are inseparable from the personality of the owner."

The contention of defendant in error can prevail only upon the theory laid down in Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, to the effect that for inheritance tax purposes a debt may be taxed at the domicil of the debtor; but this was declared where the property was physically in the taxing state, and ancillary administration was in progress in its courts, and cannot be considered an authority for the imposition of the tax under consideration. In any event, bonds, such as are here involved, are specifically excepted by that opinion from the operation of the special rule therein laid down.

It will be observed that in some of the cases the domicil of the owner has been held to furnish the test of jurisdiction for the purpose of taxation, while in others this test has yielded to the actual situs of the property within the territorial limits of the taxing authority; but in no case has the domicil of the debtor, or the location of the securities, been taken as the situs for the purpose of taxation in the absence of some special circumstance which the court considered gave it an actual situs. No such circumstance exists here. Moreover, whether the test to be applied is the domicil of the owner, or the place where the securities are actually located, since both are in the state of New York, the conclusion must be that the bonds are exempt from taxation in Colorado.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Hill, Ch. J., dissenting:

In Re Bronson, 150 N. Y. 1, 34 L.R.A. 238, 55 Am. St. Rep. 632, 44 N. E. 707, decided October 6, 1896, it was held that bonds of domestic corporations owned by and in possession of a nonresident decedent at his domicil at the time of his death, and which then passed to nonresidents by will or the law of descent in the state where he lived, were not subject to taxation in New York under that portion of its transfer tax act which reads: "When the transfer is by will or intestate law, of property within the state, and the decedent was a nonresident of the state at the time of his death." Laws 1892, chap. 399, § 1.

In construing this language, the court considered with it and gave emphasis to § 22 of the New York act, which defines the word "property" as meaning all property or interest therein over which the state had jurisdiction for the purposes of taxation. A very able dissenting opinion was rendered by Justice Vann, concurred in by Justice O'Brien; the majority opinion was written by Justice Gray.

In Re Houdayer, 150 N. Y. 37, 34 L.R.A. 235, 55 Am. St. Rep. 642, 44 N. E. 718, the same court held that individual deposits of a nonresident decedent in a trust company in that state were subject to this tax under the same act. The opinion was by Justice Vann, and per his reasoning, it was a debt owing by the trust company to the nonresident decedent; yet, regardless of this, he held it was property within the state so far as the transfer act or inheritance tax law, so-called, was concerned, it being agreed by all (and is conceded here) that it is not a tax upon property, but rather upon the right to receive it. Justice O'Brien concurred with Justice Vann; Chief Justice Andrews and Justices Bartlett and Martin concurred in the result upon the theory that a deposit of money in a bank, although technically a debt, is still money for all practical purposes, and as such was taxable under the transfer act. Justice Gray filed a dissenting opinion, in which Justice Haigh concurred, to the effect that the trust company was a mere creditor of the decedent, and for that reason that it did not constitute property within the state, so far as their transfer act was concerned. I am unable to harmonize the two opinions or to gather from them sufficient upon which to hazard a guess as to what the future position of that court will be on similar questions. The former of these cases is the only case cited in 37 Cyc. 1562, to sustain its statement set forth in the opinion of the court here to the effect that the right to inherit these bonds, when held by a nonresident in another state, is not subject to such a tax in the state where issued and where the lands covered by the mortgage to secure them is situate.

In Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S.

189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, it was held that a deposit by a citizen of Illinois in a trust company in New York was subject to the transfer tax in New York, notwithstanding that the whole succession had been taxed in Illinois, including this deposit. This opinion was not upon the theory of the three members concurring in the opinion in the New York case last referred to, but, to the contrary, takes the position of Justices Vann and Gray, that the relation was that of debtor and creditor, but disagreed with the latter as to the result which should follow. For instance, the court says: "What gives the debt validity? Nothing but the fact that the law of the place where the debtor is will make him pay."

And again: "Power over the person of the debtor confers jurisdiction, we repeat. And this being so, we perceive no better reason for denying the right of New York to impose a succession tax on debts owed by its citizens than upon tangible chattels found within the state at the time of the death."

In commenting upon State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179, the court distinguished it from this class of cases, and, among other things, said: "The taxation in that case was on the interest on bonds held out of the state. Bonds and negotiable instruments are more than merely evidences of debt. The debt is inseparable from the paper which declares and constitutes it, by a tradition which comes down from more archaic conditions. Bacon v. Hooker, 177 Mass. 335, 337, 83 Am. St. Rep. 279, 58 N. E. 1078. Therefore, considering only the place of the property, it was held that bonds held out of the state could not be reached. The decision has been cut down to its precise point by later cases."

For the reason last stated, and the fact that the case referred to was concerning a tax on property, and not a tax upon the right to inherit it, I do not think it applicable here. In State ex rel. Graff v. Probate Court, 128 Minn. 371, L.R.A. 1916A, 901, 150 N. W. 1094, it was held that a promissory note, as well as a book account, of a Minnesota corporation, held by a resident of Pennsylvania, and who died with the note in his possession in the latter state, was subject to a tax upon the right to succeed to the ownership of said property in Minnesota under the language of their act, which reads: "When a transfer is by will or intestate law, of property within the state or within its jurisdiction, and the decedent was a nonresident of the state at the time of his death." Gen. Stat. 1913, § 2271.

This case goes into the history of the question in detail, showing that the right to succeed to ownership is taxable by the state having jurisdiction of the debtor, for the law of that state furnishes the means to compel payment, etc. While the Minnesota act has these additional words not contained in our act, viz., "or within its jurisdiction," I cannot see that they add anything to its scope. The words "within this jurisdiction" are used alternately with the words "within the state," and to my mind mean "within the state." The reasoning of the Minnesota court gives no extra effect to them, but is just as applicable to the paragraph had they been omitted.

In Re Rogers, 149 Mich. 305, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134, 119 Am. St. Rep. 677, 112 N. W. 931, the court held that notes secured by mortgages on lands in Michigan, given by residents of that state, owned by a nonresident, and held by him at his home in New York at the time of his death, were subject to an inheritance tax in Michigan under the provisions of their act, which reads: "When the transfer is by will or intestate law of property within the state, and the decedent was a nonresident of the state at the time of his death." Pub. Acts 1903, No. 195, § 1.

This is the exact language of our act. Theirs was passed in 1903, ours in 1913. Their decision placing a construction thereon was announced July 15, 1907. Hence, long before our legislature adopted the exact language of the Michigan act, it had before it the construction of the Michigan court thereon, holding that it made subject to this tax a note held by a nonresident, given by a citizen of their state, when secured by a mortgage upon lands within the state.

The holding in Kinney v. Treasurer (Kinney v. Stevens) 207 Mass. 368, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 784, 93 N. E. 586, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 902, is to the same effect as the Michigan court, under a somewhat similar statute. In commenting, the court said: "The question before us is whether these securities are property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, in reference to taxation upon the succession. . . . The debt belongs with the mortgage, and it must coexist to give the mortgage validity. For that purpose it has a situs within the jurisdiction of the state where the land lies."

The only distinction between the two cases last cited and this is that the bonds under consideration are payable to bearer; but, for the purposes of this tax, it appears to me that it is a distinction without a material difference. All the authorities that I have been able to find are to the effect that, under similar language, the right to succeed to ownership of stock of a domestic corporation held by a nonresident is subject to this tax. The Minnesota case applies it to an unsecured note as well as a book account; the Massachusetts and Michigan cases to notes secured by mortgages; the Supreme Court of the United States case to a bank deposit on the theory of simple debtor and creditor. The reasoning in all is to the effect that the situs of the property for the purpose of this tax is at the domicile of the debtor, or where the property covered by the mortgage is situate. In such circumstances, when the language of our act is considered as a whole, I am of opinion, as said by Mr. Justice Holmes in Blackstone v. Miller, supra, concerning the New York act, that it was intended to reach the transfer of this property if it can be reached. The opinion, as I understand it, concedes that it can be reached by appropriate legislation. I am of opinion that it has already been reached by the language used. Whether ancillary administration is in progress or not, in my opinion, makes no difference. The question to be determined is whether our act has attempted to, or whether we can, tax the right or privilege to inherit or succeed to such property. This should be determined by conditions as they exist at the time of the death of the testator. Such being the case, I am unable to appreciate wherein the question of ancillary administration cuts any figure, pertaining to the construction which should be given to our act. It might aid the collection of this tax, but I cannot agree that there should be any difference in the rule to be applied to the same class of property simply because one estate has ancillary administration pending and the other has not. The fact that these bonds can be transferred by delivery in another state, in my opinion, makes no difference; they are not money. A note indorsed in blank can be thus transferred, and if secured by mortgage, per former rulings of this court, such a transfer carries with it the equitable right to have the mortgaged property disposed of in satisfaction of the debt. A bond of the kind under consideration is but a promise to pay, and is in a sense but a promissory note. It is common knowledge that stocks in domestic corporations are quite often indorsed in blank by the person to whom issued, and thereafter sold and transferred by delivery through the hands of numerous persons. I can think of no reason why a book account may not be thus assigned to bearer and pass title accordingly. If it is for the reason that the bonds are payable to bearer that they are exempt from this tax, then, in my opinion, it is a reason which sacrifices substance to form.

ANNOTATION.

Succession tax on bonds of domestic corporation owned by estate of non-resident and held at his residence.

The situs of property for purposes of taxation has given rise to some conflicting rules. It is recognized, however, in all cases, that there must be some interest within the state in order to furnish a basis for taxation by the state. The present note is confined to an examination of the judicial decisions upon the question whether the fact that bonds owned by a nonresident, and held at his residence, are obligations of a domestic corporation, is sufficient to subject them to an inheritance or succession tax in the state where the corporation is situated.

Corporate bonds owned by a non-resident decedent, and held at the place of his residence, are not taxable merely because of the fact that the bonds are obligations of a domestic corporation, under statutes taxing transfers of "property within the state." WALKER v. PEOPLE (reported herewith) ante, 855; Re Bronson (1896) 150 N. Y. 1, 34 L.R.A. 238, 55 Am. St. Rep. 632, 44 N. E. 707. Bonds of a Pennsylvania corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident were, it seems, held nontaxable in Del Bus-to's Estate (1888) 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 289. This has been held true in case of bonds of individuals, even if the bonds are secured by a mortgage of real estate within the state. Re Fearing (1911) 200 N. Y. 340, 93 N. E. 956; Re Preston (1902) 75 App. Div. 250, 78 N. Y. Supp. 91. The court in these cases declares that there is no distinction between corporate bonds and the bonds of individuals in this regard.

That bonds of a domestic corporation, secured by mortgage of real property within the state, owned by a non-resident and kept at the owner's residence, are not subject to a tax, was held in Re Richards (1918) 182 App. Div. 572, 169 N. Y. Supp. 968, affirmed in (1919) 225 N. Y. 671, 122 N. E. 889, under chap. 664, § 220, Laws of 1915. This statute taxed a transfer "by will or intestate law of tangible property within the state or of any intangible property if evidenced by or consisting of shares of stock, bonds, notes or other evidences of interest in any corporation, joint stock company or association wherever incorporated or organized, except a corporation . . . being or in the nature of a moneyed corporation, a railroad or transportation corporation or a public service or manufacturing corporation . . . and the property represented by such shares of stock, bonds, notes or other evidences of interest consists of real property which is located wholly or partly within the state of New York or of an interest in any partnership business conducted wholly or partly within the state of New York in such proportion as the value of the real property of such corporation, joint stock company or association, or as the value of the entire property of such partnership located in the state of New York bears to the value of the entire property of such corporation, joint stock company or association or partnership, and the decedent was a non-resident of the state at the time of his death; or when the transfer is by will or intestate law of capital invested in business in the state by a nonresident of the state doing business in the state either as principal or partner."

It has been held that bonds of a railroad company organized in the state of the forum, and having its general offices and principal place of business there, owned by a nonresident, and kept by him at the place of his residence, are not subject to an inheritance tax where the railroad company's lines extend through a number of states, to whose jurisdiction it is thus subject. In State v. Chadwick (1916) 133 Minn. 117, L.R.A.1916E, 1288, 157 N. W. 1076, the court, in holding the bonds not subject to tax, states: "In the case before us there is no necessity of the owner coming to Minnesota to enforce the bonds. They can be enforced in New York [the bonds were payable at the office of the railway company in New York, where they were registered], or in any of the seven states through which the road passes. Under the Constitution, a judgment upon the bonds, rendered in any of these states, will be entitled to full faith and credit in Minnesota. . . . And the trust deed securing the bonds can be enforced in any of the seven states, and all the lines in the several states, constituting, as they do, one system, can be sold and title passed under the foreclosure decree. . . . We hold that the bonds are not subject to a succession tax in Minnesota because the debtor is incorporated there and has there its principal offices, it being subject to jurisdiction in other states having property sufficient to satisfy them. . . . Whether the doctrine that a mortgage of real property to secure an obligation gives a taxable situs for inheritance tax purposes in the state where the mortgaged property is located [is a sound one] we do not decide. In the case at bar 27 per cent of the mortgaged property is in Minnesota, and the value of this 27 per cent exceeds the total of the issued bonds. Seventy-three per cent of the value of the mortgaged property is in the seven states outside Minnesota, and this value is proportionally greater than the issued bonds. All of the mortgaged property can be subjected to the payment of the bonds and the entire property sold upon suit brought in the other states. . . . Under such circumstances the mortgage does not give a taxable situs in Minnesota." The provisions of the inheritance tax statute governing this case were as follows: "A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon any transfer of property, real, personal or mixed, or any interest therein or income therefrom in trust or otherwise, in any person, association or corporation . . . in the following cases. . . . (2) When a transfer is by will or intestate law of property within the state or within its jurisdiction and the decedent was a nonresident of the state at the time of his death."

It has also been held that bonds of a domestic corporation, owned and held by a nonresident at the place of his residence, are not liable to a tax under a collateral inheritance tax statute imposing a tax "upon all estates, real, personal, and mixed, passing from any person who may die seised or possessed of such estate, being within this commonwealth," and making it the duty of executors and administrators to pay the tax. Kintzing v. Hutchinson (1877) 7 W. N. C. 226, Fed. Cas. No. 7,834. The legislature subsequently declared that the words in the statute, "being within this commonwealth," should be construed as relating to "all persons who had been, at the time of their decease, or then might be, domiciled within the commonwealth, as well as to estates."

In the reported case (WALKER v. PEOPLE, ante, 855) a point is made of the fact that the bonds involved were unregistered bonds.

On the contrary, mortgages securing promissory notes (whether of a corporation or individual does not appear) have been held to constitute an interest in real estate and to be subject to taxation under a statute taxing transfers of any interest in real estate. Hawkrigde v. Treasurer (1916) 223 Mass. 134, 111 N. E. 707.

While this note has been confined in general to a determination of the question whether the single fact on which the tax can be based is that the bonds were those of a domestic corporation, it should be noted that where the additional fact that the bonds were kept in the state was present, the bonds have generally been held taxable. Thus, bonds of a domestic corporation, owned by a nonresident, were held subject to an inheritance tax in People v. Griffith (1910) 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313, where the nonresident spent a considerable portion of his time in the state of the forum, and kept the bonds in a safe deposit vault in that state. In Re Romaine (1891) 127 N. Y. 80, 12 L.R.A. 401, 27 N. E. 759, where it did not appear whether the bonds were issued by a foreign or domestic corporation, bonds owned by a nonresident and habitually kept by him in the state of the forum were held subject to an inheritance tax under a statute taxing all property that shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of the state from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while being a resident of the state, or which property shall be within the state. That bonds of a domestic corporation, owned by a nonresident, but kept in a safe deposit vault in the state, are subject to a tax under a statute taxing property within the state, is held also in Re Whiting (1896) 150 N. Y. 27, 34 L.R.A. 232, 55 Am. St. Rep. 640, 44 N. E. 715.

Bonds and mortgages (whether of a domestic corporation does not appear) which had been in the state for a long period prior to the owner's death, in the hands of an agent who was acting under a power of attorney to invest and reinvest, were held to be taxable in Lewis's Estate (1902) 208 Pa. 211, 52 Atl. 205. In this case the executor and legatees had requested and consented that a complete administration and distribution of the whole estate comprehended in the account should be had in Pennsylvania by a Pennsylvania court. In the subsequent case of De Noaille's Estate (Re Helena) (1912) 236 Pa. 213, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1167, 84 Atl. 665, personal property placed by a nonresident with trustees within a state for investment under a trust which might have been terminated at any time, and which did not name ultimate beneficiaries, was held to retain its situs at his domicile, where he died without descendants, and was not subject to a collateral inheritance tax at the domicile of the trustees. The court in Lewis's Estate emphasizes the fact of the consent to an administration in Pennsylvania, and states that the benefit of such an administration could not be had without its burden.

v.

ROBERT L. BROWN.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit—May 19, 1919.

(258 Fed. 806.)

Master and servant — car inspector — “blue flag rule” — duty to see that flag is placed.

1. The court cannot say as matter of law that one of two car inspectors working in pairs and inspecting a train for defective brake equipment is negligent in going under a train without making sure that the other has actually placed the blue flag signal to protect the train against movement, where such other undertook to place the signal, and where the custom of the inspectors was to work on opposite sides of the train, and it was not customary for each to see personally that the flag was placed before going beneath a car.

— duty to obey rules.

2. A railroad company may issue rules for the safety, guidance, and protection of its employees which the employees must obey.

[See 18 R. C. L. 498, 520, 573, 659, 670.]

— customary interpretation of rule.

3. An employee is not necessarily negligent in following a custom with respect to the interpretation of a rule promulgated for his guidance if the rule does not clearly cover the particular situation which confronts him.

— effect of contributory negligence.

4. The negligence of a railroad employee engaged in interstate commerce does not bar his holding the railroad liable for injuries received in the employment, if negligence of a fellow servant contributes to the accident.

— delegation of duty to place blue flag — establishment of relations.

5. That a car inspector delegated to a fellow inspector the duty of placing the blue flag to protect the train while they were working about it does not make the latter his servant so as to absolve the railroad company from liability for his negligence.

— assumption of risk.

6. A car inspector engaged in interstate commerce does not assume the risk of the negligence of a fellow inspector in failing to place a blue flag to protect the train while they are working about it.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern Division of the Southern District of California (Trippet, District J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to recover damages for personal injuries. Affirmed.

Statement by Hunt, J.:

The San Pedro, Los Angeles, & Salt Lake Railroad Company brought writ of error to review a judgment of the district court in favor of Brown, defendant in error, upon a verdict for damages for personal injuries. The railroad company denied negligence and pleaded contributory negligence. The action was brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. 65, chap. 149, Comp. Stat. §§ 8657-8665, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1208), which provides, in substance, that every common carrier by railroad, while engaged in interstate commerce, is liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, whether such injury results in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, and the fact that an employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence merely mitigates the damages and does not bar a recovery.

The evidence as produced by plaintiff below was as follows: Brown was an experienced car inspector employed by the railroad company at Otis, now Yermo, California. The inspectors worked in pairs; Brown's "partner" being one Ables, also an experienced inspector. On November 17, 1914, in daylight, they were about to inspect a train of fifteen or more cars which was standing upon a main track west of the depot. The inspectors went toward the head of the engine, and separated near the head of the engine, Ables going on the south or engineer's side, and Brown on the north or fireman's side, of the engine. Ables had the blue flag in his hand. When the men separated, they were about 50 feet from the front of the engine, and Ables said: "I will put the flag there, and we will hold them there until we are through." Brown testified that it was not customary to put the flag right in the cab of the engine, but to place it on the running board, where the engineer could see it; that when he went around the engine on the north side he could not see the engineer or the fireman; that he passed two cars, and observed that on the third car, a "Salt Lake box car," the air was set, but the piston travel was too short; that he went to the west end of the car to adjust the brake, and crawled under the west end of the car behind the rear trucks, was facing forward, on the fireman's side, and pulled the release rod to release the brakes. The lever had a track spike in it, instead of a key bolt, and moved with difficulty, so he took his hammer from his pocket to strike, and was in the act of crawling up closer when he noticed the wheels starting. He made a "lunge," seized a grab iron under the rear of the car, and managed to get out by the time the train came to a stop, but was injured. Brown said that he relied upon his partner to put the blue flag on the engine; that the custom was for one inspector to go on one side and one on the other, although they were supposed generally to go together.

There was evidence as to the custom of the railroad company with respect to inspection of air and of cars, and that when a train was brought into the yard the car inspectors place a blue flag on the end, and one inspector would go down each side of the train and inspect for brake shoes and brake "riggins." There was no evidence of a practice of putting a flag signal at each end of the train.

The testimony of Brown and Ables varies in some respects, particularly as to the conversation they had just before they separated; but Ables admitted that he was going toward the engine and had the flag in his hand. There was evidence that it was neither customary nor necessary that each inspector should personally see the flag on the engine before going beneath the car.

Certain rules of the company were introduced in evidence. One, No. 517, under the heading "Car Inspectors," reads: "When making repairs under cars standing on main track or sidetrack, they must protect themselves by placing a blue signal on the drawhead or the platform or step of the car at each end of the train to prevent the cars from being coupled to or moved while they are making repairs." Rule 26, under which Brown said they were working, provides: "A blue flag by day and a blue light by night, displayed at one or both ends of an engine, car, or train, indicates that workmen are under or about it. When thus protected, it must not be coupled to or moved. Workmen will display the signals, and the same workmen alone are authorized to move them. Other cars must not be placed on the same tracks, so as to intercept the signal, without first notifying the workmen." Another rule, No. 842, provides, in substance, that if the brakes on the last car are properly set, inspectors or trainmen will signal to release the brakes, and the inspector will examine each car and see that the brake releases, and if any brakes will not release, or have leaks or broken rods, they must be cut out by closing the stop cock in branch pipe.

Messrs. Dana T. Smith, E. E. Bennett, and A. S. Halsted, for plaintiff in error:

The great preponderance, if not the overwhelming weight, of the evidence, shows that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant.

act of negligence per se, and when it results in an injury to the employee, the latter cannot recover.

Mr. F. E. Petit, Jr., also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. T. W. Duckworth and J. H. Ryckman for defendant in error.

Hunt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is evident that the inspection was being made for defective brake equipment rather than an air test, and, considering the evidence of the practice followed by the inspectors at Yermo, we cannot say that, as a matter of law, it was incumbent upon the inspector who was working under the train to make sure that the other inspector actually placed the signal.

Certainly it is the right of an employer carrier to issue rules for the safety, guidance, and protection of its employees, and it is the duty of the <sup>—duty to obey rules.</sup> employees to observe such rules.

But, if there is evidence of a custom with respect to the interpretation of a rule which does not clearly cover the particular situation which confronts the employee, the employee is not always negligent in following the custom, and <sup>—customary interpretation of rule.</sup> if in the observance of the usual practice he is injured through the negligence of his fellow employee, under the statute cited he may have a cause of action for injuries received. But, if we assume that Brown was negligent in not personally seeing that the <sup>—effect of contributory negligence.</sup> flag was placed, surely his negligence was not the sole cause of the accident; for notwithstanding Brown's negligence, if Ables, his fellow inspector, had not negligently failed to place the flag, the accident would not have happened.

It is urged that no duty rested upon the railroad company to place a blue flag on any part of the train under which Brown was working, but that the duty to place such a flag was enjoined upon Brown, the inspector; that he could not delegate or confide the performance of such duty to Ables; and that, if failure to place the flag was approximate cause of the injury, Brown could not recover.

In this connection we have carefully considered the argument of plaintiff in error that it could not have been the intent of Congress, as expressed in the act, to permit of recovery where an injury to an employee has resulted in any way from the negligence of a fellow servant. That may be so, and Reeve v. Northern P. R. Co. 82 Wash. 268, L.R.A. 1915C, 37, 144 Pac. 63, 8 N. C. C. A. 167, sustains the argument. But that argument does not answer the question in the present case. The injury sued upon in the Reeve Case was received by the employee, who was a laborer about cars, by being pushed out of the car by another employee, who was scuffling with a third fellow employee, and brushed against the man who was thrown out. It was held that the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow employee, committed while he was prosecuting the business of the employer. Here, however, Brown was giving his undivided attention to his duty, the adjustment of a brake on a car, in order to put the brake in proper condition for the journey about to begin, and Ables had the flag and was also engaged in the business of the employer.

servant—car

It is not open to argument that under the act cited the old defense of the fellow-servant rule is gone, and we find no reasonable ground upon which to rest a conclusion that an interstate railroad employer can, by a rule made for the safety of the employees, destroy a cause of action in favor of an employee for injury received while performing a duty and directly caused by the negligence of a fellow employee.

The express declaration of the statute (§ 5) that "any contract, rule, regulation or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability" created by the act, shall, to that extent, be void, gives aid in the proper interpretation of the act and is inconsistent with the theory advanced by plaintiff in error that Brown made Ables his agent to place the flag and that Ables's negligence is to be imputed to Brown, although Ables was a fellow car inspector.

The two were fellow servants, and the act of the one in relying upon the other did not make a relationship of principal and agent whereby the employer can be absolved.

Considering the context of the statute, it is unimportant whether the negligence of the fellow servant Ables is called the negligence of the master or is called imputed negligence, for the liability of the carrier arises to any person suffering injury resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, and no "contract" or "rule" made for the purpose of attempting to establish a relationship between the employee and the carrier, to enable the carrier to exempt itself from the liability created by the act, can be sustained as effective in relieving the carrier.

It is also argued that Brown must be held to have assumed the risk of the injury he sustained as a result of his reliance on his coemployee and the failure of his coemployee to place the flag and so protect him. The point is based upon a portion of the charge of the lower court to the effect that Brown did not assume the risks that were attendant upon the negligence of a fellow servant.

Clearly, under the act, the defense of assumption of risk is open to the carrier, except in actions brought under § 4, which provides that, in an action for damages for injury to an employee, "such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risk of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee." Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 58 L. ed. 1062, L.R.A.1915C, 1, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, 8 N. C. C. A. 834. But Brown was not injured by reason of any defect in the machinery, or by reason of any danger normally or necessarily incident to the occupation of inspecting cars. The accident would not have happened at all but for the negligence of a fellow servant; and as to employers, while engaged in interstate commerce, the servant so engaged does not agree, as between himself and the carrier, to assume the risk of the negligence of his fellow servant. Watson v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (C. C.) 169 Fed. 950. In Boldt

v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 245 U. S. 441, 62 L. ed. 385, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139, the court affirmed the action of the trial court in refusing to charge that "the risk the employee now assumes, since the passage of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, is the ordinary dangers incident to his employment, which does not now include the assumption of risk incident to the negligence of the carrier's officers, agents, or employees." The opinion expressed was that the requested charge was erroneous, because the action there brought was not one within the provisions of § 4 of the act. But as far as we are advised it has never been held that in an action brought under the statute, where an employee trusts to another to do an act necessary for his safety, and he himself is not aware of the failure of such employee to do the act, and actually goes on with his work, relying upon the performance of the act by his fellow servant, and by reason of the negligence of the employee relied upon injury follows, the risk of such negligence on the part of the fellow servant is assumed by the injured man.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Skaggs, 240 U. S. 66, 60 L. ed. 528, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, upon a writ of error to review a judgment recovered under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, it was argued that the railroad company could not be negligent to an employee whose failure of duty and neglect produced the dangerous condition. The court took it for granted that under the statute recovery by an employee for the consequences of actions exclusively his own could not be had. In qualifying the assumption, the court said in effect that where the injury to the employee does not result in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the agents or employees of the employing carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its property or equipment, action would not lie. "But," continued the court, "on the other hand, it cannot be said that there can be no recovery simply because the injured employee participated in the act which caused the injury. The inquiry must be whether there is neglect on the part of the employing carrier, and, if the injury to one employee resulted 'in whole or in part' from the negligence of any of its other employees, it is liable under the express terms of the act. That is, the statute abolished the fellow-servant rule. If the injury was due to the neglect of a coemployee in the performance of his duty, that neglect must be attributed to the employer; and, if the injured employee was himself guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, the statute expressly provides that it 'shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.'" This decision we believe to be applicable to the facts in the case before us. Brown, pursuing the usual practice at Yermo, may have participated in the act of failing to put up the flag; but Ables's failure was, in large part, the direct cause of the damage. Brown relied upon Ables, and in reliance upon him went on to perform his duty. By the express terms of the statute the negligence of Ables may be attributed to the carrier.

We find no error in the record, and affirm the judgment.

ANNOTATION.

Right of servant to rely upon performance by another of the duty, equally incumbent upon himself, of complying with the "blue flag rule."

The present annotation, as indicated by the title, is confined to cases where there was a duty resting upon the injured servant, and the question was whether or not he had a right to rely upon another servant's compliance with a “blue flag rule.” This, of course, excludes cases where the sole duty of protection lay with another servant, and the question is raised as to the injured servant’s right to rely upon a performance of that duty. A case illustrative of the latter class is Smith v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. (1909) 111 Md. 274, 73 Atl. 818.

The phrase “blue flag rule” as used herein means the rule requiring railroad employees, when engaged in repairing standing trains or cars which are liable to be moved at any time, to post a blue flag or other designated signal as a protection against their being so moved while being repaired, without notice to the employee working thereon.

The decisions in the few cases which have passed upon the question whether or not one servant may rely upon another servant’s compliance with the “blue flag rule” are conflicting, some courts having answered the query in the affirmative and others having arrived at a contrary conclusion.

The reported case (SAN PEDRO, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. BROWN, ante, 865) is illustrative of those permitting one servant to rely upon the performance of the duty to post signal flags, it having been held that a car inspector may delegate to a fellow inspector the duty of posting signals to protect a train while they are working about it, without making the latter his servant, and that in so relying on another servant he does not assume the risk of such other servant’s negligence, or absolve the railroad company from liability for his negligence in not posting a blue flag as required by a rule of the company.

This decision is supported in principle by the case of Moore v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1885) 85 Mo. 588, wherein it was held that a car repairer may rely upon the promise of his foreman, a vice principal, to set out the required signal flags or to protect him by other means while working under a car, notwithstanding a rule of the company requiring servants to protect themselves by putting out red flags while repairing cars. At the time this case was decided the fellow-servant rule had not been abrogated, and to allow a recovery it was necessary, as the court did, to find that the foreman was, under the circumstances, a vice principal.

And some support for the conclusion reached in the BROWN CASE is afforded by Canon v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1897) 101 Iowa, 613, 70 N. W. 613, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 131, in which it was held that a car repairer was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in not complying with a rule regarding the placing of a red flag as notice that he was working under a train, where he had the express promise of the yard foreman that he would protect him by not allowing any cars to be moved on that track. The court said: “It is said that plaintiff’s intestate was guilty of contributory negligence. This claim is based upon a claimed disobedience of a rule, and upon what is said to have been a waiver of the custom. In the answer, defendant pleads that for the protection of car inspectors the company had promulgated a rule providing that ‘a red flag by day and a red light by night, placed on the end of a car, denote that the car inspectors are at work under or about the car or train. The car or train so protected must not be coupled to or moved until the red signal is removed by car inspectors.’ It is averred that Canon knew of said rule, and did not obey it, and that such disobedience resulted in his death. Whatever may have been Canon’s duty, under other circumstances, he was not, in law, guilty of negligence, under the facts established; for he had the promise of the yard foreman, who had the control of the movement of cars in the yards, that no cars would be sent back upon the track upon which stood the train which he was inspecting. There is no basis for the claim that Canon, in consenting to the removal of the four cars, must be presumed to have known that some of them would be kicked back again on that track, and hence should have ceased inspecting until after the other cars had been returned. He had the express promise of the man who controlled the movement of cars that no cars would be sent back on that track. He had done everything required of him to protect himself from danger from moving cars, by telling Applegate that he was not through inspecting the train, and that he must not throw any cars in on that track. Having Applegate's promise that no cars would be thrown in on that track, he had a right to rely thereon, and to pursue, as he did, his work, relying upon Applegate to see to it that his safety was not imperiled by cars being kicked down upon the track while he was still inspecting the train. As a matter of law, it cannot be said that Canon was negligent."

On the other hand, in New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ropp (1907) 76 Ohio St. 449, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 413, 81 N. E. 748, where the rules of the defendant railroad company required car repairers to protect themselves by placing blue signals at both ends of the car or train on which they were working, and obligated them "in all cases . . . to see for themselves" that such signals were so placed, and the plaintiff expressly contracted to obey these rules, it was held that he could not excuse his failure to comply therewith by showing that he understood that another servant who was working with him had or would place the flags as required, and that his failure to see personally to the posting of the flags constituted negligence per se. In reaching this conclusion, the court among other things said: "He [the plaintiff] claims, and the jury was so instructed by the court, that because of the presence of a superior, Whalen, whose duty to likewise observe the rules is undisputed, and because Whalen had directed the plaintiff where to work and what to do, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if he 'proceeded to do the work under such conditions and circumstances as gave him to understand, and the right to understand, in face of the rules requiring him to place a blue flag at either end of the cars, that such flags had been so placed by Whalen.' In other words, although he had not been told by Whalen to disregard the rule, and although he had not looked to see if the signals were placed, and nothing had been said on the subject, he had the right, when called by Whalen to come and help him on the repairs on which Whalen was working, to take it for granted that Whalen had done his duty, or to infer from Whalen's conduct and surrounding circumstances that the rule was suspended for the time being. This theory of the case does not seem to us to be tenable. For aught that appears, the rules were equally obligatory on both Whalen and the plaintiff. They certainly were binding on the plaintiff, and the violation of the rules by Whalen, whether he were a superior or not, could not release the plaintiff from his contractual obligation, which was made for the benefit of both himself and his employer. Nor could Whalen either expressly or impliedly suspend the operation of any rule for a single moment. It does not appear in the record, and is not to be presumed, that he had any authority from the company to make contracts or enact rules for it; and, if he had no authority to make them, he had no authority to break them, or to disregard, abrogate, suspend, or repeal them. Neither can such authority be implied from the fact that Whalen had authority to direct and control the plaintiff in the performance of his duties as a car repairer. His authority to control and direct was authority to control and direct within the limitations of the rules prescribed by the company for the government of all employees. The rules required that car inspectors should 'be fully conversant . . . with instructions issued by the superintendent of motive power,' and that, 'when inspecting and repairing cars that should not be moved, they must protect themselves by placing conspicuously a blue signal, . . . as provided in rule 36.' Both Whalen and the plaintiff, therefore, must have known that rule 378 made it imperative to put out the signals 'in all cases when doing work on or under cars which should not be moved.' There is no room here for misunderstanding or implication. The rule is to apply in all cases, and therefore neither had Whalen the right to waive the rule in any case, nor had the plaintiff any right to infer a waiver of it in any case. There is not even room for an argument from the necessity of the case; for the plaintiff could have obeyed the order of his superior, and still have protected himself from injury by obeying the rule. He chose rather to take the chances in the performance of a little task which probably would take less time than would be consumed in putting the blue flags at each end of the cut of cars. It was a plain assumption of the risk by the plaintiff, in the sense of taking the chances, a risk which he had expressly agreed with his employer that he would not take.”

And in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Winslow (1894) 56 Ill. App. 462, where the rules required employees inspecting or repairing cars to protect themselves by placing blue signals on both ends of the car or train, and plaintiff, a car repairer, placed a blue flag at one end of the train on which he was working and relied upon an inspector's statement that he would post the other end, which, however, the latter neglected to do, and the plaintiff was injured by the moving of the car under which he was working, it was held that the injured repairer was guilty of contributory negligence in relying upon the inspector to protect him, and not personally seeing that the flag was put up on the other end of the train as required by the rule. And in connection with this case see Brady v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1904) 184 Mass. 225, 68 N. E. 227, the decision in which is largely to the same effect.

So, in Johnson v. Chicago, L. & W. R. Co. (1896) 11 Ohio C. C. 553, 5 Ohio C. D. 290, a car repairer was held guilty of contributory negligence in going under a car to work in violation of a “blue flag rule,” relying upon the promise of a railroad conductor to protect him, the conductor not being regarded as a superior. The court argued that the car repairer could not set aside the rules of the company and rely upon something which he himself had devised and substituted for his protection. And again Pinckney v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1911) 89 S. C. 525, 72 S. E. 394, on subsequent appeal in (1912) 92 S. C. 528, 75 S. E. 964, is authority for the proposition that a car repairer cannot excuse his disregard of a blue flag rule by the adoption of the substitute of telling the conductor and getting his promise to protect him, at least where he could have complied with the rule by reasonable effort on his own part.

And in Abbitt v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. (1898) 150 Ind. 498, 50 N. E. 729, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 478, in holding that where one car repairer relies upon another to protect the car under which he is working, he makes such other his agent so that the latter's negligence is his own, the court said: “It may, however, be affirmed as a correct doctrine, under the authorities, that if Abbitt and Lichtsin were associated together in their work of car inspection at the time of the accident, and if by any arrangement, understanding, or agreement between them, either express or implied, it became Lichtsin's duty, when Abbitt was under the car upon the railroad track during the inspection or work performed by them, to look out for approaching trains or cars, and either signal them to stop or warn Abbitt of their approach, then, in this respect, and to this extent at least, Lichtsin might be said to have been serving the former, and under such circumstances the relation of principal and agent in this regard could be said to exist between them; and if Lichtsin neglected to discharge the duty so imposed upon him, and thereby contributed to the accident in question, such negligence, in legal contemplation, would be the negligence of Abbitt, and justly imputable to him. Or, in other words if, under the circumstances, at the time of the fatal accident, Abbitt attempted or undertook to exercise the care which the law exacted of him through the agency of Lichtsin, then it would be incumbent upon the plaintiff in this action to show, at the time of the accident, freedom from contributory negligence on the part of Lichtsin.”

However, two judges, in dissenting, strongly objected to the application of the doctrine of imputed negligence in the case under consideration.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Blaylock (1915) 117 Ark. 504, 175 S. W. 1170, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 563, where the rule provided that "workmen will display the blue signals and the same workmen remove them," and there were different interpretations of the rule, some workmen maintaining that it was the duty of each workman when going under a car to put out the blue flag, and others that such duty fell upon the foreman, it was held that under such circumstances the questions whether a car repairer was guilty of contributory negligence in relying upon the foreman to place the signal, and whether he assumed the risk in that respect, were for the jury. This conclusion, in the opinion of the writer, seemingly leads to the inference that the car repairer would have been regarded as having been guilty of contributory negligence or of having assumed the risk, provided the rule required each workman to put out a signal flag, even though he relied upon the foreman to perform the duty for him, the railroad company having contended that the fact that he relied on the foreman to protect him could make no difference. In other words, the decision seems to import that if it had been the duty of the car repairer to put out the flag, and he failed to do so, he was guilty of contributory negligence, regardless of whether or not he relied upon the foreman to place the signal, which assumption is but another way of saying that one servant cannot rely upon another servant's compliance with the "blue flag rule." However, this conclusion may not be justifiable, in which case the decision affords no real authority upon the question whether or not one servant, in going under or between cars to work, can rely upon another employee to put out a protecting flag.

Another closely analogous case is Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kitchens (1889) 83 Ga. 83, 9 S. E. 827. Here the rule requiring workmen about cars to put up a blue flag applied alike to all persons, and it was held no excuse on the part of a car repairer that another servant working on the same cars failed to obey the rule. The court in the headnotes stated the rule as follows: "A rule of a railroad company applicable alike to all persons of a given class is not to be evaded by the failure of one person of the class to observe the rule, where another person of the same class is injured thereby." It does not appear certain, however, that the injured servant relied upon the other servant to put up the danger signal.

And see Roux v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. (1910) 127 La. 240, 53 So. 550, wherein it appears that the injured car repairer told his coworker to put out the blue flags, but in which it was held, without any reference to the specific question of a right to rely on the carrying out of such direction, that where a car repairer works on a car without putting out a blue flag as directed by a rule of the railroad company, there can be no recovery of damages for injuries sustained by him. ## PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

HARVEY MARQUIS et al., Plffs. in Err.

(291 Ill. 121, 125 N. E. 757.)

Constitutional law — abatement of nuisance.

1. Intoxicating liquors and vehicles used to transport them in violation of law cannot be summarily destroyed without notice to their owners as for abatement of a nuisance under the due process clauses of the Constitution.

[See note on this question beginning on page 888.]

Trial — question for jury — weight of evidence.

2. The weight of the evidence is a question for the jury.

[See 16 R. C. L. 183.]

Constitutional law — discrimination in favor of religious society — intoxicating liquor.

3. Failure to extend the prohibition against intoxicating liquor to that used for sacramental purposes does not unconstitutionally give a preference to any religious denomination, although some such denominations do not use intoxicating liquor for such purposes.

— criterion as to constitutionality — what authorized.

4. The question of constitutional power depends not upon what was done in a particular case, but upon what was authorized to be done.

— due process — condemnation without hearing.

5. A provision for condemnation, without notice or hearing, of property used for transportation of intoxicating liquor, deprives the owner of his property without due process of law.

Dunn, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Harvey Marquis left Kenosha, Wisconsin, in the afternoon of August 26, 1919, for Chicago, driving an auto truck loaded with eleven barrels of bottled beer. He was advised not to go through Lake county for fear of being arrested, but to go through McHenry county, and it would be all right. Accordingly he chose a road through McHenry county, and while in that county after dark, having no lights, he drove off the road into a farmyard 100 or 200 feet from the road, stopped and went to sleep on the truck. Soon after he was awakened by a deputy sheriff, arrested and taken to Woodstock, the county seat, and placed in jail, the deputy sheriff putting the truck and its load under the care of a guard, who watched them until they were taken possession of by the sheriff. The next day the state's attorney filed an information in the county court against Marquis for violating the Search and Seizure Act. On September 5th an amended information was filed charging the defendant with the transportation of intoxicating liquor over public highways, contrary to law, and after a trial, upon his plea of not guilty, he was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of \$50 and costs. On August 27, 1919, the state's attorney filed his complaint under oath, stating that he had reasonable cause to believe that intoxicating liquor was being transported in prohibition territory in a certain auto truck by H. Marquis and others named, and praying for a search warrant. The county judge issued a search warrant bearing the date of the previous day. The warrant was returned by the sheriff showing that he had seized eight and one half barrels of bottles containing beer and one Diamond-T truck bearing Illinois license No. 358,408, and that he had arrested and held in custody H. Marquis, the driver of the truck on which the intoxicating liquor was being transported. September 5th an amended complaint was filed, which differed from the other only in stating that the intoxicating liquor was being unlawfully transported, and that the auto truck was in the town of Burton, in McHenry county, instead of in McHenry county. What is called an amended search warrant was issued conforming to the amended complaints. On the same day Bertha Siemon and the Siebold-Schaeffer Company, each claiming to be the owner of the auto truck, filed petitions praying for the delivery of the auto truck to the respective petitioners, and Robert A. Grace, claiming to be the owner of the beer, prayed for its delivery to him. The petitions were summarily heard by the court, which found that the truck was being used as a vehicle to transport illegally over the public highways in prohibition territory beer containing more than  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol; that the barrels containing the beer were not labeled or marked on the outside cover so as to plainly show the true name and address of the consignor and consignee, or the kind and quantity of liquor contained, or the purpose for which said liquor was to be used by the consignee, or the place where such liquor was to be used by the consignee; that the beer, at the time of its seizure, was in the truck and was being illegally transported over the highways of McHenry county in prohibition territory, contrary to the provisions of the Search and Seizure Law of the state, and said beer and truck were at the time in the possession of Harvey Marquis, the defendant who was then driving the truck. The judgment of the court was that the auto truck and the beer be adjudged forfeited in accordance with the provisions of the Search and Seizure Law, and it was ordered that the sheriff proceed forthwith to destroy them by taking them to a suitable place within 2 miles of the courthouse, thoroughly saturating them with oil of a highly inflammable character, and publicly burning and destroying them between the hours of 10 o'clock in the morning and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, within five days of the date of the judgment. The defendant Marquis, and the petitioners have sued out a writ of error to reverse the judgment of the county court.

It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to prove Marquis guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, because he had no knowledge of the contents of the barrels other than that indicated by the labels, which stated that the contents were non-intoxicating. He had driven the truck from Chicago to Kenosha with a load of store fixtures and household furniture, with directions from his employer to try to get a return load. While he was trying to get a load to haul back to Chicago, he met Grace about two blocks from the Blatz brewery, who wanted him to take a load of barrels, which were labeled nonintoxicating, to Chicago. The barrels were labeled, "Blatz private stock; nonintoxicating." Grace had the truck taken to the brewery and loaded and brought back to Marquis. The barrels were not consigned to anyone. There was no agreement about the price for their transportation. Marquis was to take them to the office of his employer in Chicago, and Grace was to call at the office and tell where they were to be taken. Marquis was told not to go through Lake county on account of the Zion City authorities, but to go around through McHenry. The weight of the evidence is a question for the jury, and it is not surprising that they should have believed that the defendant was seeking to evade the law.

Various objections are urged against the constitutionality of the Search and Seizure Act, on which the prosecution is based. Laws 1919, p. 930. It is argued with apparent earnestness that the statute violates that part of § 3 of article 2 of the Constitution which prohibits the giving of any preference to any religious denomination or mode of worship because its prohibition does not extend to intoxicating liquors for sacramental purposes. It is said that some religious organizations use wine for such purposes and others do not, and that therefore the act gives a preference to those using wine and grants them a special privilege or immunity. The same argument would apply to the intoxicating liquor used for medicinal, chemical, mechanical, and manufacturing purposes, all of which are recognized as legitimate uses of intoxicating liquors. These, as well as sacramental uses, are expressly exempted from the prohibition of the act in question and are left to be controlled by such other restrictions and regulations as are or may be provided by the laws of the state or the United States. The manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquor for sacramental purposes are in no way interfered with by the act, but are free to all persons and all religious denominations to the same extent as before the passage of the act. The right

law—discrimination in favor of religious society—intoxicating liquor.

to use intoxicating liquors for such purposes exists in all. It is not a special privilege in those exercising the right because others who also have the right do not exercise it.

The most serious objection to the judgment questions the court's authority to order the destruction of the property. Marquis, who was transporting the beer, was not the owner of either the truck or the beer. He was a driver in the employ of the owner of the truck, the Siebold-Schaeffer Company, a corporation engaged in the business of teaming and hauling. There is no evidence that the corporation had any notice of the character of the load which Marquis was hauling and which he had procured independently in Kenosha, or that it was a participant in the violation of the law. Bertha Siemon was the owner of a chattel mortgage for $600 on the truck. It was not legally acknowledged and had not been recorded, but the evidence shows that it was given for a valid debt, and that it was valid between the parties. She was not shown to have had any knowledge of the unlawful use of the automobile. Grace, the other plaintiff in error, was the owner of the beer. He caused it to be loaded and shipped to Chicago. Under the Search and Seizure Act all territory in Illinois was prohibition territory by virtue of the act of Congress called the War Prohibition Law (Act Nov. 21, 1918, chap. 212, 40 Stat. at L. 1045). No question was made about the operation of this law, and the transportation of the beer upon any highway in Illinois to Chicago was a violation of the Search and Seizure Act, in which Grace participated.

Under § 16 of the Search and Seizure Act all intoxicating liquor manufactured, kept for sale, used, disposed of, or transported within prohibition territory in violation of any law of this state, with all vessels containing the same, and all implements, furniture, and vehicles kept or used for any such purposes, are declared to be common nuisances and subject to seizure, confiscation, and destruction in the manner provided by the act. This section and § 17 provide for the issuing of a search warrant upon complaint in writing verified by affidavit, and for its execution by the search of the place described in the warrant and the seizure of all intoxicating liquor there found, all vessels containing the same, and all implements, furniture, and vehicles kept or used for the purpose of violating or with which to violate any law of the state. The warrant further requires the arrest of any and all persons in whose possession the articles seized are found, and the bringing of them, together with the article seized, before the officer issuing the warrant or some other judge or justice of the peace having cognizance of the case. Section 17 provides that any claimant shall be entitled to have his right of property in such liquor and other property tried in a summary manner before the judge to whom the search warrant may have been returned, but does not require any notice to be given. Section 18 provides that no intoxicating liquor or other property seized under the act shall be taken from the custody of the officer by writ of replevin or other process, while any proceeding provided for in the act is pending, and that a final judgment of forfeiture of such intoxicating liquor or property shall be a bar to all suits for the recovery of the same or the value thereof, or for any damages arising by reason of the seizing or detention thereof. Section 19 requires the officer serving the search warrant to make and file an information against any person arrested, charging the violation of any of the provisions of any statute or municipal ordinance which may appear to have been committed by such person, and provides that the trial shall take place as speedily as possible and shall have preference over other cases. As soon as such complaint is disposed of, if it shall appear that the intoxicating liquor was manufactured, kept for sale, used, disposed of, or transported in violation of any of the provisions of any statute or municipal ordinance, the same, with the vessels, implements, furniture, and vehicles seized therewith, shall be adjudged forfeited and ordered forthwith destroyed in the manner the court may direct.

The act contains no provision for giving notice to any person except the person in whose possession the intoxicating liquor and vessels containing it, and all implements, furniture, and vehicles kept or used for the purpose of violating or with which to violate any law of this state, are found. Upon conviction of the person in possession it requires all such intoxicating liquor and other property to be forthwith destroyed. If the defendant is not the owner of the property seized, no provision is made for notice to the owner or any person interested other than the defendant, but the property seized may be adjudged forfeited and ordered destroyed forthwith, without any reference to the interest of such owner or other person interested. The property cannot be replevied or taken from the custody of the officer by any process, and the final judgment is declared a bar to all suits for the recovery of the property or its value or for any damages arising by reason of its seizure or detention, though if any claimant appears he may have his right of property tried in a summary manner.

Is it within the constitutional power of the legislature thus to authorize the destruction of property, without notice to the owner? It is true that in this case the plaintiffs in error did have knowledge of the proceeding, appeared, and had a summary hearing of their claim of property, but the question of constitutional power does not depend upon — criterion as to constitutionality — what authorized.

what was done in the particular case, but upon what the statute authorized to be done. Due process of law in the regular course of judicial proceedings requires notice to the defendant before he or his property can be condemned, as a matter of right, and not of favor, and a law which purports to authorize condemnation without notice confers no authority and is no justification for a judgment against him, even though, as a matter of fact, it may happen that he had knowledge of the proceeding. In Security Trust & S. V. Co. v. Lexington, 203 U. S. 323, 51 L. ed. 204, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87, the court said: "If the statute did not provide for a notice in any form, it is not material that as a matter of grace or favor notice may have been given of the proposed assessment. It is not what notice, uncalled for by the statute, the taxpayer may have received in a particular case that is material, but the question is whether any notice is provided for by the statute. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289."

In the case cited a statute purported to authorize an assessment upon the lands benefited of the costs of a local improvement, but did not provide for notice to the owner. The court said: "It is not enough that the owners may by chance have notice, or that they may as a matter of favor have a hearing. The law must require notice to them, and give them the right to a hearing and an opportunity to be heard. . . . The constitutional validity of law is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but by what may by its authority be done."

The doctrine thus announced has been followed in many other cases. Coe v. Armour Fertilizer Works, 237 U. S. 413, 59 L. ed. 1027, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Wright, 207 U. S. 127, 52 L. ed. 134, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47, 12 Ann. Cas. 463; Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 398, 44 L. ed. 520, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410.

A summary hearing, of which no notice is required to be given to a person whose rights ~~—due process—~~ are affected, and a ~~condemnation~~ judgment upon such ~~without hearing.~~ hearing, do not constitute due process of law. Such a judgment is not binding upon the party against whom it is rendered and confers no rights against him or his property. The judgment of the court provided for by the Search and Seizure Act, ordering the forfeiture and destruction of the intoxicating liquor and of all the property seized with it, was ineffectual as a judicial condemnation of the property of the plaintiffs in error Siemon, the Siebold-Schaeffer Company, and Grace. The question presented is therefore the same as if the statute, instead of requiring the property to be brought before the judge, had authorized its destruction by the officer seizing it, if it were employed in violating the law. Could the legislature authorize the destruction of the property without a judicial proceeding?

There are cases in which the summary abatement of nuisances by executive officers without a judicial condemnation, and the destruction ~~—abatement of~~ of articles used in ~~nuisance.~~ their maintenance, may be authorized by the legislature. "Where the condition of a thing is such that it is imminently dangerous to the safety or offensive to the morals of the community, and is incapable of being put to any lawful use by the owner, it may be treated as a nuisance per se. Actual physical destruction is in such cases not only legitimate, but sometimes the only legitimate course to be pursued. Rotten or decayed food or meat, infected bedding or clothing, mad dogs, animals affected with contagious diseases, obscene publications, counterfeit coin, and imminently dangerous structures are the most conspicuous instances of nuisances per se." Freund, Pol. Power, § 520.

Cases of this character in which the power of summary abatement was sustained are North American Cold Storage Co. v. Chicago, 211 U. S. 306, 53 L. ed. 195, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 101, 15 Ann. Cas. 276; Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L.R.A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850, 26 N. E. 100; New Orleans v. Charouleau, 121 La. 890, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 332, 46 So. 911, 15 Ann. Cas. 46; Durand v. Dyson, 271 Ill. 382, 111 N. E. 143, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 84; Sings v. Joliet, 237 Ill. 300, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1128, 127 Am. St. Rep. 323, 86 N. E. 663; Frost v. People, 193 Ill. 635, 86 Am. St. Rep. 352, 61 N. E. 1054, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 689; and King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305, 38 Am. Rep. 89. The right of abatement in such cases is limited to nuisances per se, or to cases of imminent danger to the public health or safety, or to articles dangerous to the public welfare the possession of which is prohibited by law, and the abatement must be limited to the necessity of the case and no wanton or unnecessary destruction must be occasioned. "The power of summary abatement does not extend to property in itself harmless and which may be lawfully used, but which is actually put to unlawful use or is otherwise kept in a condition contrary to law. . . . The unlawful use may, however, be punished, and the punishment may include a forfeiture of the property used to commit the unlawful act. . . . Such forfeiture is not an exercise of the police power, but of the judicial power; i. e., the taking of the property does not directly subserve the public welfare, but is intended as punishment for an unlawful act. Hence forfeiture requires judicial proceedings, either personal notice to the owner or at least a proceeding in rem, with notice by publication." Freund, Pol. Power, §§ 525, 526.

In Darst v. People, 51 Ill. 286, 2 Am. Rep. 301, it was held that an ordinance declaring all intoxicating liquors kept in the town for the purpose of being sold or given away as a beverage, to be drunk in the town, a nuisance, and directing the police officers to abate the nuisance by removing the liquor beyond the town limits, did not authorize the officers to seize and carry away intoxicating liquors without first having the question of violation of the ordinance judicially determined.

In Baldwin v. Smith, 82 Ill. 162, a municipal ordinance provided that upon the revocation of a dramshop license the town constable should immediately close up the grocery of the licensee, but the licensee recovered a judgment against the constable and others for taking possession of his grocery, which was affirmed, the court saying that the saloon must be adjudged a nuisance before it could be abated. There must first be legal proceedings.

In Hey Sing Ieck v. Anderson, 57 Cal. 251, 40 Am. Rep. 115, an owner of boats and nets lent them to a Chinese fisherman, who used them in violation of a statute (Penal Code, § 636) which provided that all nets, seines, fishing tackle, boats, or other implements used in catching or taking fish in violation of the statute should be forfeited, or might be seized by a peace officer of the county and destroyed or sold at public auction, upon notice posted in the county for five days. The court said: "But the statute under consideration contained no provisions whatever for determining whether the property was liable to condemnation for the forfeiture denounced against it for the criminal acts of those who had it in their possession. It merely authorized a peace officer to seize the property without warrant or process, to condemn it without proof, or the observance of any judicial forms, and to destroy it without notice of any kind, or sell it upon notice posted anywhere in the county for five days. Such an enactment cannot be harmonized with those constitutional guaranties which are supposed to secure everyone within the state in his rights of liberty and property."

In State v. Robbins, 124 Ind. 308, 8 L.R.A. 438, 24 N. E. 978, it is said: "Unless, therefore articles seized are of such a character that the law will not recognize them as property, entitled as such to its protection, under any circumstances, they cannot be summarily destroyed without affording the owner an opportunity to be heard upon the subject of their unlawful use, and to show whether or not the articles are intrinsically useful or valuable for any other purpose than gambling, or whether their only recognized value and customary use are as implements for gambling."

The case of Edson v. Crangle, 62 Ohio St. 49, 56 N. E. 647, was an action against an officer for the possession of nets used in fishing. The court held the statute authorizing the confiscation of the property by the officers to be unconstitutional, saying: "While the seizure may be made in the first instance by an officer of the law doing no unnecessary damage, the confiscation must be made by the judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. This section gives the right of confiscation, but fails to provide a legal proceeding by which the confiscation may be adjudged, and, there being no other statute providing a proceeding in such cases, it attempts to take and sell private property and place the proceeds in the public treasury without any process of law. . . . Proper legal proceedings are always necessary to adjudge a forfeiture or confiscation, and to permit officers or private persons to seize, sell, or appropriate private property without legal proceedings, under a claim of confiscation, would be inconsistent with the principles of constitutional government, and would soon lead to fraud, corruption, oppression, and extortion."

A statute of the state of Nebraska (Comp. Stat. 1903, chap. 31, art. 3, § 3) provided that all guns, ammunition, dogs, blinds, decoys, and fishing tackle in actual use by any person while hunting or fishing without the license required by the act should be forfeited to the state, and made it the duty of every officer charged with the enforcement of the act to seize, sell, or dispose of the same in the manner provided for the sale or disposition of property on execution and to pay over the proceeds thereof to the county treasurer for use of the school fund. Three persons were hunting in violation of the game law, using shot-guns belonging to one of the hunters. A deputy game warden seized the guns, and the owner brought an action of replevin for them and recovered a judgment, which the supreme court affirmed in McConnell v. McKillip, 71 Neb. 712, 65 L.R.A. 610, 115 Am. St. Rep. 614, 99 N. W. 505, 8 Ann. Cas. 898. The court said: "The legislature has not declared a gun to be a public nuisance and has not ordered its destruction as an abatement of the same. The seizure of the property provided for by this section is evidently intended, not only to put it out of the power of the offending person to carry on the destruction of game by depriving him of the implement of destruction, but also to operate as a penalty or punishment for an unlawful act committed by him. It is of the nature of a common-law forfeiture of goods upon conviction of a crime. . . . There is a clear and marked distinction between that species of property which can only be used for an illegal purpose, and which therefore may be declared a nuisance and summarily abated, and that which is innocent in its ordinary and proper use, and which only becomes illegal when used for an unlawful purpose. We know of no principle of law which justifies the seizure of property, innocent in itself, its forfeiture, and the transfer of the right of property in the same from one person to another as a punishment for crime, without the right of a hearing upon the guilt or innocence of the person charged before the forfeiture takes effect. If the property seized by a gamekeeper or warden were a public nuisance, such as provided for in § 1, he had the right under the duties of his office at common law to abate the same without judicial process or proceeding, and the great weight of authority is to the effect that such common-law rights have not been abrogated or set aside by the provisions of the Constitution; but if the property is of such a nature that, though innocent in itself and susceptible of a beneficial use, it has been perverted to an unlawful use, and is subject to forfeiture to the state as a penalty, no person has a right to deprive the owner of his property summarily, without affording an opportunity for a hearing and without due process of law."

In Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L.R.A. 134, 16 Am. St. Rep. 813, 23 N. E. 878, a statute of the state declared all nets set in certain public waters in violation of any law enacted for the protection of fish to be a public nuisance, and provided that they might be abated and summarily destroyed by any person, and that it should be the duty of every game constable to seize, remove, and forthwith destroy the same, and that no action for damages should lie against any person on account of such seizure and destruction. The supreme court of New York held this section to be constitutional. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The inquiry in the present case comes to this: Whether the destruction of the nets set in violation of law, authorized and required by the Act of 1883, is simply a proper, reasonable, and necessary regulation for the abatement of the nuisance, or transcends that purpose, and is to be regarded as the imposition and infliction of a forfeiture of the owners' right of property in the nets, in the nature of a punishment. We regard the case as very near the border line, but we think the legislation may be fairly sustained on the ground that the destruction of nets so placed is a reasonable incident of the power to abate the nuisance. The owner of the nets is deprived of his property, but not as the direct object of the law, but as incident to the abatement of the nuisance. . . . But the general rule undoubtedly is that the abatement must be limited by necessity, and no wanton and unnecessary injury must be committed. 3 Bl. Com. p. 6, note. It is conceivable that nets illegally set could, with the use of care, be removed without destroying them. But in view of their position, the difficulty attending their removal, the liability to injury in the process, their comparatively small value, we think the legislature could adjudge their destruction as a reasonable means of abating the nuisance."

None of the reasons mentioned by the court apply to the present case. The destruction of the automobile is no more a necessary regulation for the abatement of the nuisance than the destruction of the house used for the sale of intoxicating liquors contrary to law or of a house of ill fame would be necessary to abate that nuisance, and the court expressly states that the tearing down of a building so kept would not be justified as the exercise of the power of summary abatement, and that a statute authorizing it would add nothing to the justification. The only object the destruction could have would be the punishment of the owner or the prevention of the future unlawful use of the automobile, and the court says that the legislature could not decree the destruction or forfeiture of property for these purposes. The controlling argument seems to have been the comparatively small value, but this argument has no application in this case. The value of the property affected by the Search and Seizure Act cannot be assumed to be "comparatively small."

The judgment of the supreme court of New York was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499), the court saying: "In this case there can be no doubt of the right of the legislature to authorize judicial proceedings to be taken for the condemnation of the nets in question and their sale or destruction by process of law. Congress has assumed this power in a large number of cases, by authorizing the condemnation of property which has been made use of for the purpose of defrauding the revenue. Examples of this are vessels illegally registered or owned or employed in smuggling or other illegal traffic, distilleries or breweries illegally carried on or operated, and buildings standing upon or near the boundary line between the United States and another country, and used as depots for smuggling goods. In all these cases, however, the forfeiture was decreed by judicial proceeding. But where the property is of little value, and its use for the illegal purpose is clear, the legislature may declare it to be a nuisance and subject to summary abatement. Instances of this are the power to kill diseased cattle, to pull down houses in the path of conflagrations, destruction of decayed fruit or fish or unwholesome meats, or infected clothing, obscene books or pictures, or instruments which can only be used for illegal purposes. While the legislature has no right arbitrarily to declare that to be a nuisance which is clearly not so, a good deal must be left to its discretion in that regard, and if the object to be accomplished is conducive to the public interests it may exercise a large liberty of choice in the means employed."

The argument of the small value of the property involved does not affect the principle of constitutional power or tend to show the summary destruction of the property to be reasonably essential to the suppression of the illegal use, as was pointed out by the Chief Justice Fuller in his dissenting opinion, in which two of the associate justices concurred. None of the instances of summary abatement which the court mentions rest in any degree on the fact that the property is of little value. In the present case it does not appear that the property is of little value, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that, where the property is of little value, the legislature may declare it a nuisance and subject to summary abatement, if it might otherwise be entitled to weight, is not applicable. Under this law a man's automobile may be stolen from his garage, loaded with intoxicating liquor stolen from his cellar, where it is lawfully kept, driven on the public highway of the state in violation of law, seized by an officer, taken, with the thief who stole it, before a judge, condemned, and destroyed with no notice to the owner, who may have no knowledge of the occurrence until long after his property has been destroyed.

Our conclusion is that the provision of the Search and Seizure Act for the destruction of the intoxicating liquor and other property seized, under the order of the court, without providing that notice shall be given to the owner or persons interested in the property, does not afford due process of law and is a violation of the Constitution. The statute having provided no lawful procedure for condemning the property to destruction, the court was without authority to make any order for that purpose.

The judgment will be affirmed as to the plaintiff in error Harvey Marquis and reversed as to the other plaintiffs in error, and the cause remanded to the County Court of McHenry County.

Reversed in part and remanded.

Duncan, J., dissenting:

I concur in that part of the decision of the majority of the court that deals with and holds that the provisions of the Search and Seizure Act providing for the seizure and destruction of intoxicating liquors and other property used in its transportation are void because in violation of the Constitution. I cannot concur with that portion of the decision which apparently recognizes the validity of the provisions of the statute which provide, in substance, that intoxicating liquors cannot be legally transported in this state and delivered to any person or consignee for any use or purpose other than that named in the act. The act clearly provides and intends, when considered in its entirety, that intoxicating liquors can only be lawfully transported in this state when the same are to be sold or used for medicinal, sacramental, chemical, mechanical, or manufacturing purposes. Section 3 of the act specifically so provides. The only exception or provision in that section throwing any doubt upon this interpretation is the proviso in that section that nothing in the act shall be construed to forbid "any consignee from transporting his vessel or package of intoxicating liquor from the nearest place of delivery to the nearest carrier to the place where such liquor is to be used." All semblance of such doubt is removed by § 7 of the act, which specifically provides that no carrier shall within prohibition territory turn over or deliver any intoxicating liquor, under any circumstances whatever, to any consignee whomsoever, except when consigned: First, to a druggist; second, wine to any bona fide church or religious society for sacramental purposes; third, alcohol to any person for chemical, mechanical, or manufacturing purposes. Section 9 of the act permits intoxicating liquor to be sold by a druggist and delivered to a sick person on a written prescription of a physician who has personally examined such sick person and shall therein state that such person is in immediate need of the kind and amount of liquor prescribed, and shall also state definitely the place where such liquor is to be used or administered. Under § 13 of the act any consignee, purchaser, or person to whom any intoxicating liquor shall be delivered under the provisions of the act may receive a written permit from the sheriff to remove such liquor to another designated place, and the giving of such permit is wholly within the discretion of such officer.

No intoxicating liquors except those that are held and to be disposed of and used for the purposes aforesaid are permitted to be transported under this act within prohibition territory in this state by any person, as principal, clerk, or servant. The whole state is declared to be prohibition territory by the decision in this case. "Intoxicating liquor" is defined by the act to include all distilled, spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquor which contains more than  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol, and all alcoholic liquids, compounds, and preparations, whether proprietary, patented, or not, which are potable, and which are capable of or suitable for being used as a beverage. It is thus clearly made to appear that no legal owner of any cider, wine, or beer containing more than  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 1 per cent of alcohol, whether heretofore legally made by himself, from his own apples, grapes, or other products grown by himself, or whether heretofore legally purchased and stored in his cellar or home for his own and his family's private home use as a beverage, is permitted by this act to transport and remove the same, either by himself or by another, to another place or home to be there used by himself and family as a beverage. It also prohibits all possessors and owners of all other intoxicants whatever that were heretofore legally bought and stored by them and for their own private use as a beverage from in any way transporting such liquors to any other place or home they may desire or have necessity to remove them in order that they may use them for such purpose.

It ought not to require any learned discussion or citation of authorities to convince any court or lawyer that such a restriction upon the use or upon the transportation of property for private use is an invasion of the constitutional right of every citizen in this state. No court has ever declared, so far, as I know, that a man has not the constitutional right to use as a beverage intoxicating liquor legally purchased and stored by him for such purpose, when used in moderation. He is denied that right when he is prohibited by statute from removing that liquor to another home or repository when necessity compels him to remove it in order that he may so use it. Such a denial is an invasion of his right of property. The decision of the court in this case recognizes the right of property in the owner of the beer mentioned in this case and holds that it cannot be destroyed under this act, but must be restored to such owner; yet in the same decision the court sustains the act which provides that it cannot be legally transported to or by the owner, to be used by himself as a beverage. It is his property and must be restored to him, but he cannot move and use it for any purpose except as provided by the act. This amounts virtually to confiscation when we come to consider the proposition that beer's recognized use in this country is almost exclusively as a beverage.

I believe that this statute is also entirely void as to the provisions in reference to the transportation of intoxicating liquor. It is clear that it is void in the particular already named, wherein it prohibits an owner from transporting such liquor to another home or place for his own use when necessity compels him to remove it to secure him such use. The general rule is that a statute void in part is void as a whole, if all the provisions of the act are so interwoven as to be incapable of distinct separation or are of such a character that it cannot be said that the legislature intended that the valid parts shall be enforced if the other parts fail. 1 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. § 270. The rule is more stringent in regard to criminal statutes. "A law void as to certain property (intoxicating liquors) already possessed at the passage of the law, but which would be valid if confined to such property subsequently acquired, is wholly void, being general, so as to include both in penal destruction of value." Id. § 299. I am satisfied that the legislature would never have passed the Search and Seizure Act with reference to the transportation of intoxicating liquors if it had known that so much of it was void as has been declared so by the opinion of the court in this case and as indicated in this dissenting opinion.

It necessarily follows from the foregoing discussion that it is my judgment that plaintiff in error Marquis was not proven guilty of any offense against the laws of this state. He was simply charged with unlawfully transporting intoxicating liquors containing more than  $\frac{1}{2}$  of 1 per cent alcohol in a certain auto truck over certain public highways in the county of McHenry, within prohibition territory, etc. It was neither charged nor proved in the trial the purpose for which the liquors were to be transported and used. If they were to be used by the consignee and legal owner for his own private use as a beverage, such transportation and use were legal, although prohibited by said act. Such an owner for such a use had a right to transport such liquors, either by himself or another as his agent, and the agent would be no more guilty of an offense against the law than his principal. If the act of transportation had been for the unlawful purpose of selling the intoxicating liquor, and the act prohibiting its transportation for sale could be sustained as valid on that ground, the court could not then legally assume, without proof, that the transportation was for such unlawful purpose merely because of the fact that Marquis was purposely avoiding certain towns and counties where he might be arrested under this act. The act provides that it is unlawful for the owner to transport such liquor for his own use, which rendered that much of the act void, but Marquis was as likely to be arrested for the violation of that part of the law as any other portion of it that might be held valid. So in any event, whether the act be only void in part or void in toto, he cannot be properly convicted under the evidence. When a person's acts and conduct are such as to lead to two reasonable conclusions, one that he is evading certain towns and counties because he is likely to be arrested for doing a lawful act prohibited by an invalid part of a statute, and the other that he is doing an unlawful act prohibited by the same statute, he is entitled to the presumption that he was doing the lawful act, and not the unlawful act. Marquis did not have to intentionally take all chances of an unlawful arrest to be entitled to his legal presumption of innocence. So in any view of the case I do not think the state made out any case against him. The judgment as to him should be reversed.

For the foregoing reasons I respectfully dissent from that part of the decision of the court sustaining the judgment of conviction as to plaintiff in error Marquis.

Farmer, J., also dissenting:

I agree with that part of the opinion of the court which holds that the provisions of the act authorizing the destruction of property are unconstitutional and void, and I agree with the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Duncan that those provisions are so interwoven with the other provisions of the act and are so material a part of it that it cannot be presumed the legislature intended that if those provisions were void the remainder of the act should be retained and enforced. It is my view, therefore, that the entire act should be held unconstitutional.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statutes providing for confiscation or destruction, without notice, of intoxicating liquors, and vehicles or other property used in connection with same.

- I. In general, 888.
- II. Theory of nuisance per se, 888.
- III. Proceedings in rem, 889.
- IV. Decisions requiring notice, 891.
- V. Miscellaneous, 893.

I. In general.

For forfeiture by innocent vendor of article sold conditionally and used by vendee in violation of law, see the annotation to H. A. White Auto Co. v. Collins, 2 A.L.R. 1596.

For constitutional guaranties against unreasonable searches and seizures as applied to search for or seizure of intoxicating liquor, see the annotation to State v. Marxhausen, 3 A.L.R. 1514.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (PEOPLE v. MARQUIS, ante, 874) that a statute is unconstitutional which directs that intoxicating liquors, and the vehicles used to transport them in prohibition territory, shall be seized and destroyed, when such statute is without provisions requiring notice to the owner or person interested other than the person in possession, the owner in this case being not in possession and being, it was alleged, innocent of any guilt; as such statute did not afford due process of law.

II. Theory of nuisance per se.

A statute providing for the destruction of intoxicating liquors without notice to the owner has been sustained on the ground that the liquor is an outlaw; as, for example, where the statute declared that there shall be no property rights in intoxicating liquors when possessed in a quantity in excess of that permitted by the statute. Thus, in Delaney v. Plunkett (1916) 146 Ga. 547, L.R.A.1917D, 926, 91 S. E.

561, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 685, it was held that "liquors of the prohibited classes cannot be kept at all in certain places, cannot be kept in excess of limited quantities anywhere, and cannot be sold; and where such liquors are kept in excess of the quantities allowed, the keeping or possessing of them is unlawful. The qualities of property theretofore existing in them were taken away, and it was competent for the legislature to declare that they should be seized, condemned, and destroyed, upon order of the judge of the court having jurisdiction; and such provision was a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not unconstitutional on the ground that it did not provide for a hearing." The court said: "No hearing was necessary before the issuance of an order by the proper court for the destruction of the liquors seized and taken in accordance with the directions of this act. The liquors on hand in each case were in excess of the amount which the law allows to be in the possession of any one person at one time. Consequently the possession was unlawful. Under the provisions of the law, the person in possession had no right to keep the liquor for his personal use, nor for any domestic or social purpose. If he could not have it in possession, he could not handle it; and, of course, under our law as it stands, he could not sell it. . . . A hearing, where it was admitted that the thing seized was liquor in quantities in excess of that allowed by law, was entirely unnecessary. Suppose that a hearing had been had, what questions could have been raised before the judge? If it had been contended that the liquors seized were not intoxicating nor alcoholic, that they did not belong to any of the inhibited classes, or that they were not in quantity such as to make their possession unquestionably unlawful, and that they were about to be destroyed, then there would have been subject-matter for a hearing and a trial. So far as this act provides for the seizure, condemnation, and destruction of liquors, it provides for nothing more than for the seizure and destruction of that which it is absolutely unlawful to keep. And the seizure of these goods, in the present cases, their condemnation, and the order for their destruction, violated no constitutional right."

Where the party complaining was an innocent lienor of an automobile whose lien existed prior to the statute, the court sustained as a valid exercise of the police power such statute, which provided for the forfeiture and sale of a vehicle used in the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquors upon the conviction of the person in charge thereof and seized therewith, after a trial of such person upon a complaint filed against such person and also against the vehicle, the statute declaring that "said party and vehicle shall be held for trial as in a criminal action." The court said: "We hold that, upon seizure of the car and conviction of the owner, the car, in the language of the act, became 'a common nuisance' in which there was 'no property rights of any kind whatsoever.'" Robinson v. Cadillac Motor Car Co. v. Ratekin (1920) — Neb. —, 177 N. W. 337.

III. Proceedings in rem.

Statutes requiring the destruction of intoxicating liquors and their vehicles are usually considered as providing for a proceeding in rem. These statutes as a rule require notice to be given to the keeper or owner, if known, and often provide for posting or publishing notices. Statutes of this character would seem to be valid within the general theory of proceedings in rem, that is, that possession of the res gives jurisdiction, and that the seizure is notice to everybody, including the person in possession, who is in theory the owner or his agent, and that no other notice is required unless provided for by the statute. A heavy strain is put upon this doctrine by cases such as the reported case (PEOPLE v. MARQUIS, ante, 874), where it appears that it was sought to forfeit the automobile of an innocent party under a statute which did not necessarily require notice to him. And as has been seen, it was held by the court that by reason of the failure to require notice such a statute did not afford due process of law. The court does not characterize the proceeding as one in rem, but such it seems to have been. No state of affairs can be satisfactory which enables the government to forfeit the lawful property of an innocent person without compensation.

Statutes providing for the destruction of intoxicating liquors by means of a proceeding in rem are valid although they do not require personal notice to the owner. Campbell v. State (1908) 171 Ind. 702, 87 N. E. 212; Steward v. State (1913) 180 Ind. 397, 108 N. E. 316; State v. McManus (1902) 65 Kan. 720, 70 Pac. 700; Stahl v. Lee (1905) 71 Kan. 511, 80 Pac. 988; Lincoln v. Smith (1855) 27 Vt. 328; Johnson v. Williams (1876) 48 Vt. 565; State v. Intoxicating Liquor (1909) 82 Vt. 287, 73 Atl. 586; Landers v. Com. — Va. —, 101 S. E. 778.

See also Farley v. Liquors Seized in Car (1913) 80 Misc. 32, 141 N. Y. Supp. 696, infra, IV.

In Tracey v. Corse (1874) 58 N. Y. 143, the court said: "That the proceeding is in rem does not dispense with the rule of universal justice, that a party shall not be condemned without an opportunity to be heard. It is true that he is not entitled to personal notice before a court can adjudge the forfeiture of his property, but he must have notice, either actual or constructive, of the proceeding or it will be void. The custody of the res may be constructive notice that the court having possession will proceed to adjudicate upon it, and notice may be given in this way or by publication, according to the usual practice of the court, and then he is bound to defend or assert his rights if he has any. Notice in this way may never in fact reach him; in many cases the giving of personal notice is impracticable, nor is it required; but the rule requiring notice, either actual or constructive, is fundamental and ought never to be departed from."

In a proceeding in rem for the destruction of intoxicating liquors the court said, referring to the statutory requirement that a copy of the warrant and notice of the hearing be posted if no one was found in possession of the liquors: "The notice by posting provided is constructive notice, and is notice to all persons claiming an interest in the property. The matter of notice in such cases is a legislative one, and constructive notice is sufficient." Campbell v. State (1908) 171 Ind. 702, 87 N. E. 212. The same was held in Steward v. State (1913) 180 Ind. 397, 103 N. E. 316.

A statute providing for notice to the keeper of the liquors, who is maintaining the place where they are kept as a common nuisance, and for a posting of a copy of the notice in such place, is sufficient, as the proceeding is one in rem as to the liquors regardless of whether there has been an arrest or conviction of the person charged with maintaining such place. State v. McManus (1902) 65 Kan. 720, 70 Pac. 700; Stahl v. Lee (1905) 71 Kan. 511, 80 Pac. 983.

In Lincoln v. Smith (1855) 27 Vt. 328, the court upheld a statute providing for the destruction of intoxicating liquors kept for the purpose of sale, which declared that "the owner or keeper of the liquor so seized, if he be known to the officer seizing the same, shall be summoned by him to appear forthwith before the justice issuing the warrant; and if he fail to appear, or to show by satisfactory evidence," etc., "such liquor shall be adjudged forfeited, and shall be destroyed." The court considered the proceeding one in rem and said: "The statute makes it the duty of the officer to summon the owner or keeper, etc., if known to him. What possible objection is there to this? If it should be said that the officer may summon a person, as owner or keeper, on mistaken ground, and that the property might be condemned and destroyed without an opportunity being given to the true owner to appear and defend, a sufficient answer to this is, if such should be the case, and the property be proceeded against without any further notice, that the true owner would not be bound by the proceeding." But stated further: "As in the present case Lincoln was summoned by the officer to appear before the magistrate, and did appear to claim the property, there is no occasion to spend time with the 13th section, which provides for giving notice, and prescribes the course of proceeding where the owner or keeper is unknown to the officer."

In Johnson v. Williams (1876) 48 Vt. 565, supra, the court said: "The proceedings were strictly in compliance with the provisions of the statute. They are in the nature of proceedings in rem, and, if regular, fix the status of the property, and in that respect are binding upon all the world. All the notice required by the statute was given. The person to whose keeping the plaintiff had intrusted this property was notified. If he failed to appear to contest the adjudication of forfeiture, or to notify the plaintiff, so that he could appear for that purpose, the consequences of such failure must fall upon the plaintiff. It does not avoid the legality of those proceedings, or change the status of the property as fixed by that adjudication."

In State v. Intoxicating Liquor (1909) 82 Vt. 287, 73 Atl. 586, supra, the court, in sustaining the statute, said: "It is objected that the statute on which the proceeding is founded is unconstitutional because it nowhere provides for notice to the owner of the liquor seized unless he is known to the officer making the seizure. It is said that the previous statutes providing for the seizure and condemnation of liquor, and whose constitutionality has been upheld by this court, have had a provision for some kind of notice in such cases. But none of them had a provision for any kind of notice except by summons, only when no one was known who could be notified in that way, not only the owner, but the keeper and possessor as well, in which case a written notice of the proceedings was to be posted in some public place for such a time. But now, if the owner or keeper of the liquor is unknown to the officer, and no one is found in possession or custody of it, instead of posting a notice of the proceedings, the owner or occupant of the building or apartments in which the liquor is found is to be apprehended if known to the officer or can be ascertained by him. This mode of notifying the owner in the event named, is a substitute for the former mode of notifying him by posting the proceedings in the like event. So it cannot be said that the statute is essentially different in this respect from what it was when its constitutionality was upheld by the court. But to consider the matter farther,—the theory of the law is, as said in Windsor v. McVeigh (1876) 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914, that all property is in the possession of its owner in person or by agent, and therefore that its seizure will operate to impart notice thereof to him."

In Landers v. Com. (1919) — Va. —, 101 S. E. 778, supra, the court said: "It must be borne in mind that this is a proceeding in rem, and that personal service of notice is not necessary to its validity. . . . The citation provided by clause (a) is a general citation of 'all persons concerned in interest,' and the method of service prescribed is by publication. The persons concerned in interest may be wholly unknown, but that is immaterial. If the publication is duly made, the interest of such persons will be as completely forfeited as if their names were inserted in the publication. . . . The seizure of the res brings it into the custody of the court, but does not confer jurisdiction upon the court to render a judgment in rem. It is just as essential in such case that there should be constructive notice as it is in personal judgments that there should be personal notice. The legislature may prescribe such form of notice as it sees fit. The manner of notification is immaterial, but the notification itself is indispensable. Windsor v. McVeigh (U. S.) supra."

It may be noted that in State v. Brennan's Liquors (1856) 25 Conn. 278, the court said, in a case where the keeper of the liquors appears to have been the owner: "The proceeding in this case is a proceeding in rem. The statute provides that liquor unlawfully kept for sale shall be deemed a nuisance. The object is to have it seized and destroyed as such. After the liquor has been seized, and thus brought within the jurisdiction of the magistrate, he is to appoint a time and place for the hearing, and give notice to the person in whose possession it was found, and all other persons interested, by serving a written notice upon him, and setting up another upon the public signpost, for a period of at least two weeks, for them to appear, if they see cause, and defend. And any person may appear and be made a party defendant. . . . It is to be presumed that the magistrate will discharge the duty conferred upon him properly; that he will not decree a forfeiture, if the party in interest is not before the court, without giving him due notice to appear; or if it should appear that the person having it, with intent to sell, was a mere trespasser, and the true owner was chargeable with no fault or neglect."

IV. Decisions requiring notice.

If the proceeding for the destruction of the liquors is criminal it will of course require all the constitutional safe guards of criminal proceedings.

A state (Rhode Island) statute providing that intoxicating liquors "be seized and detained, and adjudged forfeited, if the owner or keeper fail to appear, and if he do appear, that he shall be fined or imprisoned, if found guilty," brings into action "a criminal process both against the owner and his property," and if it provides for no notice to the owner and permits him to have a jury trial only on certain onerous conditions, it is invalid. Greene v. Briggs (1852) 1 Curt. C. C. 311, Fed. Cas. No. 5,764.

Where a statute provides for confiscation and forfeiture of intoxicating liquors by a proceeding both civil and criminal, and does not provide for notice to or a trial of the accused, it cannot be sustained. Hibbard v. People (1856) 4 Mich. 125.

Compare Kansas cases supra, III.

• It has been held that where a statute for the forfeiture of liquors unlawfully kept for sale provided for no notice of any allegation of the facts necessary to warrant a forfeiture or of any proceeding against the liquors to be given, the provision as to forfeiture was void. State ex rel. Potter v. Snow (1854) 3 R. I. 64, followed in Greene v. James (1854) 2 Curt. C. C. 187, Fed. Cas. No. 5,766.

A town ordinance declaring a nuisance all intoxicating liquors kept within the limits of said town, for the purpose of being sold or given away, as a beverage, to be drunk within said town, and directing the police officers to abate said nuisance by removing the liquor beyond the town limits, cannot authorize the officers to take the property away without giving the owners an opportunity to be heard before a court in defense. Darst v. People (1869) 51 Ill. 286, 2 Am. Rep. 301.

In condemning charter and ordinance the court in Sullivan v. Oneida (1871) 61 Ill. 242 said, inter alia: "The charter permits their seizure without any notice to the owner. The ordinance is but a slight, if any, improvement. It authorizes the seizure of the liquors and the arrest of the person. But if he is not found, no notice, actual or constructive, is provided for."

See also the reported case (PEOPLE v. MARQUIS, ante, 874).

In Fisher v. McGirr (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381, where the court condemned a statute for the destruction of intoxicating liquors, it is not very clear what defects were considered vital, but the decision is perhaps based on the general looseness of the statute. The court seems to consider that though the proceeding be in rem, it is very highly penal, and should be conducted with the strictness of a criminal proceeding, including notice to the owner.

Where the notice which was to be delivered to the keeper if present at the time of the seizure, a copy of which was also to be posted, was to those claiming any right, title, or interest in the liquors, it was held in Clement v. Liquors Seized (1909) 62 Misc. 27, 115 N. Y. Supp. 162, that the "innocent owner of bottles in which beer is kept by a third person in violation of the New York Liquor Tax Law will not lose such bottles under the statute providing that liquors kept 'for the purpose of sale or distribution therein, in violation of the provisions of this act, and the vessels in which such liquors are contained, are declared to be a nuisance and are forfeited to the state when seized, and such forfeiture declared in the manner provided in this section.'" The court, after pointing out that the legislature had not absolutely prohibited the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, said: "While, within the reasonable exercise of its police power, the legislature may provide for the confiscation, forfeiture, and destruction of liquors kept for the purpose of sale or distribution contrary to the Liquor Tax Law, and may perhaps have the right to provide for a destruction of the vessels containing such liquors when owned or claimed by the guilty possessor, I cannot concede the right to order the destruction of such vessels when owned or claimed by another without any manner of notice to such owner or opportunity to be heard. . . . I fail to see that the destruction of bottles in such a case has appropriate or direct or in any manner necessary or reasonable connection with the main purpose of the law; and in so far as said section directs such destruction without regard to the ownership of the vessels it is not a fair and reasonable exercise of the police power, and is in conflict with the constitutional provisions" prohibiting the deprivation of the property of a person without due process of law.

After the decision of Clement v. Liquors Seized (N. Y.) supra, the legislature of the state of New York passed § 33 amending the defect in § 31c of the Liquor Tax Law, by providing that notice be given to the owner of the vessels containing the liquors, and giving such owner an opportunity to be heard. Under this amended statute it was held in Farley v. Liquors Seized in Car (1913) 80 Misc. 32, 141 N. Y. Supp. 696, that bottles of an innocent owner might be forfeited in an action in rem as the amendment removed the objection to the former act, and therefore the statute as amended did not violate the Constitution of the United States or of the state of New York, providing that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law.

V. Miscellaneous.

It may be noted that it was held in Herlihy v. Donohue (1916) 52 Mont. 601, L.R.A.1917B, 702, 161 Pac. 164, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 29, 14 N. C. C. A. 1022, that "militia officers called to suppress an insurrection are personally liable for destroying without hearing or adjudication the stock of a saloon keeper for neglecting to obey an order to keep his saloon closed between specified hours, where there is nothing to show necessity for such destruction."

In Beavers v. Goodwin (1905) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 90 S. W. 930, it was held that an act providing for the seizure of intoxicating liquors without stating what is to be done with them is unconstitutional.

Where intoxicating liquors were seized under a statute providing for such seizure without notice to anyone, on an affidavit of belief that they were being kept or offered for sale or sold in violation of law, the statute provided that "any person may, by affidavit, claim the liquor seized, and thereupon an issue is to be made up to try the claim. If no one claim the liquors, they are to be destroyed." It was held that one who had made claim to the liquors could not insist that the statute was unconstitutional as not providing for notice. The court said that whether the statute "is constitutional or not,—and we are inclined to think it is, although not now deciding that point,—this appellant is in no condition to question it on the ground on which he puts his assault. His own contention is that the act is unconstitutional because not providing for notice, and yet the appellant appeared, and has contested the case through all the courts. The only purpose notice would serve has been accomplished in his case, and courts do not pass upon the constitutionality of statutes at the instance of parties not in a position to question them." Quin v. State (1903) 82 Miss. 75, 33 So. 839.

While beyond the scope of this annotation as not discussing the constitutional question, reference may be here made to State v. Davis (1919) — Utah, —, 184 Pac. 161, where the court reversed a judgment of forfeiture of an automobile in which intoxicating liquors were being illegally transported, on the ground that the statute, while authorizing the confiscation of such vehicles in general, did not exact the confiscation of vehicles as against innocent owners or lienors who were without knowledge or information as to the illegal use. Frick, J., wrote a dissenting opinion, expressing the view that the statute did not expressly authorize the confiscation at all of the vehicles in which liquor was being transported, and that the courts should not by construction give such a meaning to the statute. ## BANK OF OXFORD, Appt.,

J. S. LOVE et al., State Bank Examiners.

(111 Miss. 699, 72 So. 133.)

Bank — supervision of examiners — impairing contract rights.

Placing under the supervision of state bank examiners a bank whose charter gives control of it to its stockholders, so that the examiners may make certain requirements as to capital, collaterals, and general conditions, and require its liquidation under certain circumstances inimical to the public interests, does not impair its constitutional contract rights.

[See note on this question beginning on page 898.]

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hinds County (Taylor, Ch.) sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from interfering with plaintiff's affairs, and to recover money paid by it under protest for their support. Affirmed.

The acts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Mayes & Mayes for appellant.

Mr. George H. Ethridge, Assistant Attorney General, for appellees.

Holden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Bank of Oxford, filed its bill in the chancery court of Lafayette county, seeking to enjoin the state bank examiners, J. S. Love et al., appellees, from interfering, under the State Banking Law enacted in 1914, with its stockholders and directors in the administration of its internal affairs, and to recover the money paid by it under protest under the State Banking Law for the support of the said bank examiners. From a decree denying the relief sought by the Bank of Oxford, it appeals here.

Briefly stated, the allegations of the bill are that the Bank of Oxford was organized under and incorporated by a special act of the Mississippi legislature approved in March, 1872; that said incorporating act was promptly accepted by appellant, the requisite amount of capital stock paid in, and that the corporation duly organized and commenced its banking business under such charter, and has conducted its business as such continuously from the date of its organization up to the date of the filing of this bill; that, in and by said charter, it was provided, amongst other things, that the bank shall have the right and exercise the privileges appertaining to a general banking, exchange, and brokerage business, with all the powers of a body corporate; that § 4 of said bank charter provides "that the business of said bank shall be confided to and controlled by its stockholders under such rules of laws and regulations as said company may see fit to adopt, provided that the same be not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or of this state."

The bill then sets forth the enactment by the Mississippi legislature on the 9th day of March, 1914, of the act establishing a banking department, and that by § 10 of such act it is provided that the bank examiners thereby created should examine twice a year, and oftener if necessary, at irregular intervals and without prior notice, the banks organized under the laws of the state; that § 11 of said act provides that at such examinations the examiners should have the power and duty to examine the cash, bills, collaterals, securities, books of account, the condition of affairs at the bank, the mode of conducting and managing the affairs of the bank, the actions of its directors, and the investment of the funds of the bank; that § 21 of said act provides that if any bank examiner should, from any such examination, be of opinion that any bank is insolvent, or that its condition is such that a further continuance of its business is hazardous to its creditors, depositors, or the public, or that the bank has failed to comply with any rules or instructions provided by law, he should forthwith call a meeting of the board of examiners and report the facts to such meeting; that § 20 of said act provides that if the said board should find any bank is attempting to do business with less than the minimum capital required by law, or without having its full capital stock paid in, or that any bank is insolvent, or that any bank has for any reason failed, it shall be the duty of the board of examiners forthwith to liquidate the said bank as provided in such statute; that such board should proceed to liquidate the business if the bank has made a payment of dividends contrary to law, or made any charges against the surplus account contrary to law, or suffered its capital to remain impaired after a thirty-days' notice, or allowed its reserve fund to remain below the minimum after thirty days' notice, or for persistent violation of any other provisions of the law. The bill then sets up the guaranty clause of the United States Constitution (art. 1, § 10), and alleges that because of such charter and such constitutional provision the state legislature had no power to subject the affairs of the appellant bank to the inspection, examination, decision, and control of said board of examiners, or to give the board of examiners any power in connection with or over the management of the bank's affairs, or to order or superintend any liquidation thereof. The bill then sets forth that the bank examiners, J. S. Love et al., appellees, were threatening to interfere with the affairs of said bank and to exercise the power provided for by said act of the state legislature, applying the same to said bank; and it invoked its immunity and exemption from such supervision and control under said contract clause of the Constitution of the United States. The prayer of the bill asks for an injunction against the bank examiners from interfering with its affairs, and also for a return of the tax so paid by it under such protest.

To this bill bank examiner J. S. Love et al., demurred; which demurrer was sustained by the chancellor, and the bill was dismissed.

The question presented to us here for decision is whether or not the Bank of Oxford, holding a legislative charter of date March —, 1872, which provides "that the business of said bank shall be confided to and controlled by its stockholders under such rules of law and regulations as said company may see fit to adopt, provided that the same be not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or of this state," is exempt from the operation of the State Banking Law enacted by the legislature in 1914; in other words, whether or not said bank, by its charter, is immune from the supervision and regulation provided for by the said Act of 1914. It will be observed that the appellant bank does not contend that the supervision and regulation of state banks imposed by said Act of 1914 is unreasonable, but appellant's contention here is based solely upon the ground that the act of the legislature of 1914 is not to be applied to it, as this would be an impairment of its charter rights of contract with the state, and therefore violative of its constitutional right of contract under the guaranty clause of the Federal Constitution (art. 1, § 10); that on account of the contract with the state as evidenced by its charter granted in 1872, the legislature now has no power to subject the affairs of the bank to the rules and regulations as provided in the said Banking Law of 1914.

It is not clear to us that the operation of the State Banking Act of 1914 conflicts with or interferes with the substantial rights of the appellant bank under its charter. The law undertakes to reasonably supervise and regulate the affairs of the bank with reference to its solvency and safety as to the public use, and public welfare; but we will concede, for the purposes of the discussion, that the Act of 1914 contravenes and interferes with the charter rights of the appellant bank, as granted to it by the legislature in 1872, in the management of its internal affairs. This raises the question of whether or not such rights of exemption, as claimed by the appellant bank under its charter, could be lawfully granted to it by an act of the legislature of 1872. In other words, did the legislature have the power and authority to grant to the appellant bank, through its charter, immunity and exemption from any reasonable regulations that might thereafter be imposed by the state under its inherent police power? We think not. It is contended by counsel for appellant that this kind of legislative contract cannot be restricted or controlled by the police power of the state, but that the police power extends only to matters affecting the public health or the public morals; but we think the authorities have settled the law contrary to the contention of counsel for appellant.

"The police power in its broadest acceptation means the general power of a government to preserve and promote the public welfare by prohibiting all things hurtful to the comfort, safety, and welfare of society, and establishing such rules and regulations for the conduct of all persons and the use and management of all property as may be conducive to the public interest." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 916.

"The police power is a governmental function, and neither the state legislature, nor any inferior legislative body to which a portion of such power has been granted, can alienate, surrender, or abridge the right to exercise such power by any grant, contract, or delegation whatsoever." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 921.

"The nature of the business done by banks in dealing with money, receiving deposits for safe-keeping, discounting paper, and loaning money, is such and is so affected with the public interest as to justify reasonable regulation for the protection of the people. The confidential and trust relations which exist between the bank and its patrons, and the difficulty which depositors and those dealing with the bank necessarily encounter in detecting irregular practices and in ascertaining the real financial condition of banks, are sufficient to justify police control and inspection." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 933.

It seems to be settled by the United States Supreme Court that the banking business is affected with a public use, and that it is within the power of the legislature to enact laws under their police power regulating the banking business. Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 55 L. ed. 112, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487; Shallenberger v. First State Bank, 219 U. S. 114, 55 L. ed. 117, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 189. The rights and powers granted to the appellant bank in its charter from the legislature in 1872 are only such powers as might be exercised by an individual, subject to the regulation and control of the legislature; and the legislature had no authority to surrender this power of control and regulation in the interest of the public welfare.

"No legislature can curtail the power of its successors to make such laws as they may deem proper in matters of police." Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079 (headnote).

"The police power of a state extends to the regulation of the banking business, and even to its prohibition, except on such conditions as the state may prescribe." Noble State Bank v. Haskell, supra (headnote).

Thus, in paragraph 3 of the headnotes of the last above-cited case, it was held that the enactment of the banking law, similar to the one in Mississippi, was within the police power of the state, and did not infringe the obligations of a charter contract. On page 111 of 219 U. S., the court, in speaking of the police power, said: "It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs. Camfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. ed. 260, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864. It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare. Among matters of that sort probably few would doubt that both usage and preponderant opinion give their sanction to enforcing the primary conditions of successful commerce. One of those conditions at the present time is the possibility of payment by checks drawn against bank deposits, to such an extent do checks replace currency in daily business. If, then, the legislature of the state thinks that the public welfare requires the measure under consideration, analogy and principle are in favor of the power to enact it."

The same conclusion was reached in Shallenberger v. First State Bank, supra, involving the constitutionality of a Nebraska statute; and the constitutionality of the law was upheld also in the case of Assaria State Bank v. Dolley, 219 U. S. 121, 55 L. ed. 123, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 189. In the case of Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989, the court in discussing charter rights and the contract clause of the Federal Constitution, says: "Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the extent and boundaries of the police power, and however difficult it may be to render a satisfactory definition of it, there seems to be no doubt that it does extend to the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and to the preservation of good order and the public morals. The legislature cannot, by any contract, divest itself of the power to provide for these objects. They belong emphatically to that class of objects which demand the application of the maxim, 'salus populi suprema lex,' and they are to be attained and provided for by such appropriate means as the legislative discretion may devise. That discretion can no more be bargained away than the power itself. Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302."

In the case of Stone v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 62 Miss. 607, 52 Am. Rep. 193, it is said in the third paragraph of the headnotes: "A grant to a railroad company, in general terms, of authority to fix its rates of compensation, is not a renunciation of legislative power to secure reasonable rates. Every presumption is against such renunciation. But where it is clear that the legislature intended to partially renounce such control by conferring upon the company the right to fix its rates within limits, the fixing of such limits, in the charter, is a specification of what will be a reasonable exercise of the authority conferred, and is to that extent a renunciation of the state's control."

Therefore, following the sound and safe conclusions reached in the foregoing authorities, we find the law to be that the police power of the state extends to the regulation of the banking business, and it cannot be surrendered by the legislature. And we hold that the appellant, Bank of Oxford, conducting a banking business, is affected with a public use; that the Act of 1914, reasonably regulating the conduct and affairs of banks, is within the police power of the state, and is valid; and that the rights and powers granted to the appellant bank by the legislature of 1872 are null and void, in so far as they conflict with the operation of the Banking Law of 1914, for the reason that the legislature had no authority to renounce the state's control over the conduct and business of the appellant bank, under its police power.

The Banking Act of 1914 was designed and enacted primarily for the purpose of regulating the affairs and duties of the banks toward the public, and to prevent injury and losses on account of negligence or fraud. The banking business is one in which the public may be easily injured and defrauded, and a law for the supervision and regulation of the business by the state is a wholesome piece of legislation. The Act of 1914 imposes reasonable regulations, and only such restraints as make for sound banking business and a protection of the public welfare.

In view of these conclusions, we are clearly of the opinion that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States November 10, 1919 (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 20) 250 U. S. 603, 63 L. ed. 1165, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22.

ANNOTATION.

Examination and supervision of banks by public officers as impairment of charter rights.

Research has disclosed but little authority directly on the question indicated by the title to this note. While there are a number of cases dealing with the question of the constitutionality of statutes relating to banks in which it was contended that charter rights were violated, the issues raised have frequently been of a somewhat general nature, and not peculiar to banking corporations. There are many cases on the question of the regulation of banks under the police power of the state. But in few of these, it seems, has the validity of governmental regulation been considered from the standpoint of its effect on charter rights. It is said in 3 R. C. L. p. 379, § 5, that "since banks are indispensable agencies through which the industry, trade, and commerce of all civilized countries and communities are carried on, the business which they transact, though for private profit, is of a pre-eminently public nature, and is therefore universally recognized as a proper subject of legislative regulation under the police power of the state."

It will be observed that the decision of the state court in the reported case BANK OF OXFORD v. LOVE, ante, 894) is based on the ground that, assuming that the statute in question providing for an examination and liquidation, under certain conditions, of banks by public officers, contravened charter rights, the statute was nevertheless constitutional as a valid exercise of the police power, which the state had no right to surrender. The decision, assuming that the statute properly came within the police power, appears to be in accord with the general rule stated in 8 Cyc. 865, that "a legislature cannot, by any contract, divest itself of its police power, the maxim, 'salus populi suprema lex' necessarily applying." The decision is affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in (United States Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 20) 250 U. S. 603, 63 L. ed. 1165, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22, on the ground that the statute, in authorizing examination and reports of banks by bank examiners, and assessing banks each year  $\frac{1}{40}$  of 1 per cent of their total assets for the maintenance of the state banking department, did not impair the contract contained in the provision of the charter that the business of the bank should be confided to and controlled by the stockholders under such rules of law and regulations as the bank might see fit to adopt, provided the same did not conflict with constitutional provisions. The court said that the charter contained nothing which purported to take away the commonly recognized power of the state to establish such reasonable and general regulations of banks as might be essential to public safety, and to enforce them through a board supported by moderate assessments upon those engaging in the business.

A statute providing for the examination of banks by bank commissioners, and authorizing them, in case they are of the opinion that a bank is insolvent or in such condition that the further transaction of business by it would be hazardous to the public or depositors, and that the bank has exceeded its powers or failed to comply with the rules and restrictions provided by law, to apply to a justice of the supreme court for an injunction to restrain it from the further transaction of business until a hearing is had, and providing that the justice shall forthwith issue such process and after a full hearing may dissolve or modify the injunction or make it perpetual, was held in Com. v. Farmers' & M. Bank (1839) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 542, 32 Am. Dec. 290, not unconstitutional as applied to an existing bank, on the theory that it impaired the obligation of the contract between the bank and the state by diminishing, through an injunction granted before a hearing, the time during which the charter empowered the corporation to act. The court considered such an injunction as analogous to the compulsory process issued in other cases for the purpose of taking the subject of controversy into the custody of the law during the inquiry, of preventing further loss, and securing the means of affording redress.

In Noble State Bank v. Haskell (1911) 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487, it was held that contract obligations under a bank's charter which is subject to alteration or repeal are not unconstitutionally impaired by the levy and collection, under a state statute, of an assessment based upon average daily deposits, for the purpose of creating a depositors' guaranty fund to secure the full repayment of deposits in case it or any other bank existing under the state laws becomes insolvent, unless the statute deprives the bank of liberty or property without due process of law. The view was taken in this case that the police power of the state extends to the banking business and even to its prohibition, except on such conditions as the state may prescribe. The case was approved and followed on similar facts in Shallenberger v. First State Bank (1911) 219 U. S. 114, 55 L. ed. 117, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 189, reversing (1909) 172 Fed. 999.

In Re Opinion of Justices (1852) 9 Cush. (Mass.) 604, it was held that the Provident Institution for Savings in Boston, the charter of which was in general terms, without a grant of particular powers or privileges as to the manner of conducting business, and did not prescribe a mode for the making of investments, but provided merely that all deposits received should be used and improved to the best advantage, was not exempt from the operation of statutes enacted after its incorporation, prescribing the mode of investment for savings banks.

And in Malone v. Provident Inst. for Sav. (1909) 201 Mass. 28, 86 N. E. 912, affirmed in (1911) 221 U. S. 660, 55 L. ed. 899, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1129, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 661, it was held that charter rights of savings banks were not unconstitutionally impaired by a statute providing that deposits which had remained inactive and unclaimed for thirty years, where the claimant is unknown or the depositor cannot be found, shall be paid to the treasurer and receiver general, to be held by him as trustee for the true owner or his legal representative.

The annotation does not cover such questions as that involved in Smathers v. Western Carolina Bank (1904) 135 N. C. 410, 47 S. E. 893, as to the power of a legislature to enact statutes relating to stockholders' liability, as applied to existing banks. See, in this connection, Cummings v. Spaunhorst (1877) 5 Mo. App. 21, holding that a statute making bank officers who assent to the reception of deposits or the creation of debts by the bank, with knowledge that it is insolvent or in failing circumstances, individually responsible for such deposits or debts, did not, as applied to the officers of a bank previously created by special charter, impair the obligation of the contract between the bank and the state. The court said: "This has nothing to do with the franchise of the corporation; but it would not matter if the corporation were incidentally affected. This corporation is subject, as are its officers, to the police power of the state, and the provisions of its charter cannot exempt it from regulations made in the exercise of that power. . . . Nor need the regulations be any more distinctly made in the exercise of the police power, than as indicating an intent to carry out a policy which the state deems essential for the protection of rights in property; and regulations so made do not, because they incidentally affect it, impair the obligation of a contract."

Without intending to cover the particular question involved, attention is called in this connection to a number of cases, some of which are cited in the reported case (BANK OF OXFORD v. LOVE, ante, 894), which show the broad application of the police power where banking institutions are involved, and sustain the validity, as a proper exercise of this power, of statutes imposing various regulations on banking corporations, although the opinions do not particularly consider the matter from the standpoint of impairment of contract obligations contained in the banks' charters.

The question has arisen in a number of cases as to the constitutionality of statutes authorizing a public officer to take charge of the assets of banks upon suspicion of insolvency. But these decisions also turn on other questions than charter rights. For instance, in State Sav. & C. Bank v. Anderson (1913) 165 Cal. 437, L.R.A. 1915E, 675, 132 Pac. 755, affirmed in (1914) 238 U. S. 611, 59 L. ed. 1488, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 792, it is held that a bank is not deprived of its property without due process of law by proceedings under a statute authorizing the bank superintendent to take possession of its assets whenever he shall have reason to conclude that it is in an unsound condition, or that it is unsafe or inexpedient for it to continue business. And the authorities generally appear to sustain the proposition that a statute authorizing a state officer to take charge of a bank which he concludes is in an unsafe condition, and providing also for a judicial review of such action, is within the police power of the state, and does not deprive any person of his property without due process of law, nor deny to any the equal protection of the laws. See, for example, on this proposition, the following cases: Montgomery Bank & T. Co. v. Walker (1913) 181 Ala. 368, 61 So. 951, approved in McDavid v. Bank of Bay Minette (1915) 193 Ala. 341, 69 So. 452; Blaker v. Hood (1894) 53 Kan. 499, 24 L.R.A. 854, 36 Pac. 1115; Jeffries v. Bacastow (1913) 90 Kan. 495, 135 Pac. 582; *Cartmell v. ## EX PARTE WILLIAM P. CARROLL, Appt.

Texas Court of Criminal Appeals — November 26, 1919.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 217 S. W. 382.)

Extradition — revocation of parole.

1. A convict whose parole is revoked because of breach of conditions is subject to extradition.

[See note on this question beginning on page 903.]

— effect of warrant — right to hold in restraint.

2. The issuance of a warrant in an extradition proceeding, the sufficiency of which is not questioned, establishes prima facie authority to hold the one against whom it is issued in restraint.

[See 11 R. C. L. 749.]

— proceeding against convict.

3. A convict is subject to extradition as well as an accused.

[See 11 R. C. L. 732.]

— burden of proof — violation of parole.

4. The issuance of a warrant by the governor in extradition proceedings charging violation of a parole implies that the parole was violated, and the authorities of the state where the arrest is made need not show that fact.

— effect of remaining in state until expiration of time fixed in sentence.

5. The fact that a paroled convict remains in the state until after the expiration of the time limited in his sentence does not prevent his extradition for violation of his parole if he then leaves the state before the term of imprisonment has been served.

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Criminal District Court for Harris County (Robinson, J.) refusing to release him, upon hearing of his application for a writ of habeas corpus, from custody under extradition proceedings. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Meek & Kahn for appellant.

Messrs. Alvin M. Owsley, Assistant Attorney General, and E. T. Branch, for the State:

Relator having been convicted under an indictment for forgery in Massachusetts, and not having served the time for which he was convicted, having left that state and being found in Texas, is a fugitive from justice.

S. 652, 29 L. ed. 253, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1148, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 218; 20 R. C. L. art. 60.

Morrow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal is from an order of the district court of Harris county refusing to release appellant upon hearing of his application for writ of habeas corpus. His restraint is under an executive warrant issued by the governor of this state upon the requisition of the governor of the state of Massachusetts. The issuance of the warrant, the sufficiency of which is not questioned, establishes prima facie the authority to hold the relator. Ex parte Nix, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 212 S. W. 507, and authorities therein referred to; Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 291, and annotations in Rose's Notes on U. S. Reports, Rev. ed. vol. 13, p. 170.

The documents filed with the secretary of state and upon which the requisition was granted, which were put in evidence by relator, show that on January 13, 1913, the relator was convicted of forgery and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for not more than four years; that on the 25th day of July, 1915, he was permitted to go at large upon parole; that subsequently, in January, 1916, the board of paroles of the state of Massachusetts at a meeting passed a resolution revoking the permit to be at liberty, and issued a warrant for the rearrest of the relator and his confinement for the unexpired time of his sentence, which warrant recites that the board of paroles was acting in pursuance of a certain provision of the laws of Massachusetts, and that the revocation was ordered for the reason that William P. Carroll "had left his home and employment without permission, has not reported as directed, and his whereabouts are unknown to this office."

The fact that relator had been convicted under the indictment charging him with forgery does not prevent his extradition. On the subject, from Moore on Extradition, vol. 2, § 530, we take the following: "The term 'charged' applies to persons convicted as well as to persons merely sought for the purpose of trial. Where a person is convicted of crime, his sentence of imprisonment can be satisfied only by actual service of his term in prison. Hence, if he escapes, the term ceases to run, and he may, after its nominal expiration, be brought back to serve the unexpired balance of his term."
—proceeding —against —convict.

See Drinkall v. Spiegel, 68 Conn. 441, 36 L.R.A. 486, 36 Atl. 830; Ex parte Bergman, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 15, 130 S. W. 174.

If it would have been permissible to show that the revocation of his parole was unauthorized or not within the scope of the power of the board of paroles (and this is questionable), such proof was not furnished; and the relator, having broken the conditions upon which —revocation of

—parole.
his freedom from confinement depended, was in no better position than if he had escaped by force. Drinkall v. Spiegel, supra; Ex parte Williams, 10 Okla. Crim. Rep. 346, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 668, 136 Pac. 598.

It was not incumbent upon the respondent to prove the terms of the parole. The issuance of the writ by the governor implies that it was rightfully done, and the implication obtains until overcome by proof. The affidavits found among the papers filed by the governor, in which the terms of the parole were set out and its breach declared, in no sense vitiated the warrant. The other documents accompanying the requisition were sufficient to support it. Moreover, the law does not prescribe the manner in which the executive of the fugitive state may determine the question of fact as to whether the accused is a fugitive from justice, and we are aware of no legal obstacle to the consideration by the governor of the affidavits mentioned. Illinois ex rel. McNichols v. Pease, 207 U. S. 100, 52 L. ed. 121, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58; U. S. Stats. Anno. vol. 2, p. 891, Comp. Stats. § 10,118; Ex parte McDaniel, 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 184, 173 S. W. 1018, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 335.

The relator's evidence does not negative the fact that he had breached the parole. It does not purport to give the terms of the parole. Its extent is to say that the relator remained in Massachusetts continuously from the time of his conviction until January, 1918, and that when he was paroled all that was said to him by the warden of the penitentiary was: "Here are $3. You are discharged." The trial judge regarded this evidence as insufficient to discharge the burden which was upon relator to show that he was not a fugitive from justice. It was undisputed that he had been charged by indictment and convicted to serve in the penitentiary; that he was released on parole; that the legally constituted authorities had declared his parole breached and revoked; that he had not served the remainder of his term in the penitentiary; had left the state in which he was convicted, and come to Texas. The fact that he remained in Massachusetts until after the expiration of the time when his term of imprisonment would have ended is without weight on the issues involved. His attitude was tantamount to that of an escaped convict from the time his permit to remain at large was breached and revoked. The lapse of time intervening before he left the state did not satisfy the penalty against him. R. C. L. vol. 20, p. 570, § 59; also vol. 8, p. 231, §§ 229 and 232.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed, and the relator remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Petition for rehearing denied January 14, 1920.

ANNOTATION.

Extradition of one who violates parole.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (EX PARTE CARROLL, ante, 901) that one released from prison on parole, who violates his parole, which is revoked, and who goes to another state, may be extradited as a fugitive from justice, on the theory that he is a convict whose term has not expired, and that this is so although he remained in the demanding state until after the original period of his sentence had expired.

It is the law that one released from prison on parole who violates the terms of his parole may be extradited from another state as a fugitive from justice on the ground that he is a convict whose time has not expired, and who therefore is "charged with crime" under the United States Constitution. Hughes v. Pfanz (1905) 71 C. C. A. 234, 138 Fed. 980; Drinkall v. Spiegel (1896) 68 Conn. 441, 36 L.R.A. 486, 36 Atl. 830; Re Gertz (1913) 21 Haw. 526; Re Weinhouse (1919) — Mo. App. —, 216 S. W. 548 (obiter); Ex parte Wil-

Hams (1913) 10 Okla. Crim. Rep. 344, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 668, 136 Pac. 597, EX PARTE CARROLL (reported herewith).

So it has been held in Canada that a person from the United States who had broken his parole in that country, where he had been convicted of an extraditable offense and subsequently paroled, could be extradited, although the breaking of parole is not an extraditable offense, as he was a fugitive from justice under the Canada statute. The court said: "Possibly, a defendant who has broken his parole would not be considered a fugitive from justice within the popular meaning of the phrase, but the phrase is given an enlarged meaning by § 2 (d) of our Extradition Act, which states that 'fugitive' means a person being in Canada who is accused or convicted of an extradition crime committed within the jurisdiction of a foreign state." United States v. Allison (1918) — N. S. —, 42 D. L. R. 595.

In Drinkall v. Spiegel (1896) 68 Conn. 441, 36 L.R.A. 486, 36 Atl. 830, supra, it was held that a prisoner in a reformatory who violates a parole permitting him to go into one state where employment had been obtained for him, by going into another, is a fugitive from justice within U. S. Const. art. 4, § 2, providing for extradition of any person charged with a crime who shall flee from justice and be found in another state.

In Reg. v. Holloway Prison (1898) 14 Times L. R. (Eng.) 252, where one who had been convicted in Holland, and had leave to serve his sentence later, went to England, and some time afterwards the Dutch government demanded his extradition, it was held that he must be given up as he had not been "discharged" within the terms of the extradition treaty with Holland.

But where the probation laws of a state provided for release on probation, and a statute further provided that if on a first conviction of simple larceny the person convicted makes full restitution he shall not be imprisoned in the state's prison, one indicted for larceny pleaded guilty, made what was accepted as restitution, and was allowed to go without bond on the understanding that he was released from all prosecution, it was held that he could not thereafter be extradited for the larceny. Re Weinhouse (1919) — Mo. App. —, 216 S. W. 548.

It may be noted that it was held in Carpenter v. Lord (1918) 88 Or. 128, L.R.A.1918D, 674, 171 Pac. 577, that a convict on parole is within the operation of a statute forbidding his rendition to another state when he is in custody under judgment of conviction for crime. B. B. B.

CITY OF PENDLETON et al., Appts.

(— Or. —, 186 Pac. 572.)

Trust — for library — right to accumulate income.

1. Under a bequest of a fund, the annual income of which is to be expended for the benefit of a library, the income must be applied annually and not hoarded.

[See note on this question beginning on page 915.]

Will — construction — extrinsic evidence.

2. Where the language employed in a will is clear and of well-defined force and meaning, extrinsic evidence of what was intended in fact cannot be adduced to explain, qualify, enlarge, or contradict this language.

Association — right to hold property.

3. An unincorporated association may take and hold property given it by will, at least to the extent that it cannot be taken back by testator's representatives.

[See 5 R. C. L. 312.]

Trust — unincorporated association as trustee.

4. An unincorporated association cannot become a trustee of a library for the use of someone else.

[See 5 R. C. L. 316.]

Will — devise for library — interpretation.

5. A devise of a fund in trust for a library of the commercial association of a particular city cannot, where such association owns a library, be shown to be intended for the benefit of a public library, especially where the will provides that, if for any cause the commmercial association ceases to exist for a specified time, the fund shall revert to testator's estate.

Trust — for library — power of trustees.

6. A bequest to trustees of a fund the income of which is to be used for the benefit of a library of an association does not require the trustees to turn the income over to the association, but they may make the expenditures themselves.

Costs — liability of trustee.

7. A trustee of a fund established for benefit of a library will not be mulcted with costs for awaiting the judgment of the court in case a dispute arises as to the proper beneficiary, where he acts in good faith, although he does not comply strictly with the terms of the trust.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Umatilla County (Anderson, J.) in favor of plaintiffs, in a suit for the construction of the will of Samuel P. Sturgis, deceased. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by McBride, Ch. J.:

This is a suit primarily to have interpreted a certain clause in the will of Samuel P. Sturgis, deceased, and arises out of the following circumstances:

On the 7th day of January, 1896, Samuel P. Sturgis executed in due form a will containing the following provision: "I give and bequeath to James A. Fee and Edward D. Boyd, as trustees, the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars in trust, to be invested by them, and the annual income derived therefrom to be used by them, for the benefit of the library of the Commercial Association of Pendleton, of the city of Pendleton, Oregon; but if from any cause said Commercial Association of Pendleton ceases to exist for a period of three years, then all of said $5,000 shall revert to my estate and become the property of my wife, Lina H. Sturgis, in fee simple."

A month later Samuel P. Sturgis died from the sickness from which he was suffering when the will was executed.

We have now practically two claimants to the benefits of this bequest, namely, the city of Pendleton, for the purpose of its municipal library, and the Commercial Association of Pendleton, for the benefit of its library.

The Commercial Association of Pendleton claims that it is the beneficiary under the terms of the will, while the defendants claim that the Pendleton Public Library, at present a municipal institution of the city, is the beneficiary. The surviving trustee under the will, taking the latter view and desiring to expend the income of the trust funds for the purposes of the library of the Pendleton Public Library, the Commercial Association, by its library committee, duly authorized so to do, commenced this suit to have the will interpreted, making the city of Pendleton, the members of its library board, and Judge James A. Fee, the surviving trustee, parties defendant, all of whom answered, setting up the claim of the Pendleton Public Library to the bequest.

Messrs. James A. Fee, R. W. Montague and Stephen A. Lowell for appellants.

Messrs. Raley & Raley for respondents.

McBride, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is not brought to correct an alleged mistake in the will of Samuel P. Sturgis. The plaintiffs claim that the testator made a perfect will, making it the beneficiary, and allege that defendants claim a different interpretation, whereupon it asks that the true purpose and intent of the document be judicially declared. The defendants, on the other hand, claim, that the Pendleton Public Library was the beneficiary, and that there are ambiguous terms used, and ask a decree construing the will to mean that the trust fund therein provided was bequeathed to and belongs to the Pendleton Public Library, and that the same is the property of the people of the city of Pendleton.

If there is any ambiguity in the terms of the will, it is latent and not apparent on the face of the instrument. Anyone ignorant of local conditions and controversies would, upon reading the clause in dispute, at once conclude: (1) That there was at the time an organization known as the Commercial Association of Pendleton; (2) that it had a library; (3) that its habitat was the city of Pendleton, Oregon, and (4) that it was the intent of the testator that the trustees named in the will should expend the income of the fund so bequeathed for the benefit of that library. If the first three of these conditions actually existed, the fourth necessarily follows as a matter of law.

Before considering the testimony in the instant case, it may be well to advert to some firmly established principles laid down for the construction of wills, because there is no branch of judicature which, beyond this, so much requires adherence to those rules which the wisdom and experience of generations have developed.

The remark of Tindal, Ch. J., in Doe ex dem. Clarke v. Ludlam, 7 Bing. 279, 131 Eng. Reprint, 108, is one of universal application: "I agree in the necessity of adhering to general rules in the construction of wills and other instruments. It is expedient that such rules should be held sacred, because they withdraw the decision from the discretion of the individual judge, and prevent him from pursuing his own views of each particular case. And there is less inconvenience in the hardship which may sometimes be occasioned by a strict adherence to the rule, than in the confusion which must follow on departing from it."

One of these rules is this: Where the language employed in the will is clear and of well-defined force and meaning, extrinsic evidence of what was intended in fact cannot be adduced to explain, qualify, enlarge, or contradict this language, but the will must stand as written.

Will—construction—extrinsic evidence.

Applied to the concrete case, if there was in fact in Pendleton, Oregon, a library of the Commercial Association of Pendleton, extrinsic evidence cannot be introduced to show that the testator intended that the "Pendleton public library" was to be the beneficiary. The pivotal question in this case, therefore, is: Was there in existence at the time this will was executed an organization known as the "Commercial Association of Pendleton," and did it own a library? If these two facts existed, they settle the contention in favor of the plaintiff. If either is wanting, then it will be proper, rather than the bequest should be allowed to fail because of an equivocal description, for the court to seek in extrinsic evidence an interpretation of the testator's intention.

Thus, in Re Taylor, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 255, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 171, 56 L. T. N. S. 648, 35 Week. Rep. 186, where the testator devised property to "my cousin Harriet Cloak," when in fact a cousin of that name had been married and no longer bore it, and there was another Harriet Cloak, the wife of a cousin of the testator, parol evidence was admitted to show that the latter was the person for whom the legacy was intended.

And in Gilmer v. Stone, 120 U. S. 586, 80 L. ed. 784, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, where a residuary estate was given for equal division "between the board of foreign and the board of home missions," and it appeared that there were such boards in various religious denominations, evidence was admitted to show that the testator, being a zealous Presbyterian, must have intended the bequest for boards of that denomination.

On the other hand, if there is in existence a party of the name designated in the will, extrinsic evidence will not be admitted to show that another party with a different, though closely similar name, was intended.

Thus in Tucker v. Seaman's Aid Soc. 7 Met. 188, where one Nathaniel Tucker gave a legacy to the "Seaman's Aid Society in the city of Boston," another society, the "Seaman's Friend Society" in the same city, claimed the legacy and offered evidence to prove that the testator had no knowledge of the existence of the society named in his will; that he knew of the existence of said other society, was deeply interested in its objects, and had contributed to its funds, and had frequently expressed a determination to give it a legacy; that he directed the scrivener who wrote his will to insert the legacy, as made to said society; that the scrivener, not knowing the existence of said society, told the testator that the name of the society was the "Seaman's Aid Society," and the testator thereupon submitted to having that name inserted. The supreme court held the evidence to be inadmissible, and sustained the bequest as it appeared in the will. The opinion of Chief Justice Shaw completely covers every phase of the proposition here discussed, and it is unnecessary to cite other precedents.

It being conceded in this case that when the will was executed there was in existence in the city of Pendleton an organization known as the "Commercial Association of Pendleton," we pass to the vital proposition in this case: Did the association at the time have a library? We must, from the terms of the bequest, assume that the testator thought there was a library connected with the association, because the bequest is conditioned upon the continued existence of the commercial association. The testator says: "If, from any cause, said Commercial Association of Pendleton ceases to exist for a period of three years, then all said $5,000 shall revert to my estate."

This is not the language of a man making a gift to the general public. If the commercial association was not the ultimate party to be benefited, why make the bequest contingent upon the continued existence of that association. If a testator makes a bequest in favor of A, it would not be unnatural that he should provide that, in case of A's death, the money should revert to the testator's estate; but, if the bequest should be made to A, with the provision that it should revert in case of the death of a stranger, the sanity of the testator would be questioned.

Here the bequest is a Siamese twin to the commercial association. It dies with it, or at least as soon thereafter as the lapse of time has demonstrated that the association is dead beyond revival. To the writer this is strong evidence that the ultimate benefit of the bequest was intended for the commercial association, and that, while no doubt the testator expected and hoped the people of Pendleton would share in that benefit, he expected that benefit to flow through the channel of the commercial association and not otherwise. He thought, and nobody was perhaps better acquainted with the facts, that the commercial association, and not the public generally, owned a library and that, through the trustees he had appointed, that library would be kept up primarily for the benefit of the association,

We take it to be fairly well-settled law, at least by the better authorities, an unincorporated association may take and hold personal property, at least to the extent that the person giving or selling such property to it cannot retake it or otherwise dispose of it; so that if one gave a book, or money to buy a book, to the commercial association for its library, that person could not retake the book or reclaim the money on the pretext that the donee was incapable of holding it. Such associations would be treated in equity as quasi partnerships, each member of which would be entitled to an interest in the property donated or purchased. 5 R. C. L. 312; Whipple v. Parker, 29 Mich. 369; Curtiss v. Hoyt, 19 Conn. 154, 48 Am. Dec. 149; Snowden v. Crown Cork & Seal Co. 114 Md. 650, 80 Atl. 510, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 679, and note to case, as reported in the last-mentioned work. There is not a solitary reason for the holding of some courts that gifts to nonincorporated associations are invalid, except blind adherence to outworn precedents.

The capacity of the Commercial Association of Pendleton to found a library being established, we now advert to the testimony relative to the actual existence of such a library at the time the will in question was executed. The first mention of a library in connection with the work of the commercial association is found in its minutes of March 24, 1894, where it is recorded that the chair announced, among other matters, as one of the objects of the meeting, that it was proposed to take up the matter of establishing a library, and the further recital that "all matters were placed under discussion and fully considered."

The discussion may have had some effect, for, on April 3, 1894, we have a statement in the address of Colonel Boyd, president of the association, to this effect: "In addition to all this a cabinet has just been placed in the middle room of the association for the reception of books and periodicals, which it is desired to present, thus making a beginning for a library which is much needed in the city. Mr. C. S. Jackson has lately donated to the association complete files of the Congressional Record for several years past and up to date, together with many valuable books, for which he has placed this association under obligation."

So far as the testimony shows, this donation of Mr. Jackson was the first thing beyond mere talk that occurred in the direction of establishing a public library in Pendleton, and, it seems fair to assume that the books given by him were intended to become the property of the association. That he hoped and expected from this little beginning, and the efforts of himself and others, a library would develop which would, under the management of the association, be valuable to the association and of use to the general public, is apparent from his testimony, and, while he perhaps did not give a thought as to where the legal title to the books presented by him would technically vest, it is plain he regarded the association as the donee.

On the same day that Colonel Boyd's address was delivered, to wit, April 3, 1894, an honorary membership in the association was instituted with a membership fee of $20, and the fees so obtained were set aside as a sinking fund for the purpose of establishing a library, and a committee consisting of James A. Fee, Fred R. Mellis, and Jesse Farling was created, under the designation of a "library committee."

On March 27, 1894, Judge Fee, in an interview with a reporter of the East Oregonian newspaper, urged the formation of a public library in Pendleton, under such auspices as should secure permanency, and suggested tentatively that the commercial association should take the matter up and devote a certain sum to the support of it, as well as to the augmentation of the volumes upon the shelf. He suggested that no member then active in the organization would be any the less attracted to the rooms of the association, and that no doubt many others would become members because they would then know that the fees and dues would go to the support of an institution which was broad, and reaching out to build up the community in a literary as well as social and business way. If the association could not do this, then he suggested that some other nonsectarian institution, which all citizens might join with in building up a creditable library, should undertake the work. The suggestion was approved editorially as one which should be acted upon, to the end that Pendleton might have a public library.

On March 31, 1894, a social organization known as the "Columbian Congress" held a banquet, at which the sum of $75 over expenses was realized, and at the motion of Judge Fee this sum "was turned over to the commercial association to be used as a nucleus in starting a reference library for the use of the city."

On May 1, 1894, the library committee reported to the association that they had secured subscriptions in the sum of $600, and asked the association for instructions in regard to the plan of carrying on the library work. They were given a vote of thanks and directed to formulate a plan of carrying on the library, and directed to report at the next meeting.

On May 4 or 5, 1894, a library festival was held in aid of the library. In the papers of that date the event is spoken of as having been brought about by the labors of the "commercial association library festival committee, Messrs. Fee, Mellis, and Farling." The testator, Mr. Sturgis, presided, and about $1,700 in money and books were subscribed. The newspaper article congratulated the city on the fact that Pendleton had a library promised, and the means of securing it assured.

At a meeting of the association on June 12, 1894, it was moved and carried that the secretary be instructed to prepare an amendment to the by-laws, making the library committee a permanent one, but there is no record that this was ever done.

On November 6 and December 4, 1894, the committee reported progress, and on January 9, 1895, reported the purchase of books and the preparation of shelves. On February 12th, it was moved and carried that the library be insured for $1,000. On March 5, 1895, it was moved and carried that members of the association pay no fees or dues to the library, in consideration of the association bearing its expenses, and at the same meeting it was ordered that the library committee be empowered to adopt such rules and regulations as are necessary to conduct the affairs, and that Colonel Boyd be added to the library committee, and that the library be opened on the succeeding Monday.

On March 9, 1895, rules and regulations governing the control of the library were promulgated by the library committee. These rules, as a whole, are similar to those governing all public libraries, but contain provisions which, standing by themselves, would seem to rather favor defendant's contention that the commercial association was merely the host, so to speak, of another association, called the library association. The rules are entitled "Library Rules and Regulations under Which Books May Be Read and Taken from the Rooms."

The provisions above alluded to are as follows:

"(1) The commercial association agrees to furnish a room for library purposes and a room in which members of the library association may read during the afternoon of each day from 2 o'clock until 5, except Sundays, legal holidays, and days upon which special meetings of the commercial association may be called, and to furnish lights, fuel, and a supply of current literature for library purposes, and to pay a librarian for caring for said library, and as a consideration for the benefits of the library the members of the commercial association, both active and honorary, who are in good standing, shall be entitled to membership in the library association, without the payment of any additional dues or fees.

"(2) Any person of good moral character and deportment shall be entitled to membership in said library association, upon the payment of $2.50 initiation fee, and 25 cents monthly dues, payable monthly in advance."

Judge Fee, who took a prominent and perhaps the leading part in procuring subscriptions of money and books for the library, states that, according to his recollection of the circumstance, a contract was drawn at the same time the rules were prepared, whereby the commercial association agreed to furnish rooms, light, janitor, and librarian services, and for that concession the members of the commercial association became members of the library association, without payment of other dues or fees, while other persons not members of the commercial association were required to pay a membership fee of $2.50 and 25 cents a month as dues. His view and recollection of the whole matter may be summed up in the following excerpt from his testimony on cross-examination:

Q. Then in the minutes of March 6, 1900, . . . appears, "President Fee appointed the following committee, library committee, Guernsey, Boyd, Foster, Lowell, and Smith," would you say that was true?

A. Yes sir; I think possibly that is true, but that is nearly six years after the library was founded. Colonel, however, being president of the association, didn't change my views as to the Sturgis books and didn't change my views that the commercial association did not own that library, but that it belonged to the people of the city of Pendleton, who had paid for it.

Q. After that was your view of it, or if that was your view of it, why was it being conducted, and under what arrangement was it being conducted, by the commercial association?

A. I have explained that Colonel, we got together, and as the result of a conversation between myself and Mr. Sturgis the movement was started, and after it had gotten along further, and it became a thing to be dealt with on the behalf of the public, the committee was appointed to solicit funds, and it was then understood that the library belonged to the people, and was to be a public library, and that at Mr. Sturgis's suggestion, as I recall it, the contract I mentioned and the rules and regulations were prepared. Now as I intended to say, if I have not said it, Mr. Sturgis was a man of wide business experience, and, lest there should be any misunderstanding with the people who had originated the founding of the library, he suggested that a contract be prepared, which I think was prepared, and which was signed. As to the legal matters, whether myself and the other members on the library committee could enter into a contract with the association at that time on behalf of the public, is a question for the court. I thought we had that power and that is the capacity in which we were undertaking to act.

Q. It is your contention there was a contract in existence between someone representing the commercial association, and someone representing the general public, whereby this arrangement was entered into?

A. That is my recollection of having dictated that contract to Mr. Wheeler, and that it was signed at the same time that the rules and regulations were dictated to go with that contract, and I think that I stated that in my remarks at the hall in 1908, at the time the library was transferred to the city hall, that the commercial association agreed to furnish rooms, light, janitor, and librarian service, and for that the members of the commercial association became members of the library association, and other persons were required to pay $2.50 under the rules to become members of that association, and to pay a monthly due of 25 cents for access to the library, and that that is the way in which I have always believed that the two independent organizations existed, one representing the library association and being the library association, which was the committee in the commercial association, and the commercial association itself being the other party.

No contract of the character mentioned is found in the papers of the commercial association, and Judge Fee kept no copy; neither is there anything in the records or files of the commercial association indicating its assent to or authorization of such a contract. Judge Fee's recollection as to who signed the contract is indistinct, and, while his word imports absolute verity so far as his recollection of a transaction occurring a third of a century ago extends, it is the experience of all of us that vague memories are unsafe as evidence, and in this case it is more than possible that the witness has confounded the preparation of the rules with the preparation of a contract, especially as the resolution under which the library committee acted authorized them to prepare rules and regulations for the conduct of the library, but made no reference to any contract with anybody.

It is difficult to see how the committee of the commercial association could contract with itself, or how any officer of the association could contract for the association without express authority, and evidence of the making of such a contract would, at best, be only valuable as indicating the idea and intent of persons active in the matter, as to who were the real owners of the library. The same may be said as to the testimony of the many witnesses introduced, as to their understanding of the situation when donations for the benefit of the library were made.

A large number of witnesses who were in a position to know, including officers and charter members of the commercial association, and the widow of the testator, testified that their understanding had always been that the library was the property of that association. A less number, though with equal means of knowledge, testified that their understanding was that the library was the property of the people of the city of Pendleton, and that they would not have made the donations had they understood that the commercial association was to be the owner of the books. The fact is apparent that little thought was in fact given by subscribers to the fund and donors to the library as to what body was to be the technical legal owner of the library. The commercial association was composed of the leading citizens of Pendleton and had the confidence of the public. When it assumed to take the lead in organizing a library, everybody was satisfied that it would act fairly by the public, and that, irrespective of the question of technical ownership, the public, under reasonable rules and restrictions, would have access to it.

No one seems to have expected that the library would be a free library in the sense that everyone could have the use of it without money and without price, and, although from the beginning the rules promulgated required the payment of a membership fee and dues, we hear of no objection to this requirement.

There were no officers or agents of the library selected by the public, or any association of the public, except the commercial association. It appointed the library committee and the librarian, and reports were made to it. It insured the books. If it was not the owner of the legal title, it is difficult to say where that title was lodged. It could not reside in the committee appointed by the association, nor in the librarian who took care of the books, nor the janitor who swept the rooms and dusted the shelves. It was not in the persons who contributed the money to purchase books, or in those who donated books; each one of these, when he made his contribution and parted with possession of the thing contributed, was divested of the legal title thereof. He could not sue in his own name to replevin the books contributed, even from an outright thief. The commercial association might sue, and so far as we can see it was the only party who could have sued. In its capacity as

seem to have crystallized into law, it could not be the trustee of a library for the use of someone else.

From all the testimony the salient points of which we have attempted to indicate, we conclude that the commercial association had a library at the time the will was made. It was certainly the owner of the books contributed by Mr. Jackson before any other contribution was made, and we are of the opinion that the weight of the evidence indicates that the bulk of the contributions thereafter made were intended to be to the commercial association, with the expectation that it would apply them to the upbuilding of a library to which the citizens of Pendleton would be permitted to have access. The name which the library received is not material. It was sometimes called the "Commercial Association Library," but most frequently the "Pendleton Public Library," a name which was probably suggested by the testator who was active in promoting it. The library was public, and was located in Pendleton, and the name was appropriate, but giving that name did not dedicate it to the free use of everybody, nor transfer the title to the municipality.

We conclude that, at the time the testator made the will in question, there was in the city of Pendleton a library owned by the "Commercial Association of Pendleton," and that it was the intention of the testator to make that library the beneficiary. As before remarked, there is no ambiguity on the face of the will. It can only be rendered ambiguous by assuming that the Commercial Association of Pendleton had no library, and that therefore the

for library—
interpretation.

testator must have intended the bequest to apply to some other institution. If the association had a library, whether of 20 or 20,000 volumes, the bequest must stand as written, and, as we have attempted to show, it did have a library, and it is evident from the concluding clause of the bequest, which made it contingent upon the continued existence of the commercial association, that this library was in the mind of the testator when he made his will, and that there was probably in his bequest the double motive: first, to make the association, of which he was an enthusiastic member, attractive and interesting; and second, to benefit the community which was enjoying the benefit of the library already installed, and perhaps further to insure the permanency of both the commercial association and the library.

But it is useless to speculate upon the motives which may have influenced the testator in making the bequest. There was in existence in Pendleton a library of the character described in the will, and, that fact being ascertained, it follows as a necessary consequence that we cannot divert the bequest to some other institution. It is very probable that were the testator making his will to-day, or if it had been made in 1908, the present library of the city of Pendleton would have been the beneficiary; but we are dealing with the situation as it appeared to the testator in 1896, and, viewing that situation in the light of the evidence, we are of the opinion that the library of the commercial association, the library then in its rooms and to which we find it had the legal title, was the one for the benefit of which the trustees were required to expend the income from the bequest.

Concerning the propriety of removing the library from the rooms of the association to the city hall, and thereafter to the Carnegie library building, we express no opinion. Perhaps these removals were the best that could have been done under the circumstances, and it is possible that if the last removal had been made openly, much of the exasperation and ill feeling which have crept into this contest would have been avoided.

We find that the Commercial Association of Pendleton is entitled to the custody of the books removed from the commercial association's rooms to the city hall, and to all books since purchased with funds from the Sturgis bequest.

The fact that the association consented to the removal of the books to the city hall does not, from the evidence, appear to have been a gift or a relinquishment of title, but a mere expedient to place the library in a place where it would be more accessible to the public, and the fact that since that time the commercial association has not interfered in its management must be referred to the conditions under which the books were obtained in the first place. There is no convincing, if indeed any, evidence of an intent on the part of the association to make a gift of these books to the city of Pendleton, and under the circumstances there was no necessity for it to interfere in the management of the library in its new location.

We do not interpret the will as requiring the trustees to pay over the income of the fund to the commercial association, or its library committee, to be by them expended. The bequest is to the trustees, and we think it was the intention of the testator that they were the persons who should use the funds for the benefit of the library. <sup>Trust—for library—power of trustees.</sup>

If, in their judgment, it seemed proper to turn the income over to the association, or its library committee, to be in that way expended for the purchase of books or supplies, they had a right to do so; but we are of the opinion that, if such a course should seem best, the trustees themselves had a right to select the books or supplies, and to purchase them. The trustees were both gentlemen of more than ordinary literary acquirements, and therefore well qualified to appraise the needs of the library and to select accordingly; they were close friends of the testator, and the fact that he selected them as trustees, instead of making his bequest to the association itself, or providing that the funds should be managed by trustees selected by the institution, or by its library committee, indicates that he intended that they were the persons in whose judgment the testator intended to place discretion as to the expenditure of the money derived from the income of the fund created. The language of the bequest supports the construction above indicated: "The annual income derived therefrom to be used by them (the trustees) for the benefit of the library," etc.

Another contention arises over the construction of the words "annual income." It is contended by plaintiffs that these words indicate that it was the intention of the testator to require the trustees to expend the income annually for the benefit of the library. We are of the opinion that it was the intention of the testator that the income should be applied annually, and not hoarded. There is a dearth of authority on this subject, and we have not been able to find any case in which the phrase has been construed in connection with a case arising out of a bequest, although the <sup>—right to accumulate income.</sup> tendency of the courts seems generally against permitting accumulations unless specifically provided for in the will. The question is difficult of solution upon precedent.

A case similar in principle is that of Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 44, in which it is provided that the maker of a promissory note would pay the sum stated in ten years, "with annual interest," and on behalf of the maker it was contended that the word "annual," used as an adjective, was intended to modify interest, and meant only the computation of interest by annual rests, and that the whole amount, principal and interest, did not become due until ten years from date; but it was held that the contract would not be so construed, but that "annual interest," in legal contemplation, was the same as if written "interest annually," and that the interest on the note was due and payable each year.

The same principle seems applicable here, and was evidently so understood by the trustees, who honored the requisition of the library committee for books until a misunderstanding arose to which we shall presently advert. We conclude that it was the duty of the trustees to apply the income of the fund annually to the needs of the library, so long as it should be maintained by the association, or until it had ceased to exist. This conclusion suggests difficulties and is one upon which courts might differ; but, taking into consideration the general rule as to the vesting of bequests, and the particular circumstances existing at the time the will was executed, we conclude that the construction we have adopted expresses the intent of the testator. This leads to an affirmation of the decree, except so far as it allows the cestui que trust to select the books.

Another question arises as to costs, and as to that we think it would be unfair to compel the defendant, who has, from his point of view, only striven to protect the fund, to pay the expense of defending this action. His management has been painstaking and admirable. In his hands, in addition to a considerable expenditure for books, the fund has trebled in amount. He has given his time and credit to increasing and protecting it. His motives have been misconstrued and his integrity assailed for doing what he no doubt thought his dead friend desired him to do in relation to the matter, and the association no doubt will now be able to secure a better library than if it had received the annual dribblets from an uncertain income.

In addition to this, he had learned from Colonel Boyd, his cotrustee, that about $400 of the library fund of the association had been transferred to the general fund, and this impression, whether well or ill founded, seems to have created some distrust as to the proper application of the bequest by the library authorities. It is due to the association to say that there is no direct evidence that the conversion ever took place, or that, if it did, it was in any way a breach of trust, or of its professions to those who had aided in building up the library.

There is one transaction which, unexplained, probably impressed the mind of Colonel Boyd, and afterwards, when he reported it to Judge Fee, also raised a suspicion in his mind that the funds dedicated to the use of the library were being expended for other purposes, and that circumstance appears on the record as follows: In April, 1894, when the question of establishing a library was being discussed, and before any large contributions for that purpose had been made, a by-law was passed, providing for the admission of honorary members of the association at a fee of $20, which fees were to constitute a sinking fund for the purpose of establishing a library. This was in April, 1894. In November, 1896, several months after this bequest became effective by the death of the testator in February of that year, it was resolved by the association that the sinking fund be abandoned, and the money turned into the general fund. This, on the face of it, would appear to have been a breach of faith with the testator, and other contributors, and while the transaction may have been perfectly fair and proper, it has not been explained in the testimony, and is possibly the transaction discussed by Colonel Boyd and reported to Judge Fee, and which caused him to withhold further contributions to the fund from the proceeds of the testator's bounty.

In any event, we are satisfied that he did not act in bad faith, but upon his honest convictions and with the intent to carry out the desires of the testator, as he understood them. This has not been so plain a case that this court has been able to decide it at first blush, or indeed except with the most careful deliberation, and the trustee—with one part of the community demanding the application of the fund to one library, <sup>Costs—liability of trustee.</sup> and another group of citizens to another—ought not to be mulcted in costs because he waited for the advice of the court as to how he should apply it.

The decree will therefore be modified in so far as it provides for the recovery of costs from the defendant, and, with the exception of the two modifications above referred to, the decree will be affirmed and the defendant directed to apply the accumulated surplus of the fund to the purposes of the library of the Commercial Association of Pendleton.

ANNOTATION.

Right of trustee to accumulate income under will or other instrument directing him to use it.

Cases in which some discretion as to accumulating or paying over the income was vested in the trustee by the terms of the trust are beyond the scope of the annotation.

An extended search discloses no decision in addition to that in the reported case (HARTMAN v. PENDLETON, ante, 904), upon the question whether a direction to testamentary trustees that the "annual income" of the trust moneys "be used by them" for the benefit of a certain charity requires an annual application of the income, or permits an accumulation thereof. The decision, however, to the effect that the income must be applied annually, and not accumulated, based as it was upon the theory that such was the intention of the testator, is seemingly in accord with the general principles usually applied in similar cases, namely, that the rights, powers, and duties of trustees, being questions of construction, are derived from and measured or ascertained by the instrument creating the trust, that the rules governing the execution of trusts generally apply to testamentary trusts, and that, in construing wills, the intention of the testator usually controls.

There are a few analogous decisions which throw some light upon the question under annotation, and in the main support the conclusion reached in the HARTMAN CASE.

Thus, in Worcester City Miss. Soc. v. Memorial Church (1904) 186 Mass. 531, 72 N. E. 71, where it was directed that the income of a trust estate should be collected semiannually, and applied to defray the expenses of maintaining a minister and public worship in a certain house of worship, it was held that the net income should be expended from year to year for the purposes mentioned, and that no part thereof could be held back.

So, in McLane v. Cropper (1895) 5 App. D. C. 276, on subsequent appeal in (1895) 6 App. D. C. 122, it was held under a will giving a fund to trustees with directions "to take the rents, issues, and profits thereof and apply the same to the use of my said daughter Annie (paying the same over to her) for life," that such daughter was entitled to all of such income, and could compel the trustees to distribute the same, although the will also required the trustees on her death to pay over "the principal thereof, with all the accumulations." The court maintained that the latter provision did not show an intention to the contrary, and that if any special significance was to be attached to the word "accumulations," it must have reference to probable increases in corporate stock, of which the estate largely consisted.

And in Gasquet v. Pollock (1896) 1 App. Div. 512, 37 N. Y. Supp. 357, affirmed on opinion below in (1899) 158 N. Y. 734, 53 N. E. 1125, where it was directed that the income of property bequeathed in trust be applied to the "use" of testator's daughter, it was held that the words "applied to the use of" are equivalent to the words "paid over to," and that the daughter was entitled to have the whole income paid over as it accrued, so that the trustees could not accumulate any portion thereof above what was necessary for her support. But in connection with the Gasquet Case see Re McCormick (1898) 22 Misc. 309, 49 N. Y. Supp. 1119, affirmed in (1899) 40 App. Div. 73, 57 N. Y. Supp. 548, which was affirmed without opinion in (1900) 163 N. Y. 551, 57 N. E. 1116, wherein it was held that, under a testamentary trust directing that the income be applied to the "support, maintenance, and education" of the infant beneficiary until of age, the trustees were allowed the exercise of a discretion as to the amount necessary for such purpose and an accumulation of the balance. In reaching this conclusion the surrogate (22 Misc. 309) overruled the contention that the trustees were empowered to exercise no discretion, but must apply, each and every year, the total amount of the income from the trust estate to the support, maintenance, and education of the beneficiary.

And see Re Steele (1899) 124 Cal. 533, 57 Pac. 564, wherein the court seems to have been of the opinion that there can be no accumulations where, under the terms of the will, the entire income is to be distributed annually.

In Haynes v. Carr (1900) 70 N. H. 463, 49 Atl. 638, where property was devised to trustees "to expend in their discretion, in such sums, at such times, and in such manner as may seem to them advisable, the income" thereof for certain charitable and educational purposes, it was held that the trustees were vested with a discretion only as to the details of the execution of the trust, and not with a discretion to expend or not to expend, the court saying that the direction in the will was not "to expend the income or to add it to the principal, in their discretion." ## CITY OF CHICAGO et al.

WILLIAM L. O'CONNELL et al., Appts.

(278 Ill. 591, 116 N. E. 210.)

Public Service Commission — power over street railways — right of city.

1. The legislature is not deprived of the power to confer upon a public service commission control of the schedules, routing, and style of cars of a street railway in a municipality by a constitutional provision that no law shall be passed granting the right to construct and operate any street railroad within any city without consent of the local authorities.

— exception from authority — utilities owned by municipality.

2. That a municipality has an option to purchase the street railways within its limits and a voice in their management does not bring it within an exception in a definition of public utilities over which the Public Service Commission has authority of such utilities as are or may hereafter be owned by a municipality.

Constitutional law — taking property — regulating street railways.

3. Neither a street railway company nor a city having an interest in its net earnings is deprived of its property without due process of law, nor is the property of either taken for public use without just compensation, by an order of the Public Service Commission made under statutory authority regulating the schedules, routing, and type of cars to be used on the road.

[See note in 5 A.L.R. 43.]

Public utility — power of legislature to control.

4. The legislature has power to exercise reasonable regulation and control over public utilities.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1178.]

Constitutional law — police power — regulation of public utilities.

5. The regulation of public utilities is a phase of the exercise of the police power of the state.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1178.]

Legislature — power to delegate exercise of police power.

6. The legislature may confer the right to exercise the police power upon agencies created by it, and may recall power delegated to one agency and confer it upon another.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1178.]

— discretion as to exercise of police power.

7. In the exercise of its police power the legislature may interfere with the management of public utilities whenever public interests demand, and it has a large discretion to determine not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests.

[See 4 R. C. L. 561, 562; 6 R. C. L. 224, 228.]

Constitutional law — exercise of police power — validity.

8. A rightful exercise of the police power in the supervision of public utilities does not deprive them of their property without due process of law, or deny compensation, nor does it impair the obligation of any contract.

[See 4 R. C. L. 562; 6 R. C. L. 225.]

— extent of police power — control of operation of public utilities.

9. The police power does not extend to the control of the person who shall operate a public utility or to what disposition shall be made of its profits.

— impairing obligation of contract.

10. An order of a public service commission changing, under statutory authority, schedules, routing, and types of cars of a street railway company from those fixed by the contract ordinance under which the railway is operating, does not unconstitutionally impair the obligation of the contract ordinance, since, such matters relating to the comfort and welfare of the public, the municipality had no authority to make binding contracts regarding them.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1178.]

Injunction — to test reasonableness of order.

11. The reasonableness of an order of a public service commission cannot be tested in a proceeding to enjoin its enforcement, where the statute provides for testing it by appeal.

Constitutional law — due process — order without hearing — rehearing.

12. One not made a party to a proceeding before a public service commission which results in an order affecting his interests is not deprived of his property without due process of law if the statute provides for a rehearing upon his application.

The Public Utilities Law does not attempt to confer arbitrary powers on the Commission, since all its orders must be lawful and reasonable, and are subject to review in the courts.

State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Beck v. Toledo, St. L. & W. R. Co. 267 Ill. 93, P.U.R.1915B, 879, 107 N. E. 774.

The act does not conflict with the constitutional provisions forbidding the passage of local or special laws in certain cases.

People v. Kaelber, 253 Ill. 552, 37 N. E. 1068; Chicago & S. Traction Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 246 Ill. 146, 92 N. E. 583; Danville v. Danville Water Co. 180 Ill. 235, 54 N. E. 224.

The act does not purport to vest in the Commission power and control over the streets, and though it does empower the Commission to regulate the service of street railways within the city, it is not in contravention of § 4 of art. 11, or § 34 of art. 4 of the Constitution.

State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Mitchell v. Chicago & W. T. R. Co. 275 Ill. 555, P.U.R.1917B, 1046, 114 N. E. 325, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 50; Chicago & S. Traction Co. v. Illinois C. R. The order does not impair the obligation of any contract protected by the Constitution nor deprive the city of its property without due process of law, nor take the private property of the city or companies without compensation, nor deny to the city or the companies the equal protection of the laws in any unconstitutional way.

Mr. Everett Jennings also for appellants.

Messrs. Samuel A. Ettelson, Chester E. Cleveland, Ralph G. Crandall, W. W. Gurley, Horace Kent Tenney, Harry P. Weber and George W. Miller, for appellees:

Equity will enjoin the acts of public officers or bodies assuming powers which do not belong to them, or acting under an unconstitutional or otherwise invalid statute, which infringe upon or violate either public or private rights or which will result in injury not susceptible of reparation in the ordinary course of proceedings at law; or when the aid of equity is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

Equity will restrain the enforcement of an order or of a penalty for the violation of an order made by a state commission alleged to be an arbitrary, unreasonable, or unconstitutional invasion of private property rights.

The city had the right to file a bill for the enforcement or protection of its rights under the traction ordinances.

Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago, 96 Ill. 620; Barre v. Barre & M. Power & Traction Co. 88 Vt. 304, 92 Atl. 237.

An order of the Commission beyond its powers and jurisdiction or in violation of the Constitution is not controlled by appeal provisions, and application for relief may be made to the same courts and in the same manner as are available to vindicate personal and property rights generally.

State ex rel. Public Service Commission v. Skagit River Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 85 Wash. 29, P.U.R.1915C, 902, 147 Pac. 885; Bessette v. Goddard, 87 Vt. 77, 88 Atl. 1; Railroad Commission v. Saline River R. Co. 119 Ark. 239, P.U.R. 1915F, 191, 177 S. W. 896.

If the Public Utilities Act be construed as excluding resort to any of the circuit courts of the state of competent jurisdiction to protect the property of a public utility corporation against an order of the Commission beyond its powers or in violation of the constitutional guaranties, then such provision is void.

Cooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 18, 1915, the city of Chicago filed a bill for injunction in the circuit court of Cook county, seeking to restrain the State Public Utilities Commission and the members thereof from enforcing a certain order made by the Commission on September 29, 1915, relating to the equipment and operation of street cars in the city of Chicago. The order complained of required the Chicago Surface Lines, the Chicago City Railway Company, and the Chicago Railways Company to operate street cars upon their lines at intervals to be determined by methods prescribed in the order, according to the relative seating capacity of cars passing a given point during certain periods fixed by the order and the aggregate number of passengers carried on said cars during such periods; to provide "turn-back" or "loop-back" service in the territory outside the loop district sufficient to comply with the service standard prescribed by the order; to prepare and submit to the Commission, within sixty days, a comprehensive plan for the rerouting of cars in order to secure maximum track capacity; to proceed at once to acquire the equipment necessary to carry out the provisions of the order; to install within sixty days and use such trailers as may be necessary during the rush-hour period to comply with the service standard prescribed by the order; to make application within thirty days to the proper municipal authorities of the city of Chicago for necessary permits and authority, and to the property owners for the necessary frontage consents authorizing and empowering the railway companies to make such track changes as may be required to enable them to comply with the provisions of the order; to display on all cars separate route and destination signs on the front and a route sign on the side; and to hereafter submit to the Commission the plans for all new passenger cars and for the remodeling of all old passenger cars for approval of the width of passageways, height of steps, type and location of seats, platform arrangements, and such other details as affect the adequacy of service as the Commission may, from time to time, require. The Commission retained jurisdiction of the cause for the purpose of making any necessary modification of the order and such supplemental orders as it should deem proper and just.

The bill alleges that the city of Chicago was organized as a municipal corporation more than seventy years ago under a special charter, and was subsequently, on May 3, 1875, organized under the City and Village Act of 1872 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1915-16, chap. 24); that the Chicago City Railway Company was organized as a corporation under certain special acts of the legislature, and the Chicago Railways Company, the Calumet & South Chicago Railway Company, and the Southern Street Railway Company were organized under the general Incorporation Act of this state. The bill then alleges that the city of Chicago, on February 11, 1907, passed two certain ordinances, which were approved by the voters of the city at an election held April 2, 1907, and which are commonly referred to as the "settlement ordinances,"—one authorizing the Chicago City Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a system of street railways in the city of Chicago, and the other authorizing the Chicago Railways Company to construct, maintain, and operate a system of street railways in the city of Chicago, upon the terms and conditions therein prescribed,—and alleges that the settlement ordinances were thereafter accepted by the Chicago City Railway Company and the Chicago Railways Company, and that the latter company thereafter, on February 25, 1908, acquired title to the street railway properties theretofore known as the Chicago Union Traction System; that thereafter, on March 30, 1908, the city council passed an ordinance authorizing the Calumet & South Chicago Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a system of street railways in the city of Chicago upon substantially the same terms and conditions as were contained in the settlement ordinances, and that this ordinance was accepted by the Calumet & South Chicago Railway Company on June 1, 1908; that thereafter, on March 15, 1909, the city council passed an ordinance authorizing the Southern Street Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a system of street railways in the city of Chicago upon substantially the same terms as contained in the settlement ordinances, which ordinance was accepted by the Southern Street Railway Company. The bill alleges that the settlement ordinances and the two subsequent ordinances above mentioned together embodied a plan for the comprehensive rehabilitation, construction, reconstruction, equipment, re-equipment, and extension of the street railway systems in the city, for the establishment of through routes, the exchange of transfers, the purchase of the surface lines by the city at some future time, the rates of fare to be charged, and the division of the net earnings of the railways between the city and the companies, and for the creation of a permanent expert supervising board. The bill further alleges that on November 13, 1913, the city council passed an ordinance authorizing and requiring unified operation of the surface street railways in the city of Chicago, which ordinance is commonly referred to as the "unification ordinance;" that the four companies above mentioned accepted this ordinance, and in compliance therewith entered into an operating agreement in the form prescribed by the unification ordinance.

The bill alleges that the ordinances above mentioned constitute valid and binding contracts between the city of Chicago and the respective street railway companies, and charges that the order of the Commission, and the Public Utilities Act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1915-16, chap. 111a), in so far as it purports to confer upon the State Public Utilities Commission power and authority to make such order, impair the obligation of such contracts and deprive the city of property without due process of law, take the city's private property without compensation, deny the city the equal protection of the laws, and deprive the city of the jurisdiction and control conferred upon it by the Constitution over the street railways within the city, contrary to and in violation of §§ 2, 5, 13, 14, and 19 of article 2, and § 4, art. 11, of the state Constitution, and of § 10 of article 1 and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and that the order is ultra vires because the Public Utilities Act, properly construed, does not deprive the city of the power, authority, and control vested in it by the Constitution and statutes of the state over its streets and over the construction and operation of street railways therein.

The Chicago City Railway Company, the Chicago Railways Company, the Calumet & South Chicago Railway Company, and the Southern Street Railway Company, defendants, after answering the bill, filed a cross bill, seeking the same relief as that sought by the original bill. The cross bill is substantially the same as the original bill, except it sets out in detail a history of the development of the present system of street railways in the city of Chicago. The additional matters contained in the cross bill, as well as the provisions of the settlement ordinances and the unification ordinance, are fully set forth in the opinions filed in Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Chicago, 199 Ill. 484, 59 L.R.A. 631, 65 N. E. 451; Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. 236 Ill. 349, 86 N. E. 266; Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. 258 Ill. 523, 101 N. E. 949; People ex rel. Dwight v. Chicago R. Co. 270 Ill. 87, 110 N. E. 386, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 821; People v. Chicago, 270 Ill. 188, 110 N. E. 366; and People ex rel. Dwight v. Chicago R. Co. 270 Ill. 278, 110 N. E. 394. It is therefore unnecessary to set them out in detail in this opinion. It will here suffice to briefly mention certain provisions of the settlement ordinances and the unification ordinance.

The settlement ordinances granted to the street railway companies permission and authority to construct, reconstruct, maintain, and operate a system of street railways upon and along certain streets in the city of Chicago for a period of twenty years, subject to the terms, provisions, and conditions of the ordinances, and in consideration thereof the street railway companies surrendered and released all rights in the streets of the city other than those granted by the settlement ordinances. The settlement ordinances created a board of supervising engineers, to consist of three members,—one to be appointed by the city and one by the street railway companies, and the third member was designated by name in the ordinances,—and provided that all construction, reconstruction, equipment, re-equipment, extensions, and additions should be done, made, and acquired under the direction and supervision of the board of supervising engineers, and that all contracts and payments therefor should be made only upon the written approval of said board; that the cars to be thereafter acquired by the railway companies should be of the number, character, and equipment specified in the settlement ordinances, and of a finish, style, and type approved by the board of supervising engineers. The settlement ordinances prohibited the use of trailers, fixed the rates of fare to be charged, provided for the issuance and exchange of transfers, and prohibited the issuance of passes to persons other than employees of the companies, and certain officers of the city. The companies were required to co-operate in establishing specified through routes and such additional through routes as should be required by the board of supervising engineers. They were also required to sprinkle, clean, pave, and keep in repair the portions of the streets occupied by them, to provide reserve funds for maintenance and repair and for renewals and depreciation, and to expend therefrom and for such purposes a specified minimum amount each year, subject to the direction and control of the board of supervising engineers. The board of supervising engineers was given power to regulate the salaries and compensation of directors, officers, agents, and attorneys of the companies. The city reserved the right to purchase, on the 1st day of February or August of any year, upon six months' previous notice, the entire street railway system of the companies at a price to be fixed in accordance with the method prescribed by the ordinance, viz.: The purchasable value of the property as of a certain date was fixed by the ordinance, and, in determining the price to be paid by the city when it exercised its option of purchase, there was to be added to the purchasable value so fixed the value of all property, equipment, and additions subsequently supplied, purchased, or acquired, and all future capital expenditures as approved and certified by the board of supervising engineers. The city also reserved the right, within the terms of the grant, to designate another corporation as its licensee to purchase the property upon the same terms, with the proviso that a bonus of 20 per cent should be paid unless the new company should enter into a contract to turn over to the city, directly or in reduced fares, all net proceeds over and above 5 per cent upon its investment and interest thereon at a rate not exceeding an additional 5 per cent. It was further provided that the net receipts of the companies, as defined in the ordinances, should be divided between the city and the companies in the proportions of 55 per cent to the city and 45 per cent to the companies, provided, however, that the companies should have the right to charge and receive the fares fixed by the settlement ordinances. In each of the settlement ordinances the city reserved the right to make all reasonable regulations for the safety, welfare, and accommodation of the public.

By the unification ordinance the street railway companies were required to furnish unified traction service within the limits of the city of Chicago, the same and with like effect as though all the surface lines within the city were owned and operated by one company. This ordinance provided for the through routing of cars, the elimination of switchbacks in the downtown district, the substitution of loops or transfer stations for switchbacks in the outlying districts when so ordered by the city council and approved by the board of supervising engineers, and required the companies to furnish to the board of supervising engineers operating schedules and other details relating to the operation of their lines. It also required the companies to purchase a sufficient number of additional cars to utilize at all hours the additional track facilities in the downtown district, made available by the through routing of cars prescribed by the ordinance. The contract which the street railway companies were by the unification ordinance required to enter into is, in substance, set forth in People v. Chicago, 270 Ill. 188, 110 N. E. 366, supra.

The State Public Utilities Commission and the members thereof demurred to the original bill and cross bill. The demurrers were overruled, and the Commission and the members thereof having elected to stand by their demurrers, a decree was entered perpetually enjoining the enforcement of the order. From that decree the State Public Utilities Commission and the members thereof have prosecuted this appeal.

In support of the decree of the circuit court appellees contend: First, that the Commission was without power to make the order complained of, because the Constitution of this state, by § 4, art. 11, grants to cities the exclusive power to regulate and control the operation of street railways upon their streets, and because § 10 of the Public Utilities Act excludes from the operation of the act public utilities in which a city is interested, as the city of Chicago is interested in the street railways of the city of Chicago; second, that the order of the Commission deprives the railway companies and the city of property without due process of law, in violation of § 2, art. 2, of the state Constitution, and in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution; third, that the order of the Commission takes and damages the private property of the railway companies and of the city for public use without just compensation, in violation of § 13 of art. 2 of the state Constitution; and, fourth, that the order of the Commission, and the Public Utilities Act in so far as it empowers the Commission to make the order, impair the obligation of contracts existing between the city and the railway companies and bondholders of the railway companies, in violation of § 14, art. 2, of the state Constitution.

Section 4 of article 11 of our Constitution provides that "no law shall be passed by the general assembly granting the right to construct and operate a street railroad within any city, town or incorporated village, without requiring the consent of the local authorities having the control of the street or highway proposed to be occupied by such street railroad."

And in Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. 258 Ill. 523, 101 N. E. 949, and again in People v. Chicago, supra, we said that "the Constitution commits to the city the control of the operation of street railways in its streets."

It is upon this section of the Constitution and this statement contained in the two cases above cited that appellees rely in support of their contention that the Commission was without power to make the order complained of, because the Constitution grants to the city exclusive power to regulate and control the operation of street railways upon the streets of the city. In the recent case of State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Mitchell v. Chicago & W. T. R. Co. 275 Ill. 555, P.U.R.1917B, 1046, 114 N. E. 325, 330, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 50, in considering the same contention here made, we said with reference to the constitutional provision above quoted (p. 570): "That provision is simply a limitation of the general powers of the legislature, and in one particular only. It provides, in substance, that the legislature may not grant the right to construct and operate a street railroad within a municipality without requiring the consent of the local authorities having control of the streets or highways proposed to be occupied. That section of the Constitution does not, by implication or otherwise, attempt to divest the state of its paramount authority and control of streets and highways" (citing Chicago & S. Traction Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 246 Ill. 146, 92 N. E. 583).

The statement made in Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. and in People v. Chicago, supra, that the Constitution commits to the city the control of the operation of street railways in its streets, merely means that the Constitution has conferred upon the city power to determine whether street railways shall be operated upon the streets of the city, and, if so, upon what streets. To this extent, and no further, the Constitution has committed to the city the control of the operation of street railways in its streets.

Public Service

Section 10 of the Public Utilities Act provides that the term "public utility," when used in the act, "means and includes every corporation, company, association, joint-stock company or association, firm, partnership or individual, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by any court whatsoever (except, however, such public utilities as are or may hereafter be owned or operated by any municipality) that now or hereafter: (a) May own, control, operate or manage, within the state, directly or indirectly for public use, any plant, equipment or property used or to be used for or in connection with the transportation of persons; . . . or that (b) may own or control any franchise, license, permit or right to engage in any such business."

Appellees contend that the street railways in the city of Chicago are within the exception contained in the above statutory definition of a public utility, and are therefore not within the provisions of the act nor under the jurisdiction or control of the Commission, because the city has secured a vested right for the purchase of these railways and a vested right to participate in the management and operation thereof.

In our opinion the language of § 10, relied upon by the appellees, can only be reasonably construed to mean that public utilities owned or operated by municipalities when the act became effective should not be subject to the provisions of the act, and that thereafter, as soon as a municipality should become the owner or take over the operation of a public utility, such public utility should thereby be withdrawn from the operation of the act. Although the city of Chicago has, by contract, obtained an option to purchase the street railways in the city at a price agreed upon, and has been given a voice in the management of the affairs of the street railway companies, it has not yet become the owner of the street railway properties, nor can it be said that the operation of the street railway system has been turned over to the city. The street railways of the city of Chicago are clearly within the provisions of the act which give the Commission power to make the order involved in this case.

The principal ground relied upon by appellees in support of the decree of the circuit court is that the order of the Commission, and the Public Utilities Act in so far as it purports to confer upon the Commission power to make the order, deprive the railway companies and the city of property without due process of law, take and damage the private property of the railway companies and the city for public use without just compensation, and impair the obligation of contracts theretofore made between the city and the railway companies, in violation of the provisions of the state and Federal Constitutions. It is our judgment that the order is not subject to the constitutional objections urged against it. The power of the legislature to exercise reasonable regulation and control over public utilities was upheld by this court, shortly after the adoption of our present

Constitutional law—taking property—regulating street railways.

Constitution, in Munn v. People, 69 Ill. 80, where it was held that such regulation was not in violation of either § 2, art. 2, § 13, art. 2, or § 22, art. 4, of the state Constitution, nor in contravention of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution. That case was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judgment was affirmed. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 126, 24 L. ed. 84. The Supreme Court of the United States in its opinion said: "When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use; but, so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control."

This decision has become one of the landmarks of American law, and has been frequently cited, followed, and approved in applying the rule that when private property is devoted to a public use it is subject to public regulation. Chicago Dock & Canal Co. v. Garrity, 115 Ill. 155, 3 N. E. 448; State Public Utilities Commission v. Monarch Refrigerating Co. 267 Ill. 528, P.U.R.1915D, 119, 108 N. E. 716, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 528.

The regulation of public utilities is one phase of the exercise of the police power of the state. The police power may be exercised by the legislature directly, or it may be exercised indirectly by conferring the power upon agencies created by the legislature. The power is an attribute of sovereignty, and is primarily vested in the legislature, which has the right to recall it at any time from the agency to which it has been delegated, and after being recalled to retain it or confer it upon some other agency of government. In the exercise of this power the state may interfere whenever the public interests demand such interference, and in this particular a large discretion is necessarily vested in the legislature to determine, not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests. Durand v. Dyson, 271 Ill. 382, 111 N. E. 143, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 84. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Willenborg, 117 Ill. 203, 57 Am. Rep. 862, 7 N. E. 698, it was said: "All property devoted to public uses takes on a nature or qualification quasi public, and is for that reason held to be subject to legislative control in a greater or less degree, and to which the mere private property of the citizen is not subjected. Rights purely and exclusively private, in no wise affecting others, and in no way affecting public morals, are not regarded as being within the control of the police power; nor can mere private property be taken for public uses without making to the owner just compensation; yet the law has always required the citizen to so use his property as not unnecessarily to injure another, and, to compel the observance of that rule, even private property may be brought within legislative control to that extent. But where property, whether belonging to a natural person or to a corporation, becomes 'affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only.' Where a party devotes his property to a public use, the community at large acquire such a qualified interest as will subject it to legislative control for the common welfare. Accordingly, the property of railroads, and other similar corporations transacting business for and with the public, has been subjected to burdens not imposed on the owners of mere private property, used purely and exclusively for private interests. The distinctions in this regard have been uniformly observed."

Again, in Burdick v. People, 149 Ill. 600, 24 L.R.A. 152, 41 Am. St. Rep. 329, 36 N. E. 948, we said: "The business of a common carrier is a public employment. The franchises of railroads, acting under charters or acts of incorporation, are of a public nature so far as the safety, convenience, and comfort of passengers are concerned. Reasonable regulations, affecting the conduct of such public employments, are fit subjects for legislative action. The lawmaking power may provide means for remedying such evils as, in its opinion, may exist in the management of these public agencies of transportation, and in doing so it may sometimes impose restrictions, which are deemed to be necessary, upon the use and enjoyment of property."

A more concrete statement of the law as applied to the facts in this case is contained in Chicago v. Chicago City R. Co. 272 Ill. 245, 111 N. E. 983, as follows: "The police power may be exercised in a variety of ways in the regulation of streetcar traffic for the public safety or convenience, such as providing against the overcrowding of cars, compelling proper seating facilities, specifying the side of the street at which stops shall be made, and any other matter which shall promote the public safety, comfort, or convenience."

A rightful exercise of the police power is not a violation of any of the provisions of the Constitution upon which appellees rely (Munn v. People, and Burdick v. People, supra; People v. Weiner, 271 Ill. 74, L.R.A. 1916C, 775, 110 N. E. 870, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 1065; Durand v. Dyson, supra; Greene v. L. Fish Furniture Co. 272 Ill. 148, 111 N. E. 725); and statutes affecting the owners of public utilities by lessening their privileges, regulating their charges, and increasing their burdens, within reasonable bounds, are uniformly held valid (Chicago v. Cicero, 210 Ill. 290, 71 N. E. 356).

Appellees contend, however, that the settlement ordinances and the unification ordinance, having been accepted and acted upon by the railway companies, constitute binding contracts between the city and the railway companies, and that their obligation cannot be impaired by any act of the legislature or by any order of the State Public Utilities Commission. Appellees' contention is undoubtedly sound so far as the contracts relate to matters which do not affect the public safety, welfare, comfort, or convenience. Thus the grant of the right to the railway companies to construct and operate street railways in the city, the agreement to divide the net receipts between the railway companies and the city, and the option given to the city to purchase the railway properties at a certain price are all matters which do not affect the public safety, welfare, comfort, or convenience, because it is immaterial to the public what person or corporation operates the street railways, or what disposition is made of the profits, and over those matters neither the state nor the State

—extent of police power—control of operation of public utilities.

Public Utilities Commission has any control by virtue of the police power. Nor has the Commission by the order here complained of assumed to exercise control over any such matters. The order requires only such things to be done by the railway companies as will, in the judgment of the Commission, improve the service furnished the public, and in so far as the order conflicts with the ordinances concerning such matters, the order of the Commission supercedes and sets aside the provisions of the ordinances, but does not, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition, impair the obligation of any contract, because the city had —impairing

no power to contract away any of the police powers delegated to it by the legislature. In Chicago v. Chicago Union Traction Co. 199 Ill. 259, 59 L.R.A. 666, 65 N. E. 243, we said: "The city, as the representative of the state, is invested with power to enact and enforce all ordinances necessary to prescribe regulations and restrictions needful for the preservation of the health, safety, and comfort of the people. The exercise of this power affects the public and becomes a duty, the performance whereof is obligatory on the city. The city could not, by the terms and conditions of the former ordinance, deprive itself of this power or relieve itself of this duty, nor could the defendant in error company, by any contractual terms of an ordinance, exempt itself from the proper and reasonable control of the municipal authorities in matters affecting the health, safety, or comfort of the people. 'No contract can be made which assumes to surrender or alienate a strictly governmental power which is required to continue in existence for the welfare of the public. This is especially true of the police power, for it is incapable of alienation. It cannot be doubted that a company which secures the right to use the streets of a municipal corporation takes it subject to the police power resident in the state as an inalienable attribute of sovereignty.' Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 801."

Again in Otis Elevator Co. v. Chicago, 263 Ill. 419, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 192, 105 N. E. 338, referring to the police power, we said: "But the power is incapable of alienation, and no valid contract can be made which assumes to surrender or alienate such a power which is required to continue in existence for the welfare of the public."

The principle is again recognized in Chicago v. Chicago City R. Co. supra, in the following language: "It is true that a municipality cannot contract away the right to exercise the police power to secure and protect the morals, safety, health, order, comfort, or welfare of the public, nor limit or restrain by any agreement the full exercise of that power."

We have accordingly held that a city cannot contract away its right, under the police power, to fix reasonable rates to be charged by a public utility furnishing water to the city and its inhabitants. Rogers Park Water Co. v. Fergus, 178 Ill. 571, 53 N. E. 363; Danville v. Danville Water Co. 178 Ill. 299, 69 Am. St. Rep. 304, 53 N. E. 118; Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport, 186 Ill. 179, 57 N. E. 862.

If the city of Chicago, in entering into the contracts with the railway companies, has seen fit to make its option to purchase the street railway system, or its right to a certain portion of the net receipts derived from the operation of the system, or any other rights reserved to it by the ordinances, dependent upon the non-exercise of the police power by the state, it cannot be heard to complain that by the exercise of the police power by the state, through the State Public Utilities Commission, it will lose its right to those benefits reserved to it by the ordinances.

Appellees contend that the order is unreasonable, and that the Commission should therefore be enjoined from enforcing it. The question of the reasonableness of the order cannot be determined in this proceeding. The Public Utilities Act provides for a hearing before the Commission upon that question, at which the person or corporation complained of is entitled to be heard and to introduce evidence, and if such person or corporation desires to contest the reasonableness of the order made by the Commission after such hearing, he or it is by the act allowed an appeal to the circuit court of Sangamon county and a further appeal to this court. The statutory method of reviewing the reasonableness of orders of the Commission is exclusive.

Injunction—to
of order.

It is also urged that, as the Calumet & South Chicago Railway Company, the Southern Street Railway Company, and the city of Chicago were not made formal parties to the proceedings before the Commission, those proceedings, so far as they are concerned, were ex parte, and the order amounts to a taking of their property without due process of law. Even though the two railway companies last mentioned and the city were not made parties to the proceedings before the Commission, they were not thereby deprived of a hearing before the Commission. Section 67 of the Public Utilities Act provides:

Constitutional law—due process—order without hearing
—rehearing.

"After any rule, regulation, order or decision has been made by the Commission, any party to the action or proceeding, or any stockholder or bondholder or other party pecuniarily interested in the public utility affected, may apply for a rehearing in respect to any matters determined in said action or proceeding and specified in the application for rehearing, and the Commission may grant and hold such rehearing on said matters, if in its judgment sufficient reason therefor be made to appear."

The provision for a review of the decision of the Commission upon the rehearing is the same as the provision for review of the original order. None of the appellees have therefore been deprived of a hearing upon the reasonableness of the order made by the Commission, and have not been deprived of property without due process of law.

The matters set up in the bill and cross bill were not sufficient to warrant the court in granting an injunction restraining the enforcement of the order of the Commission, and the demurrers to the bill and cross bill should therefore have been sustained.

The decree is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to sustain the demurrers to the bill and cross bill.

NOTE.

The power of Public Service Commission with respect to the regulation of street railways is the subject of annotation in 5 A.L.R. 86, which cites the reported case (CHICAGO v. O'CONNELL, ante, 916). The reporting of that case in this series was deferred because of the pendency of an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, which has now been dismissed ((U. S. Adv. Ops. 1919-20, p. 63) 250 U. S. 651, 63 L. ed. 1189, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 53), from a decision of the Illinois supreme court upon a subsequent appeal in (1917) 281 Ill. 257, 117 N. E. 1010, in the reported case.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff made application to the Industrial Commission of this state under the Employers' Liability Act of this state to recover compensation for the death of her husband, which occurred as hereinafter stated. The Industrial Commission denied her application for the reasons hereinafter appearing, and, pursuant to the provisions of the act aforesaid, she commenced this proceeding in the district court of Weber county.

In her complaint, after stating the necessary jurisdictional facts and matters of inducement, she alleged:

"That on the 26th day of January, 1918, at Ogden, Utah, one George C. Chandler was engaged in the employ of A. M. Miller. That the said A. M. Miller was on said date conducting and operating a meat and grocery store in said city, doing business under the name and style of 'Washington Market.' That on said date, and at the said time and place, the said A. M. Miller, in the conduct and operation of said business, employed more than four persons, to wit, about forty persons, and had elected to become and was subject to the provisions of chapter 100 of the Laws of Utah of 1917, an act passed by the legislature of the state of Utah on March 8, 1917, creating the Industrial Commission of Utah, and among other things establishing rates of compensation for personal injuries or death sustained by employees in the course of employment, and providing methods of insuring the payment of such compensation.

"That the duties of the said George C. Chandler required him to deliver meat and groceries in the city of Ogden, Utah, with and without an automobile, and that he was, on the date and at the time and place herein mentioned, furnished an automobile by his employer, the said A. M. Miller, for use in making such deliveries, which were made with an automobile, and that the hours of his said employment were from 7 o'clock A. M. until 6 o'clock P. M.; that is to say, he was required to commence his said employment at 7 o'clock A. M. and continue until 6 o'clock P. M. That the certain automobile which was furnished to him by his said employer for use in making such deliveries which were made with an automobile was kept in a garage at the rear of the residence of his said employer, A. M. Miller, at 764 Twenty-fifth street, Ogden, Utah. That the place of business of the said A. M. Miller was situated at 2472 Washington avenue, Ogden, Utah. That the place of residence of said George C. Chandler was in the rear of Twenty-seventh street, between Jefferson and Adams avenues, Ogden, Utah. That in the course of his said employment the duties of the said George C. Chandler required him to go from his family residence each morning to said garage, and get said automobile, and drive it down to the said place of business of the said A. M. Miller, and use it throughout the day in making such deliveries and to return it to the said garage at night after his day's work was finished. That when he was unable to make all the deliveries of the day he would bring with him to his home such undelivered packages and make deliveries of them the following morning on his way to his work.

"That on the morning of January 26, 1918, at about 7:20 o'clock, while the said George C. Chandler was on his way from his place of residence to the said garage to get said automobile and drive it down to his employer's said place of business to begin making the daily deliveries which he was required to make as hereinbefore alleged, and while making delivery of meat for his employer which was undelivered the evening before, and without fault on his part, he was attacked and bitten in his hand by a dog known as the Jefferson avenue dog. That after having his wound dressed he proceeded to his daily work, and worked steadily on each and every work day thereafter until on or about the 22d day of March, 1918, when he became violently sick, and was removed to a hospital, where he died on or about the 25th day of March, 1918, a violent death from hydrophobia, caused by the dog bite received on January 26, 1918, as hereinbefore alleged."

She also made the necessary allegations respecting the age, condition of health, etc., of the deceased and the dependency of herself and her three minor children, ranging in age from twelve to three years, etc., and prayed for judgment according to the provisions of the act.

The defendants demurred to the complaint upon several grounds. The only ground that is material here, however, is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The district court sustained the demurrer upon that ground, and judgment dismissing the action was duly entered, from which the plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff's counsel insist that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. Our statute (Utah Comp. Laws 1917, § 3122) allows compensation to every employee coming within the provisions of the act who is "injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment." In view of the facts alleged in the complaint, all of which are admitted by the demurrer, the district court held that, while the deceased was injured by an accident occurring in the course of, yet he was not injured by an accident arising out of, his employment. Whether a particular injury is occasioned by an accident arising out of the employment may present a more or less perplexing question, and with respect to which reasonable men may well differ. Indeed, that is the difficult question in this case; and we fully appreciate the fact that the decisions of the courts are not unanimous upon that question. As is well said by Mr. Van Doren in referring to the Workmen's Compensation Act in his Workmen's Compensation, p. 43: "The extremely liberal construction of the courts [of the act] has, as we have seen, made possible a recovery of compensation by the injured employee in a large proportion of the cases."

We are also reminded that our statute (Utah Comp. Laws 1917, § 5839) requires that the statutes of this state are to be "liberally construed with a view to effect the objects of the statutes and to promote justice."

Upon the question that the Employers' Liability Act should be liberally construed and so as to effectuate its purposes, all courts agree. Statutes—construction—Workmen's Compensation Act.

Re Ayers, — Ind. App. —, 118 N. E. 386. That doctrine applies especially to the phrase "out of and in the course of the employment."

Notwithstanding the fact that the act must be given a liberal construction, the writer, nevertheless, entertains serious doubt whether, in view of the conceded facts in this case, the injury arose "out of the employment." In view, however, that my Workmen's compensation

associates are of the opinion that a liberal construction requires us to hold that the injury in this case arose out of, as well as in the course of, the employment, I cheerfully yield to their judgment. I do so with less reluctance or hesitation for the reason that such a holding is manifestly in furtherance of justice, and tends to effectuate the beneficent purposes of the Compensation Act. In this connection it must be remembered that the compensation provided for in the act is in no sense to be considered as damages for the injured employee or to his dependents in case death supervenes. The right to compensation arises out of the relation existing between employer and employee, and that the injury arises out of and in the course of the employment. Under such an act the costs and expenses of conducting the business or enterprise, including compensation for injuries to employees or other casualties, must be taxed to the business. The theory of the Compensation Act is that the whole cost and expense of conducting the business as aforesaid is added to the cost of the articles that are produced and sold, and hence, in the long run, such costs and expenses are borne by the public; that is, by the consumers of the articles produced. The purpose of such an act, therefore, is to protect the employee and those dependent upon him, and in the case of his serious injury or death to provide adequate means for the support of those dependent upon him. In view, therefore, that in case of total disability or death of the employee his dependents might become the objects of public charity, such a calamity is avoided by requiring the business or enterprise to provide for such dependents, with the right of the employer to add the amount that is paid out to the cost of producing and selling the product of such business or enterprise. The beneficent purposes of such acts are therefore apparent to all, and for that reason, if for no other, should receive a very liberal construction in favor of the injured employee. We are all united upon the proposition that in view of the purposes of such acts, in case —resolving such doubt in favor of employee. there is any doubt respecting the right to compensation, such doubt should be resolved in favor of the employee or of his dependents as the case may be.

Counsel for the defendants Miller and the life insurance company have cited cases, however, wherein it is held that, where an employee has been injured from a cause or accident to which the public generally are exposed the same as the injured employee, the injury does not arise out of the employment. To that effect are the following among other cases cited by counsel: Re Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 215 Mass. 497, 102 N. E. 697; Mann v. Glastonbury Knitting Co. 90 Conn. 116, L.R.A.1916D, 86, 96 Atl. 368, 12 N. C. C. A. 891; De Voe v. New York State R. Co. 218 N. Y. 318, L.R.A. 1917A, 250, 113 N. E. 256; Newman v. Newman, 169 App. Div. 745, 155 N. Y. Supp. 665.

In the case first cited, in referring to the test as to when it may be said that an accident or injury arises out of the employment, the court, in the course of the opinion, said: "It [the injury] 'arises out of' the employment, when there is apparent to the rational mind upon consideration of all the circumstances a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. Under this test, if the injury can be seen to have followed as a natural incident of the work and to have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment, then it arises 'out of' the employment." (Italics mine.)

This, it seems to the writer, is too rigid a construction of the statute. Such a construction brings us right back to the old proposition that the employer would be liable upon the ground of negligence in a common-law action. If the injury or accident should "have been contemplated by a reasonable person," as is stated in the excerpt quoted from the opinion, then the employer should have foreseen it and protected the employee. If the employer contemplates or foresees an injury and does nothing to prevent it, he is necessarily guilty of negligence, and is thus liable to the injured employee unless the latter is guilty of contributory negligence which is the proximate cause of the injury. Such a construction, I think, is not sustained by the weight of authority.

Nor is the doctrine, that if the public, or a portion of it, is exposed to the same hazard as the employee, then he, for that reason, may not recover, followed by the more recent decisions.

In the case of Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 36 Cal. App. 280, 171 Pac. 1088, cited by counsel for plaintiff, the court, in discussing that question in the course of the opinion, said: "The petitioner contends that, because Roberts was exposed only to the ordinary perils of the street to which any other person on the street is exposed, he does not fall within the rule which awards compensation for an injury arising out of the employment of the injured man. When the logical result of the application of the rule for which petitioner is contending is considered, the justice of treating this case as one arising out of Roberts's employment is apparent. Consider the case of a messenger boy. He is in no greater peril on the street than any other person there. He carries perhaps his message in his pocket, leaving his arms disengaged and perfectly free to move about. But he is on the street constantly in the course of his employment. To hold that Roberts is not entitled to compensation would be to hold that this messenger boy would likewise not be entitled to compensation for an injury caused to him by the perils of the street. The illustration might be extended further to truck drivers, teamsters, and numerous other classes of employment whose followers use the streets in the regular course of their duty, and whose peril on the streets is no greater than that of any other person, but who would not be injured but for the fact that their duty takes and keeps them on the street. It does not seem to us that the legislature ever intended that these persons should be excluded from the benefit of industrial accident compensation."

To the same effect are Industrial Commission v. Aetna Life Ins. Co.

— Colo. —, 8 A.L.R. 1336, 174 Pac. 589; Milwaukee v. Althoff, 156 Wis.

68, L.R.A.1916A, 327, 145 N. W. 238, 4 N. C. C. A. 110; Baum v. Industrial

Counsel for both sides have cited many other cases in support of their respective contentions, but the foregoing are sufficient to illustrate the principle upon which the courts proceed.

In view of the foregoing, it follows that the district court erred in holding that under the facts stated in plaintiff's complaint, which are conceded by the demurrer, she was not entitled to recover compensation under the Compensation Act. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court of Weber county, with directions to overrule the demurrer and to proceed to determine the cause in accordance with the views herein expressed. Plaintiff to recover costs on appeal.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: injury while making delivery as arising out of and in the course of employment.

The work of one employed to make deliveries requires the employee to be almost continuously on the street, and it has been held that an injury sustained while making a delivery arises out of and in the course of the employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, although the dangers of the street are common to persons thereon generally, since the work of a delivery man renders him peculiarly subject to these dangers. Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) 36 Cal. App. 280, 171 Pac. 1088; Keaney's Case (1919) 232 Mass. 532, 122 N. E. 739; Hansen v. Northwestern Fuel Co. (1919) — Minn. —, 174 N. W. 726; Miller v. Taylor (1916) 173 App. Div. 865, 159 N. Y. Supp. 999; CHANDLER v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 930. See, however, Newman v. Newman (1915) 169 App. Div. 745, 155 N. Y. Supp. 665, set out infra.

It will be observed that in the reported case (CHANDLER v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION) an injury by a dog bite, while one employed to deliver packages was making a delayed delivery in the morning while on his way from his home to the place where the vehicle used by him was kept, to procure it for his day's work, was held to have arisen out of the employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The court adopted the reasoning that an employee is not deprived of the right to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act because of the fact that the public is exposed to a similar hazard as that from which the employee's injury arises.

And it has been held that an employee suffered an injury by an accident arising out of the employment where it appeared that he was a driver of an express wagon, and that while crossing the street on his way from his truck to deliver an express package he was struck by an automobile and injured so that he died two days later. Miller v. Taylor (1916) 173 App. Div. 865, 159 N. Y. Supp. 999.

And there is a dictum in Globe Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918) 36 Cal. App. 280, 171 Pac. 1088, that a messenger injured while carrying a message on the street receives an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, although he is in no greater danger on the street than any other person on the street, since he is on the street constantly in the course of his employment.

And the injury to a teamster who, after having finished a delivery, was struck by an automobile while attempting to recover papers which he was carrying in his hat and which had been blown out on the highway when his hat blew off, was held to have arisen out of his employment. Keaney's Case (1919) 232 Mass. 532, 122 N. E. 739. It was argued in this case that the act of the teamster in attempting to recover the papers was a mere isolated instance of danger peculiar to the whole public, but the court refused to adopt this reasoning.

And in Hansen v. Northwestern Fuel Co. (1919) — Minn. —, 174 N. W. 726, where a driver of a laundry wagon, after stabling his horse at noon, remembered that he had not collected laundry from a certain hotel, walked to the hotel, took the bag of laundry, and on his way back was struck by an automobile, it was held that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, the court stating that it was a street risk to which his work subjected him, and that, although he was not using his wagon as was customary, he was working in furtherance of his employer's interest.

And in Employers' Indemnity Corp. v. Kirkpatrick (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 214 S. W. 956, a workman was held engaged in the performance of his duty as an employee within the Workmen's Compensation Act where, at the time he was killed, it appeared that he was employed to deliver and collect laundry and charges therefor, and that he had turned in his wagon used for delivering, and was on his way to the residence of a customer to collect a laundry bill when he was struck by an automobile.

And in Beaudry v. Watkins (1916) 191 Mich. 445, L.R.A.1916F, 576, 158 N. W. 16, it was held that a delivery boy riding a bicycle, who was given permission to go to his home for lunch after making a delivery, and who, upon his return, caught onto the rear end of a truck, and was thrown and injured, so that he died, was held to have received such injuries from an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

And in Burton Auto Transfer Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1918)

37 Cal. App. 657, 174 Pac. 72, the injury to a truckman, whose hours were irregular, was held to have happened in the course of, and to have arisen out of his employment, where it appeared that he had procured a load and driven his truck on the opposite side of the street in front of his employer's establishment about noon, and left it during the noon hour for the purpose of waiting until the depot where he was to deliver his load was open, and that at his employer's suggestion, shortly before 1 o'clock, the opening time of the depot, he started across the street to his truck and was struck by an automobile. The court here held that the workman had not left his employment, that he was in a place where he had a right to be, and that he had left his truck where he had a right to leave it.

And in E. E. Walsh Teaming Co. v. Industrial Commission (1919) 290 Ill. 536, 125 N. E. 331, a finding that the death of a workman arose out of and in the course of his employment was held justified where there was evidence that he was a truck driver and was killed by an elevator while endeavoring to get a receipt which was to be signed by one to whom he was to take the goods which had been loaded on his truck.

In Siglin v. Armour & Co. (1918) 261 Pa. 30, 103 Atl. 991, where a helper on a delivery motor truck on the way back from making an out of town delivery was thrown off by a jolt and killed while standing on the running board after having given up his seat to two girls who had been overtaken on the road, and given a ride, it was held that the injury occurred while he was acting in the course of his employment, the court holding that it was immaterial how he came to be where he was when jolted off.

In some cases, however, a recovery has been denied a deliveryman under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, on the ground that he had departed from his duties, and that his injury did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

1918F, 881, 164 N. W. 1012, it was held that a messenger boy who in performing his duties traversed the streets of a city, departed from the scope of his employment when he climbed upon a passing vehicle, not owned or controlled by his employer, for the purpose of expediting his work, and that an accident sustained by him when on the vehicle could not be said to have arisen out of the course of his employment, it being held that since he was furnished carfare when messages were to go beyond a certain distance he was to walk on all other occasions.

And a driver of a florist's delivery wagon, whose duties covered the driving of the wagon and assisting the man who accompanied him to make deliveries, was held not to have received an injury which arose out of and in the course of his employment, where he fell from a ladder while assisting in adjusting a window box in a house, at which a delivery of flowers had been made, the court holding that there was no connection between the driving of the wagon and the fall from the ladder. Glatzl v. Stumpp (1917) 220 N. Y. 71, 114 N. E. 1053.

And in Carnahan v. Mailometer Co. (1918) 201 Mich. 153, 167 N. W. 9, a truckman employed to carry the necessary materials to and from a factory was held not to have suffered an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, where having carried a box of books for which the bill of lading had been given him by the shipping clerk, from a railroad station to the house of one of the stockholders of the company, and after placing the box in the front hall, he was injured while carrying it to the second floor at the request of the maid; the court holding that the injury occurred while he was carrying out a mere accommodation for the stockholder, and while he was accommodating the maid.

And a messenger who had been furnished by his employers with money to pay his fare and was injured while attempting to board a tramcar, moving about 5 miles an hour, without invitation and contrary to a notice on the car, was held not injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Symon v. Wemyss Coal Co. [1912] S. C. 1239, 49 Scot. L. R. 921, 6 B. W. C. C. 298.

In Newman v. Newman (1915) 169 App. Div. 745, 155 N. Y. Supp. 665, affirmed in (1916) 218 N. Y. 325, 113 N. E. 382, where one employed principally to drive a meat delivery wagon, after having put his horse up, was proceeding on foot to make a delivery near the market when he fell over a pail of broken glass and was injured, it was held that his injuries did not arise out of his employment in a hazardous occupation or incidental to it within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, but that it was a common risk to which anyone who chanced to travel the same way was equally exposed.

And in Kettle v. M'Kay (1916) 9 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 544, it was held that there was nothing in the nature of a workman's employment as a porter which exposed him to the peculiar risk of falling from a low coping at the top of the steps of a house, at which he was to deliver a bundle. Lord Cozens-Hardy said: "In circumstances like those the burden is, of course, undoubtedly on the applicant to show that the accident arose not merely in the course of the employment, but out of the employment. It is not at all enough for him to say: 'My business as a porter or messenger took me to this house or place, and I should never have gone to the street or the house if I had not been so employed.' He must go beyond that. He must show that the circumstances which led to the accident were of such a nature that they specially increased the risk beyond that of any other member of the public." J. v.

ARTHUR M. WALLACE, Judge of the Jefferson Circuit Court.

(— Ky. —, 217 S. W. 916.)

Dismissal — after appeal — representative of class.

1. A minority stockholder of a corporation, suing on behalf of himself and other minority stockholders, may dismiss the action without prejudice at any time while it is pending on appeal, before decision is handed down, both as to himself and all whom he represents.

[See note on this question beginning on page 950.]

— power to agree to.

2. The parties of record to a suit, laboring under no disability, and suing or defending for themselves alone, may agree to dismissal at any time, with or without prejudice.

Compromise — power to settle suit after judgment.

3. Parties to a suit may settle the matters at issue before or at any time after a final judgment by the trial court or court of appeal.

— agreement to judgment after appeal.

4. The parties to a litigation who are legally competent to act may disregard the mandate of the court of appeal and ask the trial court to enter judgment according to any agreement which they may make.

[See 2 R. C. L. 289.]

Appeal — duty of trial court to protect rights under judgment.

5. The trial court to which the mandate of the appellate court is sent for execution in a suit by a minority stockholder of the corporation, on behalf of himself and other stockholders of the same class, must prevent a settlement by the party of record which will prejudice the rights of those whom he represents.

Dismissal — effect.

6. The dismissal of an action without prejudice leaves it standing unaffected by the order of dismissal, or even a judgment which has been rendered in the case.

[See 9 R. C. L. 209.]

—after assignment protecting interests.

7. A conveyance by a corporation to a trustee of all its property of every description in trust, for distribution among its stockholders, includes a claim against its directors and another corporation for mismanagement and misappropriation of assets, and protects the rights of minority stockholders as well as would a judgment directing an accounting, so that one suing for himself and other minority stockholders may dismiss the action after such judgment if such an assignment has been made.

Corporation — right of one purchasing stock pending litigation.

8. One purchasing stock of a corporation after a motion has been made to dismiss an action in which the stockholders are interested cannot prevent such dismissal if his rights will be as fully protected by the compromise under which the dismissal is affected as they would be by the continuance of the action and appointment of a receiver.

— right to control action of corporation.

9. One purchasing stock in a corporation after the corporation has dismissed a pending suit and conveyed all its property to a trustee for the purpose of winding up its affairs cannot undo what the corporation has rightfully done.

Mandamus — to compel entry of judgment.

10. Mandamus lies to compel a trial court to dismiss a pending action and enter a judgment which has been agreed upon by all the parties to the suit.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent judge to enter an order dismissing a certain pending action and enter an agreed judgment. Writ granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Helm Bruce, C. B. Blakey, M. M. Logan, Henry L. Stone, and E. S. Jouett, for petitioners:

The power and duty of the court to act are not confined to cases where the lower court is acting outside of its jurisdiction, but embrace cases where the court "is proceeding erroneously within its jurisdiction, and the party has no adequate remedy for the wrong he will suffer by reason of the erroneous proceeding through appeal."

R. Co. v. Rice, 154 Ky. 198, 156 S. W. 1075; Rush v. Denhardt, 138 Ky. 238, 127 S. W. 785, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1199.

Messrs. Allen P. Dodd and Henry S. Barker for respondent.

Carroll, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners, Bernheim and others, have filed their petition in this court, asking that we issue a writ, directing Arthur M. Wallace, as judge of the Jefferson circuit court, chancery branch, first division, to enter an order tendered by them in his court, dismissing without prejudice the action of I. W. Bernheim against the Louisville Property Company et al.; and also commanding him to enter an agreed judgment tendered at the same time the order to dismiss was offered. We are further asked to direct Judge Wallace to discharge the rules issued by him against the petitioners, and to restrain him from appointing a receiver in the case.

Temporary orders were made in conformity to the prayer of the petition; and, the case having been prepared and submitted for final judgment, we will now hand down our decision.

The original proceeding instituted in this court grew out of the following state of facts: Some years ago a suit was filed in the court of Judge Wallace by I. W. Bernheim, a minority stockholder in the Louisville Property Company, a Kentucky corporation, suing in his own right and in behalf of all other minority stockholders, seeking to oust the directors of the corporation, who had been elected by a majority of the stockholders; to annul the conveyance made of many parcels of real property by the Louisville Property Company to Thomas P. Cairns; to wind up the affairs of the Louisville Property Company, which were alleged to have been managed by its directors solely in the interest and for the benefit of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company in disregard of its own welfare, and to the prejudice of the minority stockholders; and to have an accounting for the Louisville Property Company against the directors of the company and against the railroad company.

When this cause came on to be heard by Judge Wallace he dismissed the petition of Bernheim, except as to one item about which there was no dispute.

Thereafter Bernheim, yet suing for himself and representing by permission of the lower court the other minority stockholders, brought the case here on appeal, and in an opinion delivered by this court in May, 1919, that may be found in 185 Ky. 63, 214 S. W. 801, the judgment rendered by Judge Wallace, except as to one item involving $102,455.88, was reversed, and the case remanded to his court, with directions to cancel the deed made by the Louisville Property Company to Cairns; to appoint a receiver for the Louisville Property Company; to have an accounting made by its directors and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company; and to take such other steps as might be necessary to a final settlement of the affairs of the Louisville Property Company and the distribution of its assets among the persons entitled thereto.

In due time the mandate from this court issued, and on November 6, 1919, Bernheim, the Louisville Property Company, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the individuals sued, and the heirs of Cairns, who had in the meantime died, through their respective attorneys, came into Judge Wallace's court, filed the mandate of this court, and tendered to Judge Wallace an order, "dismissing without prejudice so much of the above-styled suit as seeks the appointment of a receiver, a reference to the master, an accounting, the winding up of the corporation's business and the distribution of its assets, and so much thereof as seeks a recovery of any sum against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the defendants M. H. Smith, W. L. Mapother, W. W. Thompson, Charles Haydon, W. A. Northcutt, C. O. Bradford, and C. J. Weis, or any of them," with a request that it be entered; and at the same time tendered, with a motion that it be entered, the following judgment, which had been agreed to by Bernheim, yet representing all the minority stockholders, and the Louisville Property Company, the railroad company, and the individual defendants: "Thereupon, in pursuance of said mandate and the opinion of the court of appeals, delivered May 23, 1919, a copy of which is also filed and made a part of the record in this case, it is now adjudged by the court that the judgment entered herein on April 20, 1918, and from which plaintiff appealed, be and the same is hereby set aside and held for naught, except: (1) In so far as the said judgment adjudged the recovery on behalf of the defendant Louisville Property Company against the defendant Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company of $39,542.11 on account of the purchase of certain property, situated in Knoxville, Tennessee, and (2) except in so far as said judgment adjudged that plaintiff's petition be dismissed as to the item of $102,455.88, with interest thereon, which the plaintiff sought to recover for the use and benefit of the defendant Louisville Property Company, and which grew out of the transfer on May 31, 1908, to the defendant Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company of $102,455.88, said sum representing the surplus appearing on the books of the defendant Louisville Property Company as of March 1, 1908, in which two respects the said judgment of April 20, 1918, shall remain in full force and effect.

"It is further adjudged that the judgment entered herein on June 4, 1918, with respect to the matter of costs, be and the same is hereby set aside and held for naught.

"It is now further adjudged in pursuance of said mandate and opinion that each and all of the following deeds and instruments of writing be and the same are hereby canceled, set aside, and held for naught, to wit:

"(1) The several deeds dated October 16, 1911, made by the defendant Louisville Property Company to Thomas Cairns, since deceased, and whose widow, Flora D. Cairns, and children and heirs, have been made defendants and brought before the court herein, by which deeds the defendant Louisville Property Company undertook to sell and convey to said Thomas Cairns certain lands and mineral rights, therein fully described, situated in various counties in the state of Kentucky, which deeds are of record in the offices of the clerks of the county court of the below-named counties, respectively.

"It is further adjudged that the plaintiff, I. W. Bernheim, recover all his costs herein (to be taxed by the clerk) of the defendants Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Louisville Property Company, for which execution may issue.

"Thereupon came the plaintiff by his counsel, Clayton B. Blakey, and on his motion this action as to all other claims asserted and all other relief sought not covered by the foregoing judgment is now dismissed without prejudice."

At the same time it was brought to the attention of Judge Wallace that on the preceding day the Louisville Property Company, acting through its board of directors, with the consent of a majority of its stockholders, as well as Bernheim and all other parties of record in the suit, had executed to the United States Trust Company, a solvent and responsible corporation, having the authority to act as assignee and settle estates, a deed of assignment, conveying "all of its property of every description—real, personal, and mixed—and wheresoever located, to the assignee, its successors and assigns, absolutely and in fee simple, in trust for the payment of the debts of the assignor and the expenses of administration, and the distribution of the remainder, if any, of the proceeds of the sale of the assignor's property, to its stockholders ratably, according to their holdings at the time such distribution is made; the assignee, its successors and assigns, being hereby specifically authorized to sell all of the property herein conveyed at public or private sale, and in such parcels and upon such terms as it may deem most advantageous."

Judge Wallace took the matter under advisement, and on November 15 overruled Bernheim's motion to dismiss the case without prejudice, as well as his motion to enter the judgment before mentioned; and at the same time issued rules against I. W. Bernheim, certain officers and directors of the Louisville Property Company, and the president of the United States Trust Company, returnable November 18, "to show cause, if any they have or can, why they shall not be punished for contempt in wrongfully and unlawfully obstructing the court in its duty by conveying by deed of assignment the property of the Louisville Property Company to the United States Trust Company;" on November 17 he overruled a motion for an appeal made by the persons against whom rules were directed to issue; and at the same time overruled the motion of Bernheim to grant him an appeal to the court of appeals from the order entered on November 15, overruling his motion to enter the agreed judgment and dismiss the action without prejudice.

In the course of the opinion handed down by Judge Wallace, setting forth the reasons why he refused to enter the agreed judgment and dismiss the action without prejudice, and ordered rules to issue against Bernheim and the directors of the Louisville Property Company, he said:

"The rule is elementary that the plaintiff may dismiss his case without prejudice at any time before a judgment or final submission; provided the interests of others have not accrued or become fixed; but whether, after a judgment below, followed by an appeal, a reversal with a mandate from the court of appeals, specifically adjudging plaintiff and those he represents certain specific rights and remedies for the matters complained of, the plaintiff, who not only sues for himself, but for a large number of unnamed and unknown persons, can, after all of the principals involved in the litigation have been determined by the court of appeals, dismiss the action as to them or dismiss it for himself even, is a different proposition. . . .

"The plaintiff, Bernheim, as a minority stockholder in the Louisville Property Company, instituted this action both for himself and all other stockholders in interest with him to oust the directors, to annul a conveyance of the property of the company in Kentucky to Thomas P. Cairns, and to wind up the affairs of the corporation, alleging that the directors have managed the property solely in the interest of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, in disregard of the welfare of the company and to the injury of plaintiff and the other stockholders of the corporation.

"An accounting for the property company against its directors and against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and its directors was also prayed for."

Then, after quoting certain portions of the opinion of this court, he further said: "It is apparent from the foregoing excerpts that the court of appeals has settled all of the questions of law in this case and directed definitely the judgment to be entered and the procedure thereafter to be had. There are no judicial questions left open; all that remains to be done is either clerical or administrative, and this, in the court's opinion, is in legal effect a final judgment in the action, and precluded the plaintiff, by any sort of arrangement with the defendant, to set aside, annul, or evade the judgment of the court of appeals, nor has he the power to set aside or annul the rights of his coplaintiffs, therein established and fixed, and thus determined, whom he has brought into court, and who have gone with him through all the procedure of this case."

"Nor can this court submit to the high-handed and contemptuous treatment which it and the mandate of the court of appeals have received at the hands of these parties, plaintiff and defendant. This property is all in the hands of the court, and a specific and imperative mandate has been sent down by the court of appeals, directing in specific language and detail what the lower court shall do. The execution of this mandate is my plain duty, and yet I find myself obstructed in the performance of this duty by the unlawful acts of the parties hereto in conjunction with the United States Trust Company. . . .

"The plaintiff brought the minority stockholders into this court to help him bear the expense of the litigation and to give moral and legal influence to his litigation. After the original judgment below their rights were fully foreclosed by it. Not one of them could sue on his own behalf; the adverse judgment was res judicata as to them all; and, had that judgment been affirmed, their right to an accounting or to have the property sold for distribution of the proceeds would have been lost. The court of appeals reversed the judgment and crystallized their right to a sale and an accounting, and this right cannot now be bargained away without their express consent by the plaintiff by any sort of arrangement with the defendants. When the property unlawfully taken from the jurisdiction of the court in part through the connivance of the plaintiff is restored by the guilty parties to its original status, the court will entertain a motion by the plaintiff to dismiss his own action."

Thereafter, and on November 18, Bernheim, the property company, and the persons against whom the rules were issued, filed their petition in this court.

In his answer to the petition filed in this court Judge Wallace, after denying certain material averments, further said that Bernheim, in his petition filed in the court of Judge Wallace, alleged:

"That the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was indebted to the Louisville Property Company in very large sums, and, to wit, more than $450,000 for use of the property of the Louisville Property Company, and the said plaintiffs, in said action, asked, first, for an accounting to ascertain the amount due by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to the Louisville Property Company, and after that amount had been ascertained, prayed judgment against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company or the said named individuals as directors of the Louisville Property Company for the amount found to be due on the accounting to the Louisville Property Company; . . . that if the court should sustain the motions of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, it would result in a dismissal without prejudice of the action, and sacrifice thereby the entire claims of all the stockholders of the Louisville Property Company as against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for an accounting, and it further appeared to the court, from the record and from the verified petition of the plaintiff, that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was justly due the property company more than $450,000, or was due the Louisville Property Company for the use of its property an enormous sum not yet ascertained, and would further sacrifice the rights of the stockholders as to a receiver and immediate liquidation of the said property, and as a result of all of which this court concluded that the rights of the stockholders of the property company were so material, and that the interest of the stockholders of the property company amounted to so much, that this defendant felt that the action should not be dismissed until and after all of the stockholders of the Louisville Property Company had the opportunity to be heard, and did not feel that it had the legal right to dismiss the action in accordance with the motions unless and except all of the stockholders of the Louisville Property Company, who were the interested plaintiffs, joined in the said motion, and accordingly overruled the motions so made and tendered on the 6th day of November, 1919, by his written opinion delivered on the 15th day of November, 1919. . . .

"Defendant further says that at the time the said conveyance was made the said property was in the custody of this defendant as judge, and that this defendant had jurisdiction of all the parties owning said property, as well as the property, and, it appearing to this defendant that the manifest purpose of said conveyance was an effort on the part of the said named attorneys and parties to place the property beyond the custody and control of the court without authority of law, and for that reason and in order to protect himself against the parties, and in order to protect the jurisdiction of this defendant as judge over the property, this defendant issued the rules against the individuals referred to in the petition, and on the 15th day of November, making said rules returnable the 18th day of November. . . .

"Thereafter, and on December 2, W. M. Duffy, who had not theretofore had any connection with the case either in the lower court or this as a party of record, or otherwise, filed in the case pending in this court his intervening petition, answer, counterclaim, and cross petition, in which he set out that he was one of the stockholders of the Louisville Property Company for whom the action was brought and prosecuted by Bernheim; that if the agreed judgment tendered in Judge Wallace's court on November 6 was entered, this petitioner's valid, adjudicated, and vested rights will be destroyed, in that large claims against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the officers and directors of the Louisville Property Company will be thereby sacrificed."

He further said that it was his purpose to tender and file in Judge Wallace's court on November 29 an intervening petition, and pray the court "for an order allowing this petitioner, as a stockholder, to prosecute the said action for and in his own behalf, and for and in behalf of all the stockholders of the Louisville Property Company not appearing of record by counsel, and that if this petitioner is permitted to intervene and prosecute the said action, he will do so in good faith, and for the sole purpose of protecting the rights of the stockholders of the Louisville Property Company, and for the purpose of carrying into execution the mandate of this court in the said action in the Jefferson circuit court."

The petitioners Bernheim and others, for reply to the answer and counterclaim of Duffy, after denying certain material allegations thereof, averred that Duffy was not, on November 6, 1919, when the agreed judgment was tendered in Judge Wallace's court, a stockholder in the Louisville Property Company, nor did the company or any of its officers have any notice that he claimed to be a stockholder until November 26, 1919.

They further averred: "That if the said Duffy owns any stock in the Louisville Property Company, he has acquired same since November 6, 1919, when the motion to enter an agreed judgment as to certain matters in the said case of Bernheim v. Louisville Property Company, and to dismiss the action so far as not covered by that judgment, was made; and that, if said intervenor has acquired such stock, he was procured to acquire it solely for the purpose, and did acquire it solely for the purpose, of seeking to intervene in this action and in the said action of Bernheim v. Louisville Property Company, etc., in the Jefferson circuit court, for the purpose of preventing the entry of the said agreed judgment and the dismissal of said action of Bernheim v. Louisville Property Company, and of securing the appointment of a particular person as receiver of the Louisville Property Company who had been theretofore selected for that position. And petitioners believe, and have good ground to believe, and on such belief allege, that said intervenor, if he is now the owner of any stock of the Louisville Property Company, has simply attempted to buy his way into this litigation for the purpose of controlling same, and especially for the purpose of endeavoring to secure the appointment of a particular person as receiver of the Louisville Property Company, and his attempt to intervene in this cause and in the said cause of Bernheim v. Louisville Property Company in the Jefferson circuit court is not in good faith, and is not for the purpose of protecting the rights of any stockholders in the Louisville Property Company."

It further appears from the record that the holders of about 78 per cent of the total outstanding stock of the Louisville Property Company have consented to the action of its directors in executing the deed of assignment to the United States Trust Company, and also to the order of dismissal, agreed judgment, and motions made in connection therewith, that were tendered in Judge Wallace's court, as before stated.

It further appears that the Louisville Property Company was really organized and created by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and that its stock was distributed to stockholders in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company at the time of the organization of the property company, and that these stockholders are scattered all over the country, many of them owning only one share of the stock in the Louisville Property Company; and we may further assume that many of them, at least 20 per cent, never heard of or knew anything about this suit of Bernheim's.

It will thus be seen that Bernheim may be said to have represented in the suit brought, and to have sued for the use and benefit of, about 20 per cent of the stockholders of the property company, which he was permitted to do under authority of § 25 of the Civil Code of Practice, providing that "if the question involve a common or general interest of many persons, or if the parties be numerous and it is impracticable to bring all of them before the court within a reasonable time, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of all."

It further appears from the opinion and answer of Judge Wallace that he was influenced to refuse to permit the agreed judgment and order dismissing the suit to be entered by the apprehension that, if the matter was taken out of his court, as the parties proposed to do by the judgment and deed of assignment, the rights of the minority stockholders represented by Bernheim would not be properly protected; and by the further fact that he conceived it to be his right and duty to follow the directions of this court announced in its opinion in the Bernheim Case, in conformity to which its mandate was issued.

That a plaintiff or defendant who is a party of record and who sues or defends under § 25 of the Code for the use and benefit of numerous other parties, who are not represented except by him, may at any time before the rights of the class for whom he sues or defends have been adjudicated by the court in which the action is pending, or by the court to which an appeal may be prosecuted, dismiss without prejudice the suit or defense, we have no serious doubt. The party so suing or defending for a class unrepresented except by him brings the class into court, and may take them out when he goes, if he goes out before there has been an adjudication of the rights of the class. Until there has been some adjudication of their rights, it cannot be said that they have any standing in court, except through the party of record, and are subject to his control. Cook, Stockholders, § 748; Innes v. Lansing, 7 Paige, 583; Brinkerhoff v. Bostwick, 99 N. Y. 194, 1 N. E. 663; 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 628; Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 23 Pick. 492; Belmont Nail Co. v. Columbia Iron & Steel Co. (C. C.) 46 Fed. 336; Thompson v. Fisler, 33 N. J. Eq. 480; Derby v. Yale, 13 Hun, 273. In Daniell's Chancery, Pleading & Practice, vol. 1, p. 794, the rule is thus announced: "Where a plaintiff sues on behalf of himself and all other persons of the same class, although he acts upon his own mere motion, and retains the absolute dominion of the suit until the decree, and may dismiss the bill at his pleasure, yet, after a decree, he cannot by his conduct deprive other persons of the same class of the benefit of the decree, if they think fit to prosecute it."

In Hirshfeld v. Fitzgerald, 157 N. Y. 166, 46 L.R.A. 839, 51 N. E. 997, a leading case on this subject, the court quoted with approval the following from the Brinkerhoff Case, 99 N. Y. 194, 1 N. E. 663: "It is true that at any time before judgment the original plaintiff, before the others were made parties, could have discontinued the suit or could have settled his individual damages with the defendants, and have executed a release which would have been effectual as to him. But if he had prosecuted the action to judgment, then the judgment would have been for the benefit of all the stockholders, and he would then have ceased to have control over it, because the rights of the other stockholders would at once have attached thereto. The bringing of the action by the original plaintiff did not prevent the other stockholders from bringing similar actions. But the moment a judgment should be recovered in one action for the benefit of all the stockholders, the proceedings in all the others would be stayed."

And so in this case, Bernheim, against whom no claim was asserted by any defendant, might have dismissed without prejudice the action at any time after he brought it, and at any time while it was pending on appeal in this court, before the opinion was handed down by this court; and it would necessarily follow that its dismissal would carry with it the dismissal of the action as to the entire class for whose benefit he sued.

Furthermore, until the opinion was handed down Bernheim and the defendants were the only parties of record, and there could, of course, be no obstacle in the way of parties of record to a suit, laboring under no disability, and suing or defending for themselves alone, agreeing at any time to the dismissal of the action or defense, with or without prejudice; because the absolute control and disposition of litigation at every stage of the proceedings, from its inception to and after the final judgment, is in the power of the parties to the record.

Courts were established, at least in part, for the purpose of settling disputes that people could not settle for themselves; and, although parties unable to agree about matters in controversy may go into court to have their rights adjudicated, they still retain unimpaired their right to do as they please about the litigation. They may settle the matters at issue before or at any time after a final judgment has been rendered, in any way they choose, and the court has no right or power to interfere. And this right exists although the litigation has been brought to the court of appeals and there has been a final judgment by that court, determining the rights of the parties, accompanied by directions to the lower court.

In other words, although the court of appeals may specifically direct what proceedings shall be taken in the lower court to which the case is remanded, or the character of the judgment that shall be entered, the parties to the litigation, if they are legally competent to act, and sue for themselves alone, may disregard in whole or in part the directions of the court of appeals, and settle the litigation in any manner they may agree to, and ask the court to enter as its judgment the agreements they make. Karnes v. Black, 185 Ky. 410, 215 S. W. 191. But, of course, in the absence of such an agreement, the lower court must obey the directions contained in the opinion of this court. As said in McLean v. Nixon, 18 B. Mon. 769: "The mandate of this court is imperative on the court below. It has no option to obey or disobey it. . . . It must be carried into effect by the inferior court according to its true intent and meaning."

So that, if Bernheim had been suing for himself alone, we may well assume that Judge Wallace would readily have consented that any judgments or orders that the parties of record had agreed to might be entered, although the entry of such orders or judgments might have taken the case finally out of his court and entirely dispensed with the necessity of taking the further steps in the case he was directed to take by the opinion of this court and its mandate.

Having thus adjudged the questions of procedure according to our understanding of the applicable law, the only remaining question, aside from that presented by the intervening petition of Duffy, relates to the right and duty of Judge Wallace in respect to the claims of the minority stockholders, who had not appeared in the case except through Bernheim, and whose rights were definitely fixed by the opinion of this court.

It was, as we think, the duty of Judge Wallace to protect in his court the rights of the minority stockholders represented by Bernheim, and to deny Bernheim or the other parties of record, or any of them, the right to enter any orders or judgments, or make any settlements that would be prejudicial to the interests of these minority stockholders, or that would take from them any of the rights to which they had been adjudged entitled by the opinion of this court. Accordingly, if the agreed judgment, the order of dismissal, and the deed of assignment deprived the minority stockholders of any substantial benefits or advantages adjudged to them by this court, Judge Wallace properly refused to permit the entry of the agreed judgment and the order of dismissal, or to recognize the validity of the deed of assignment. But, on the other hand, if the rights of the minority stockholders will be as fully protected by the agreement made between Bernheim and the other parties and the proceedings taken thereunder as they would be if the matter remained in Judge Wallace's court and under his control, he committed error in refusing to permit the order of dismissal and the agreed judgment to be entered, and in issuing rules for contempt.

Let us see, now, how this matter stands. The agreed judgment expressly preserved all the rights to which the minority stockholders were adjudged by this court, except that it did not make any mention of the claim of some $450,000 asserted on behalf of the Louisville Property Company through Bernheim against the directors of the property company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and which was attempted to be dismissed without prejudice, or in terms direct that the assignee should make the accounting concerning this claim that was directed in the opinion of this court. But it was not, as we will later show, necessary that any specific mention should have been made of this claim, or any directions concerning it be given the assignee, as the dismissal of the action without prejudice left it standing unaffected by the order of dismissal or the judgment.

Dismissal—effect.

Repeating now the clause in the deed of assignment reciting that the Louisville Property Company "sells, assigns, aliens, conveys, and transfers" to the United States Trust Company "all of its property of every description—real, personal, and mixed—and wheresoever located, to the assignee, its successors and assigns, absolutely and in fee simple, in trust for the payment of the debts of the assignor and the expenses of administration and the distribution of the remainder, if any, of the proceeds of the sale of the assignor's property to its stockholders ratably according to their holdings at the time such distribution is made."

It will be seen that the Louisville Property Company conveyed everything that it owned or had an interest in to the assignee, and clearly the words of conveyance are broad enough to include any claim or demand the property company had against its directors or the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, growing out of the mismanagement of its affairs, or the wrongful diversion or appropriation of its property or assets of any kind by these parties; or, in other words, broad enough to transfer to the assignee the claim asserted against the directors of the Louisville Property

Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company by Bernheim.

In short, the assignee has the same right and power to assert and recover these claim or demands, and to take all steps that may be necessary to do so, that

—after assignment protecting interests.

Bernheim would have had, or that a receiver appointed by the court would have, and it will be held to the same strict accountability in the execution of the trust as would a receiver acting under the orders of the court. In Cartmell v. Commercial Bank & T. Co. 153 Ky. 798, 156 S. W. 1048, concerning the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent bank, this court pertinently said: "The object and aim of the law, in the appointment of a receiver, is to see that the assets of the institution, in charge of which he is placed, are properly, honestly, and economically administered. The ends of the law are satisfied if the estate is administered in this way, whether the person charged with its administration be termed a banking commissioner, a trustee, or an assignee. The duties are the same. If any difference is to be found, it is in favor of the liquidation of banks, through and under the direction of the banking commissioner, rather than under a receiver appointed by the court, for the former plan is not only more expeditious and less cumbersome, but is undoubtedly less expensive."

Accordingly it will be the duty of the assignee to diligently, faithfully, and carefully inquire into the nature and condition of these claims or demands, if any there be, and take such action as may be necessary and proper to recover them for the use and benefit of the stockholders of the property company, and consequently the stockholders will not suffer any loss on account of the failure to preserve in the agreed judgment their right to prosecute the claim asserted by Bernheim against the directors of the company or the Louisville &

Nashville Railroad Company, or by the fact that no express mention was made of this claim in the deed of assignment.

It is also clearly shown by the record that putting the property in the hands of the assignee for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the Louisville Property Company and distributing the proceeds among the persons entitled thereto in place of turning it over to a receiver would result in saving to the stockholders a sum variously estimated at from $100,000 to $300,000; that, aside from this large saving, the assignee can dispose of more advantageously and with much less cost and expense than a receiver the great amount of valuable and widely scattered real estate conveyed to it by the property company, and in this connection it might also be said that all parties agree that the assignee is a solvent, responsible institution, fully competent and equipped to discharge in a satisfactory way the trust reposed in it by the deed of assignment.

In regard to the intervening petition of W. M. Duffy little need be said. He was not the owner of any stock in the Louisville Property Company at any time before the motion to dismiss it was made in the court of Judge Wallace, as he did not become the owner of any stock until November 11, 1919, at which time he purchased two shares.

Testifying very frankly as to why he became the owner of these shares, he said:

Well, this stock was on the market, and I bought it because I believed that if I got hold of this stock I could control the suit.

Q. Why did you want to control this suit?

A. Because I just thought it was a good thing, and that is all.

Q. Why did you think it was a good thing?

A. To get in control of the minority stockholders; that was my purpose in buying. I did not think that the suit should have been dismissed.

Q. So you bought the stock with the idea that by acquiring two shares of stock you could get into the case which the parties were seeking to dismiss and settle amicably, and that you could thereby get control of the litigation?

A. Yes; after that day when Mr. Bernheim and his counsel asked that the suit be dismissed, after he had fought it through the court of appeals successfully, and after the court of appeals had rendered its opinion, and it looked as if Mr. Bernheim was going to get out of the case, I thought it would be to my advantage and my interest if I could secure some stock and take Mr. Bernheim's place.

W. M. Duffy, as a stockholder in the Louisville Property Company, had, of course, the right to take such steps as he thought necessary to protect his interest without reference to when he became the owner of the stock, but his interest will be as fully protected and his rights as carefully saved by the arrangements made through which the suit was dismissed and the conveyance made to the assignee as they would have been if a receiver had been appointed.

Aside from this, we do not think a party who purchases stock in a corporation after the corporation has rightfully dismissed a pending suit, and conveyed all of its property to an assignee for the purpose of winding up its affairs, is in a position to undo what the corporation has lawfully done. He occupies no better position than any other minority stockholder. It is true that he succeeded by his purchase to all the rights and privileges of his vendor, but his vendor was one of the class represented by Bernheim, and when the disposition that we have set out was made of the case, the rights of his vendor were determined, and Duffy, as a purchaser after this, is bound by what was done.

The only remaining question is the relief to which the petitioners are entitled, and as to this there is no difficulty. The power of this court to issue a writ of mandamus, directing the judge of a circuit court to dismiss a suit pending in his court, when the order of dismissal has been approved by the parties, and to enter therein a judgment that has been agreed upon by all the parties to the suit, they being competent to enter into agreements, is not only authorized by § 110 of the Constitution, but sustained by many opinions of this court. Mandamus—to compel entry of judgment.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 112 Ky. 464, 66 S. W. 5; Kelley v. Toney, 95 Ky. 338, 25 S. W. 264; Hindman v. Toney, 97 Ky. 413, 30 S. W. 1006; Weaver v. Toney, 107 Ky. 419, 50 L.R.A. 105, 54 S. W. 782; Shoemaker v. Hodge, 111 Ky. 436, 63 S. W. 979; Com. v. Tarvin, 114 Ky. 877, 72 S. W. 13; Davidson v. Lewis, 159 Ky. 798, 169 S. The petitioners have also asked a writ of prohibition, but we do not think it necessary to make any directions prohibiting Judge Wallace from appointing a receiver or making absolute the contempt rules issued, because the entry of the order dismissing the suit and the agreed judgment, which we have said the parties had a right to have entered, necessarily takes from Judge Wallace the right to appoint a receiver, and absolves from contempt the parties ruled.

Wherefore, the whole court except Judge Quinn sitting, Judge Wallace, as judge of the chancery branch, Louisville Jefferson Circuit Court, First Division, is directed to have entered on the order books of his court the orders and judgments tendered on November 6.

ANNOTATION.

Right of plaintiff to dismiss an action brought in behalf of himself and other persons.

  - a. In general, 954.

I. Introduction.

This annotation does not cover the question of the right of the original plaintiff to dismiss the action after others have been permitted to intervene and become parties. See, for instance, Lee v. Casey (1915) 269 Ill. 604, 109 N. E. 1062. It purports rather to include only those cases where the person seeking to prevent the dismissal was not a party of record.

A party, of course, usually has the right to discontinue an action or proceeding instituted by him, unless substantial rights of other parties have accrued and injustice will be done them by permitting the discontinuance. Andrews v. French (1913) 17 N. M. 615, 131 Pac. 996.

But it is well settled, it was said in School Dist. v. Clifcorn (1907) 133 Wis. 465, 112 N. W. 1099, that a plaintiff has no such complete control over his action as will entitle him to discontinue it at will without action by the court, and that the court may, in its discretion, deny the application for leave to discontinue, if the rights of the defendant or of third parties or the public will be substantially prejudiced thereby.

It was said in State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Ludwig (1900) 106 Wis. 226, 82 N. W. 158, that "when a plaintiff attempts to exercise his so-called absolute right to discontinue an action prosecuted by him, varied and numerous considerations may need to be weighed by the court before reaching its conclusion whether to allow or deny effect to such attempt. The effect of a termination of the suit upon others, either the defendant or third parties, or sometimes the public, is to be considered, and, if any prejudice to such persons is discoverable, whether it is such as to warrant retention of the suit."

A distinction should be observed as to the right to dismiss the action between the class of cases under consideration, where one brings an action for himself and others similarly situated, and that class of cases, not within the scope of the note where the one bringing the action is merely nominal party or trustee, the beneficial interest being in another. Because the rule is sometimes stated so broadly as to cover both classes of cases, as, for instance, that a plaintiff will not be permitted to dismiss the action where the interest of third parties would thereby be prejudiced, if the latter will indemnify the plaintiff for costs incurred in the further prosecution of the case, attention should be called to the fact that those cases in which dismissal by the plaintiff has been denied, even before judgment, because of the interest of third persons, not parties of record, have usually been cases in which the one bringing the action was a merely nominal plaintiff or trustee. It seems to be well settled that such a plaintiff cannot dismiss the action as against the objection of the person having the beneficial interest; at least, if the latter will indemnify the plaintiff against the costs to which he may be subjected. Among other cases supporting this rule are the following:

United States.—Farmers' & M. Bank v. Gaither (1828) 3 Cranch, 347, Fed. Cas. No. 4,654, reversed on other grounds in (1828) 1 Pet. 37, 7 L. ed. 43.

this point (1889) 33 Ill. App. 471; Lyon v. Worcester (1893) 49 Ill. App. 639.

Minnesota.—National Power & Paper Co. v. Rossman (1913) 122 Minn. 355, 142 N. W. 818, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 830.

North Dakota.—Van Gordon v. Goldamer (1907) 16 N. D. 323, 113 N. W. 609.

Oklahoma.—Berry v. Second Baptist Church (1913) 37 Okla. 117, 130 Pac. 585.

Pennsylvania. — M'Cullum v. Cox (1785; Pa. Sup. Ct) 1 Dall. 189, 1 L. ed. 70; Bentley v. Reading (1887) 22 W. N. C. 60.

Wisconsin. — Selleck v. Phelps (1860) 11 Wis. 380.

While ordinarily a plaintiff has the absolute right to dismiss the action, this is not true where he acts in a fiduciary capacity; and if such a plaintiff fails to act in good faith toward those whom he serves, and acts in collusion with the defendant, the dismissal may be set aside. National Power & Paper Co. v. Rossman (1913) 122 Minn. 355, 142 N. W. 818, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 830. And so it was held that while ordinarily the directors of a corporation might control an action brought by it, and dismiss the action without consulting the stockholders, they had no right to dismiss such an action through collusion with the defendant; and, if they did so, the dismissal, it was held, would be set aside at the instance of stockholders, the action reinstated, and the stockholders permitted to become parties and continue the action, when such course was necessary to protect their substantial rights. See, also, as illustrative of this class of cases, Bangs v. Sullivan (1903) 33 Tex. Civ. App. 30, 73 S. W.

74, holding that if a reorganization committee of an insolvent corporation, having brought a suit, fraudulently colludes with the defendant and dismisses the suit, the dismissal may be set aside at the instance of a stockholder.

And the rule that a nominal party, who is acting merely in a representative capacity, has no right to dismiss an action to the prejudice of the real party in interest without his consent, was applied in Berry v. Second Baptist Church (1913) 37 Okla. 117, 130 Pac. 585, to a case where the majority of the trustees of a church, acting for their private interests, attempted to dismiss an action brought for the church.

The person having the beneficial interest is considered as the substantial plaintiff, although his name does not appear in the record. See, among possibly other cases to this effect, Canby v. Ridgway (1808) 1 Binn. (Pa.) 496; Bury v. Hartman (1818) 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 175; and Bentley v. Reading (1887) 22 W. N. C. (Pa.) 60.

But where the plaintiff is a real party in interest, he has the right to control or to dismiss the action, though it is brought in terms for the use of another, who might incidentally benefit in case of recovery. Moore v. Bres (1867) 19 La. Ann. 532.

It will be observed that the rule supported by the above cases, that a merely nominal or legal plaintiff does not ordinarily have a right to control or to dismiss the action where the rights of third parties having the beneficial interest will be prejudiced, is the reverse, in result, of the equitable rule which permits a complainant suing for himself and others similarly situated to dismiss the suit before any order or decree has been made affecting the rights of such other persons who have an interest similar to complainant, but have not been made parties. The two classes of cases are, of course, dissimilar, though sometimes confused in the authorities. And the above cases are cited merely for the purpose of clearly making the distinction between them and the decisions which present the precise question under annotation.

The rule appears to be well settled that ordinarily one suing for himself and others similarly situated, as a creditor who brings suit against the debtor, for himself and other creditors, has the right to dismiss the suit before others interested have taken steps to become parties, and before the court has made any order or decree affecting their rights.

It was held in Hirshfeld v. Fitzgerald (1899) 157 N. Y. 166, 46 L.R.A. 839, 51 N. E. 997, that one who brings an action on behalf of himself and others similarly situated, who may come in and share in the expenses, has the right to control the action, and may continue, compromise, abandon, or discontinue it at pleasure, until a creditor similarly situated has procured an order to be made a party to the action, or has served a notice of a motion to be brought in, or until interlocutory judgment is entered. This rule is approved also in Manning v. Mercantile Trust Co. (N. Y.) supra.

And the rule that a complainant suing for himself and other creditors similarly situated has the right to dismiss the suit before judgment, without the consent of the other creditors, was held in Mattison v. Demarest (1863) 1 Robt. (N. Y.) 717, 19 Abb. Pr. 356, not changed by the Code provision that when the question is one of common or general interest of many persons, one or more may sue for the benefit of all. The court said that the statute was probably a mere enactment of the chancery rule, and that there was nothing therein which deprived a complainant, suing for a common benefit, of the right of control over the suit.

In McDougald v. Dougherty (1852) 11 Ga. 570, it was said that while it is true that one creditor cannot sue alone to enforce payment of his demand out of a common trust fund which has been set apart for himself and others, but must allow others to come in under the decree and share in the proceeds, this does not at all interfere with another equally well-established doctrine that, up to the time of the decree, the suit is only between the parties, and the plaintiff is dominus litis, or master of his own case, and may dismiss or compromise it, or make any other disposition of it which he sees fit.

And it is said in La Tourette v. Fletcher (1895) 6 App. D. C. 324, that it is generally held that a creditors' bill is subject to the control of the complainants therein, and may be discontinued by them at any time, upon satisfaction of their demand, before a decretal order has been made in the proceeding.

It was held in Schlagenhauf v. Cra-ven (1901) 61 N. J. Eq. 232, 47 Atl. 804, that if an open creditors' bill is filed by one creditor having a judgment, and the defendants, before any other creditor enters judgment or becomes a party to the suit, satisfies the complainant's claim and costs, and gives notice of motion to dismiss the bill, they are entitled to dismiss, although, after the giving of such notice, other creditors may have entered judgment, and been admitted as complainants.

The remark in Sterndale v. Hankinson (1827) 1 Sim. 393, 57 Eng. Reprint, 625, 27 Revised Rep. 210, that on the filing of a creditors' bill every creditor has an inchoate right in the suit, is explained in Woodgate v. Field (1842) 2 Hare, 211, 67 Eng. Reprint, 88, 11 L. J. Ch. N. S. 321, 6 Jur. 871, to mean simply that a right then commences which may fail, but which may also be perfected by decree. That, after an order or decree affecting the rights of the other creditors, they are regarded as in some sense, at least, parties to the suit, see III. a, infra.

The mere filing of a petition asking to be admitted as a party to the suit does not make the petitioner a party, and put it beyond the power of the original plaintiff to dismiss the suit; to have this effect an order of the court is necessary unless by acquiescence in permitting the petition to be filed without objection and the cause subsequently to proceed as if the petitioner had been duly admitted a party, without an order to this effect, the complainant loses his right to dismiss at a subsequent time. Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. v. Maury (1881) 75 Va. 508. The court intimated that by such acquiescence the right to dismiss might be lost, but stated that the mere filing of the petition did not operate proprio vigore to make the petitioners parties.

However, the right of a creditor of an insolvent debtor to dismiss his suit even before summons had been served or bill filed, against the will of the other creditors, was denied in Honedale Shoe Co. v. Montgomery (1904) 56 W. Va. 397, 49 S. E. 434, it being held that a suit by a single creditor of an insolvent debtor, whether in his own name only or for himself and other creditors, was, from the date of the summons, which brought the suit into being, a suit for all the creditors, under a statute expressly providing that every such suit should be deemed to be brought in behalf of the plaintiff and all other creditors of the insolvent debtor. And it was held that if a creditor, after bringing such a suit, but before service of summons or filing of a bill, settled his own claim and dismissed the suit, other creditors at the next term of court could have it reinstated, if the dismissal was at rules, the Code giving the court power at the next term to reinstate a cause dismissed in the preceding vacation. The court said: "From the start it was a general creditors' suit. . . . Our cases show that when a suit bears that character it is for the benefit of all creditors, and not under the unlimited control of the nominal plaintiff, properly so called. Whether brought by a plaintiff in his own name only or for himself and other creditors, when a reference is made to convene creditors, it is then surely a suit for the benefit of all, because the reference is for all, and gives the character of the creditors' suit. . . . Without statute the reference makes the suit a general creditors' suit, but the statute in this case makes it such ab initio. . . . Being a creditors' suit, the nominal plaintiff cannot dismiss it at will, to the prejudice of other creditors, as it is their suit no less than his. He can dismiss it as to himself, but others can become plaintiffs by order of the court. . . . To give the nominal plaintiff absolute right of dismissal would . . . allow the defendant debtor to collude with the nominal plaintiff in controlling the litigation, and in this manner often greatly delay, hinder, and defraud other lien creditors. . . . One creditor, as in this case, brings a suit, and, after it is too late for others to sue, wants to dismiss it. Can it be that he can thus end it, and destroy other creditors, in the face of a statute which plainly intends that one suit shall go for the relief of all, and thus avoid multiplicity of suits, with consequent costs? That would be a misapplication of the statute; would defeat its object and remedial utility."

III. After order or decree.

a. In general.

After an order or decree affecting the rights of the other interested parties for whom the suit is brought, it is well settled that the complainant cannot, as matter of right, dismiss the suit. While in some cases the rule is stated simply that the complainant cannot dismiss after a decree, it appears well established that an interlocutory decree or order, such as the granting of an injunction, appointment of a receiver, order of reference, etc., may have the effect of enabling the other interested persons to prevent an absolute dismissal of the suit by the complainant, although, of course, the court may permit the latter to withdraw from the suit, and one of the other persons in whose behalf the suit has been brought to be substituted in his place. The following cases, which, for the most part, involve merely interlocutory decrees or orders, support the rule that after a decree or order in a suit brought by one of a class, on behalf of himself and others similarly situated, the complainant cannot, as matter of right, dismiss the suit, over the objection of the other interested persons for whose benefit also the suit has been brought, even though they have not become parties of record.

It will be observed that some of the statements in the reported case (BERNHEIM v. WALLACE, ante, 938) do not appear to be in harmony with the above rule. For instance, it is said in that case that the plaintiff, who was suing for himself and other minority stockholders, might have dismissed the action without prejudice at any time while it was pending on appeal, before the opinion was handed down by the appellate court, and that it would necessarily follow that the dismissal would carry with it the dismissal of the action as to the entire class for whose benefit he sued. But this statement appears unnecessary to the decision, which appears to be based on the fact that the agreed judgment, which it was sought to have entered upon the dismissal, as fully protected the rights of the other stockholders as the judgment rendered by the court. This case illustrates the point, suggested in the statement of the rule, that while the plaintiff, suing for himself and others similarly situated, cannot, as matter of right, dismiss the suit after judgment, he may be permitted to do so where it is clear, as it was in the BERNHEIM CASE, that the rights of other interested parties are fully protected.

It was said in Handford v. Storie (Eng.) supra, that a plaintiff who sues on behalf of himself and all other persons of the same class, since he acts upon his own motion and at his own expense, retains the absolute dominion of the suit until the decree, and may dismiss the bill at his pleasure; but that after a decree he cannot by his conduct deprive other persons of the same class of the benefit of the decree, if they think fit to prosecute it; and that the reason for the distinction is that, before the decree, no other person of the class is bound to rely upon the diligence of him who first instituted the suit, but may file a bill of his own; whereas, after a decree, a second suit is not permissible. To a similar effect is Brinkerhoff v. Bostwick (1885) 99 N. Y. 185, 1 N. E. 663.

The clear implication of such cases as Mattison v. Demarest (1863) 1 Robt. (N. Y.) 717, 19 Abb. Pr. 356, appears to be that after judgment or decree the complainant who sues on behalf of himself and others similarly situated cannot discontinue the suit against the objection of the other creditors, it being said that the reason for the rule that before decree the complainant may dismiss the suit is that each creditor whose execution has been returned unsatisfied may file his bill; but that the moment a decree is entered in the suit, the rights of the other creditors attach to it, and the proceedings in all the other suits are or may be stayed.

It was said of a creditors' bill in Johnson v. Hammersley (1857) 24 Beav. 498, 53 Eng. Reprint, 450, that, after a decree, all creditors are as plaintiffs.

Also in Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. v. Maury (1881) 75 Va. 508, it was said that the sole dominion of the suit by the original plaintiff ceases as soon as the creditors become parties; and that they become parties in a general sense as soon as a decree or order for a general account is entered under which they may come in and prove their demands.

And in Simmons v. Lyles (1876) 27 Gratt. (Va.) 922, the court said that after a decree for a general account, even at the suit of a single creditor, all the other creditors may come in under the decree and prove their debts before the master to whom the cause is referred, and obtain satisfaction of their demands; and that, under such circumstances, they are all treated as parties to the suit.

All persons interested in a decree entered in a cause in chancery have a right to insist upon its execution; the decree is a decree of the other interested persons as well as of the parties to the suit. Updike v. Doyle (1863) 7 R. I. 446.

It was said in Maxwell v. Northern Trust Co. (1897) 70 Minn. 334, 73 N. W. 173, that a creditors' suit is no more that of the creditor who instituted it than of any other creditor who appears and files his claim; and that it does not give the former any exclusive management, except so far as it may thereafter be necessary that one creditor shall, to some extent, be a sort of leader or general manager for all the creditors; also that the court may, in its discretion, at any time take from the creditor who filed the complaint such general management as may thereafter be necessary, and give it to some other creditor.

The language of the court in Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank (1839) 23 Pick. (Mass.) 480, is broad enough to deny the right of a creditor suing on behalf of himself and other creditors to dismiss the suit at any stage of the proceedings, it being said that the plaintiffs, having instituted the proceeding as a statutory remedy for themselves and others, continued for the benefit of all parties concerned, and had no more power to discontinue the suit than a petitioning creditor to discontinue proceedings under a bankruptcy commission. But in this case an interlocutory injunction had been granted. The statement in this case is referred to with approval in Belmont Nail Co. v. Columbia Iron & Steel Co. (1891) 46 Fed. 336; but in this case a receiver had been appointed, and the petition of another creditor to become a party was pending at the time of the attempt to dismiss the suit.

A creditor suing on behalf of himself and such other creditors as may become parties to the proceeding is not entitled, as matter of right, to discontinue the suit after procuring an injunction and the appointment of a receiver, and after other creditors have filed claims. Deane v. Kent Circuit Judge (1909) 155 Mich. 644, 119 N. W. 1093.

After an order of reference, the plaintiff in a creditors' suit ceases to have the absolute control of it, and it cannot be dismissed by him without the consent of the other creditors. Billmyer v. Sherman (1884) 33 W. Va. 656; Lewis v. Laidley (1894) 39 W. Va. 422, 19 S. E. 378. These cases hold that after creditors have filed their claims in such a suit, the nominal plaintiff, on satisfaction of his claim, may have the suit dismissed as to himself, but such other creditors have the right to continue it for their own benefit and at their own expense. A statute is cited providing that one filing a claim in such a suit should be deemed a party plaintiff.

A suit to enforce liens, under statute, by one judgment creditor suing for himself and other lienors, will not be suspended by payment of the plaintiff after an order of reference; but it may and will proceed in the name of the plaintiff, unless an order is made substituting another person as plaintiff. Shumate v. Crockett (1897) 43 W. Va. 491, 27 S. E. 240.

After an account of debts is ordered and taken in a suit brought by a creditor suing on his own behalf only, it was held in Catron v. Bostic (1918) 123 Va. 355, 96 S. E. 845, that the suit, upon the entry of the order, becomes one for general creditors, and the complainant loses dominion over it, even if it was his individual suit before that time.

And the rule that when a general account is ordered in a creditors' suit, the suit is for the benefit of all the creditors, and thereupon ceases to be under the control of the party who instituted it, is approved in Karn v. Rorer Iron Co. (1890) 86 Va. 754, 11 S. E. 481.

It was held in Fay v. Erie & K. R. Bank (1886) Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 194, that a creditor of a corporation who had begun proceedings under statute against it, and obtained an injunction and the appointment of a receiver, cannot, as a matter of right, upon being paid his particular claim, obtain dissolution of the injunction, the dismissal of the bill, and discharge of the receiver, without any right or duty on the part of the court to protect other creditors who may have filed their claims with the complainant, or to protect and save harmless the receiver.

And it was held in Johnson v. Miller (1899) 37 C. C. A. 471, 96 Fed. 271, that after the court had assumed charge of the affairs of a corporation, upon a bill by a creditor in behalf of himself and all other creditors and stockholders, and had appointed a receiver, issued an injunction to restrain the creditors from pursuing other remedies, and required them to prove their claims, the parties to the record cannot terminate the suit by agreement without the consent of the other creditors; and that an application to dismiss under such circumstances is addressed to the discretion of the court, which will take the interest of the other creditors into consideration.

The view that, even under such circumstances, the court has the power, upon proper cause being shown, and upon being satisfied that the interests of all parties, including creditors, would be advanced by the dismissal of the bill, to permit the dismissal, even against the objection of one or more of the creditors, but that the matter rests in its discretion, is supported by Fay v. Erie & K. R. Bank (Mich.) supra, and Belmont Nail Co. v. Columbia Iron & Steel Co. (1891) 46 Fed. 336.

Where, after decree for an account in a suit for the administration of an estate of a testator, brought by a legatee, it appeared that the assets were insufficient even for payment of debts, and an order was obtained by consent that the bill should be dismissed, it was held in O'Donnell v. Young (1835) 5 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 30, that at the instance of a creditor who was prejudiced by the decree of dismissal, it might be set aside and such creditor be given the conduct of the suit.

The doctrine that after an interlocutory decree establishing rights of legatees, one of whom has filed a bill to establish the will, the complainant cannot, on satisfaction of his demand, dismiss the suit to the prejudice of the other legatees whose rights have been established by the decree, is supported by the case of Collins v. Taylor (1842) 4 N. J. Eq. 163. But in this case the other legatees were parties defendants. The court held that they were entitled to the benefit of the interlocutory decree, and to file a supplemental bill to obtain its benefit, without prejudice from the order of dismissal, which should be set aside. But it was held that they could not proceed in the name of the complainant, and that the further proceedings must be at their own expense, without any liability on the part of the complainant therefor.

Where a suit was brought by an abutting landowner for himself and others similarly situated, to restrain a street railway company from accepting a franchise, and, after an injunction pendente lite was granted, the plaintiff moved to dismiss the suit under circumstances calculated to arouse the suspicion of the court that he acted in collusion with the defendant, it was held in State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Ludwig (1900) 106 Wis. 227, 82 N. W. 158, that mandamus would not lie to compel the court to dismiss the action and to vacate an order substituting another abutting landowner as plaintiff.

But that a minority stockholder suing the corporation in his own right and on behalf of the other minority stockholders may be entitled, even after the rights of the stockholders have been determined in the court of appeals, to the entry of an order of dismissal and an agreed judgment, if the rights of those thus represented by the complainant are as fully protected by the proposed settlement as they would be otherwise if the matter remained under the control of the court and its judgment were executed, see the reported case (BERNHEIM v. WALLACE, ante, 988).

In Beadleston v. Alley (1889) 55 Hun, 605, 28 N. Y. S. R. 89, 7 N. Y. Supp. 747, a stockholder suing on behalf of herself and other stockholders was held entitled to dismiss a suit after an interlocutory decree was directed, but before it was entered. The court said there had been no judgment, and that all that could be said was that there might have been a judgment if plaintiff had chosen to enter it; but that the plaintiff owed no duty to anyone to enter the judgment. The court said also that it by no means conceded that this judgment was such a judgment as would have terminated the plaintiff's control over the action, and it was inclined to think it was not such a judgment; but that it held simply that until the judgment was entered, there was no ground for the contention that the plaintiff's control was terminated.

IV. Miscellaneous.

In Merchants' Nat. Bank v. United States (1914) 130 C. C. A. 548, 214 Fed. 200, it was held that a creditor who brings an action under the Act of Congress of 1905, authorizing one who has supplied with labor and material a contractor with the United States, in case the latter does not bring suit within six months from the completion of the contract, to sue in the name of the United States on the contractor's bond, but providing that only one such action shall be brought, and that any creditor may file his claim in the action and be made a party thereto within a year after the completion of the work, will not be permitted to settle his claim and dismiss the action to the prejudice of other creditors; but that discontinuance would be sanctioned only if it appeared that no intervener stood ready to prosecute the action.

And it was held in Heidrich v. Silva (1890) 89 Ky. 422, 12 S. W. 770, that an action brought by a creditor inured to the benefit of all the other creditors, and he could not, by dismissal of his petition after other creditors had filed claims, destroy this right. In this case the court referred to a statute expressly declaring that a creditor, by proving his claim before the master, becomes a party to the action.

And on order of dismissal, it was held in Schoniger v. Logan (1918) 40 S. D. 30, 166 N. W. 226, should be vacated, where it was obtained after service on the plaintiff's attorney of a notice of motion for leave to intervene and petition of intervention, even though the dismissal was in good faith and did not prejudice the cause of action as disclosed by such petition. It was said that the fact that the attorney who moved the dismissal and obtained the order did not advise the court of the service of the notice and petition in intervention amounted to a concealment from the court of a fact which necessarily would have controlled its action, and that the good faith of counsel was immaterial, since the court would not have dismissed the action had it been advised of the pendency of the intervention proceedings; also, that the right to litigate in a pending action a claim for affirmative relief set up in a complaint of intervention was conferred by statute, and that a judgment of dismissal which deprived the intervener of that right was prejudicial, even though it was not an adjudication of the matters alleged in the complaint.

It was said in Com. use of Beckingham v. Magee (1909) 224 Pa. 166, 73 Atl. 346, that since, under statute, only one action was permitted, which was for the use of all parties interested, it followed that ordinarily the use plaintiff in an action on an administrator's bond could not discontinue the action. But it was held that where the action was prematurely brought, the plaintiff should be permitted to correct the error by discontinuing it and beginning de novo.

Where a statute provided a penalty in case of the fraudulent transfer of shares of stock for the purpose of avoiding taxation, to be recovered by the treasurer of the city or town in which the shareholder resided, one half of the sum recovered being for the use of the town and the other half for the use of the person furnishing the necessary evidence, it was held that a city treasurer who began such a suit could dismiss it before judgment, over the objection of the person furnishing the evidence. Wheeler v. Goulding (1859) 13 Gray (Mass.) 539.

Generally, as to the right of a creditor to control a suit brought for himself and other creditors, see also Bookleff v. Crummack (1837) 1 Cooper, Fr. Cas. 125, 47 Eng. Reprint, 430, holding that the fact that, until the interlocutory decree, a creditors' suit was controlled by the defendant's solicitor, with the view of obtaining an injunction against a creditor proceeding in law, was not a sufficient ground for depriving the original plaintiff of the conduct of the suit; and Smith v. Guy (1846) 2 Phill. Ch. 159, 41 Eng. Reprint, 902, holding that the fact that there was an irregularity in the interlocutory decree was not a sufficient ground for depriving the original plaintiff of the conduct of a creditors' suit.

OLIVER CASTLE, Respt.,
v.
SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

The provision of the act of Congress authorizing the President of the United States to take possession of the railroads as a war measure, which declared that carriers shall be subject to all liabilities of common carriers except in so far as inconsistent with any order of the President, justifies the order of the Director General, as sanctioned by that of the President, requiring all actions for injuries to passengers to be brought against the Director General, and not against the carrier.

(Watts and Gage, JJ., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for York County (Moore, J.) refusing to set aside the service of the summons and complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McDonald & McDonald, for appellant:

The orders of the Director General of Railroads, made in pursuance of the act of Congress and the proclamations of the President, have the full force and effect of law, and are of the same binding force and effect as an act of Congress.

Muir v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 247 Fed. 888; Cocker v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 253 Fed. 676; Harnick v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 254 Fed. 748; Rutherford v. Union P. R. Co. 254 Fed. 880.

Mr. S. R. Prince also for appellant.
Mr. Thomas F. McDow, for respondent:

P. W. Patrick, who was admittedly the agent and selling tickets and attending to freight business at the Southern Railway station, was the proper party upon whom to make the service.

Benjamin Moore & Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 106 Misc. 58, 174 N. Y. Supp. 60.

Gary, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order refusing to set aside the service of the summons and complaint.

The defendant gave notice of a motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, on the grounds that the said corporation is not liable to be sued in this action, and that the alleged agent upon whom the service was made is not an agent of the defendant, but was an agent of the United States government at the time of the alleged service.

His Honor, the circuit judge, ruled that the plaintiff had the right to bring his action, under § 10 of the act entitled, "An Act to Provide for the Operation of Transportation Systems While under Federal Control, for the Just Compensation of Their Owners, and for Other Purposes," approved the 21st of March, 1918 (chapter 25, 40 Stat. at L. 456, Comp. Stat. § 3115½, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757); and that the President of the United States did not have the power to delegate any of the powers, with reference to actions at law and suits in equity, to the Director General of Railroads.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was injured, through the negligence of the defendant, while riding on its line as a passenger from Washington, District of Columbia, to Salisbury, North Carolina, near Lynchburg, in the state of Virginia. The appeal assigns error in the said rulings.

On the 29th of August, 1916, Congress enacted a statute entitled, "An Act Making Appropriations for the Support of the Army, for the Fiscal Year Ending June Thirtieth, Nineteen Hundred and Seventeen." Chapter 418, 39 Stat. at L. 619. Section 1 thereof (Comp. Stat. § 1974a) is as follows: "The President, in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable. . . ."

This statute not only empowered the President of the United States to take possession and control of the systems of transportation for the transfer of troops and war material, but also for such other purposes, connected with the emergency, as might be necessary, in the exercise of his discretion. War was afterwards declared; and the powers thus conferred upon the President fully authorized him to issue his proclamation, on the 26th of December, 1917, which, among other provisions, contains the following:

"It is hereby directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of such transportation systems hereby by me undertaken shall be exercised by and through William G. McAdoo, who is hereby appointed and designated Director General of Railroads. Said Director may perform the duties imposed upon him, so long and to such extent as he shall determine, through the boards of directors, receivers, officers, and employees of said systems of transportation. Until and except so far as said Director shall from time to time by general or special orders otherwise provide, the boards of directors, receivers, officers, and employees of the various transportation systems shall continue the operation thereof in the usual and ordinary course of the business of common carriers, in the names of their respective companies.

"Until and except so far as said Director shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine, such systems of transportation shall remain subject to all existing statutes and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to all statutes and orders of regulating commissions of the various states in which said systems or any part thereof may be situated. But any orders, general or special, hereafter made by said Director, shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such. . . .

"Except with the prior written assent of said Director, no attachment by mesne process or on execution shall be levied on or against any of the property used by any of said transportation systems in the conduct of their business as common carriers; but suits may be brought by and against said carriers and judgments rendered as hitherto until and except so far as said Director may, by general or special orders, otherwise determine." 40 Stat. at L. 1784, Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note.

When Congress passed the act approved the 29th of August, 1916, it knew that, if war was declared, the President would have a tremendous responsibility upon his shoulders and very many delicate duties to perform, which in large measure necessarily would have to be intrusted to other officials. It also knew that it would be necessary to resort to extraordinary methods during the emergency. The President's proclamation on the 26th of December, 1917, embodied his policy in regard to the control and operation of the systems of transportation at that time, as shown by the words which we have italicized. But realizing that it might become necessary to change that policy, he expressly ordered that it should only remain of force "until and except so far as said Director shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine."

This was the situation on the 21st of March, 1918, when Congress passed the act hereinbefore mentioned, of which §§ 8 and 9 (Comp. Stat. §§ 3115½h, 3115½i) are as follows:

"Sec. 8. That the President may execute any of the powers herein and heretofore granted him with relation to Federal control, through such agencies as he may determine.

"Sec. 9. That the provisions of the act entitled 'An Act Making Appropriations for the Support of the Army for the Fiscal Year Ending June Thirtieth, Nineteen Hundred and Seventeen, and for Other Purposes,' approved August twenty-ninth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, shall remain in force and effect except as expressly modified and restricted by this act; and the President, in addition to the powers conferred by this act, shall have and is hereby given such other and further powers necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers herein and heretofore conferred."

Congress knew, as we have already stated, the manner in which the provisions of the Act of 1916 had been construed by the President; therefore the only reasonable inference is that it was the intention, not only to approve the policy which he had temporarily adopted, as indicated by his proclamation, but to use such agencies as he might determine, and that he should have such additional powers as might be necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers therein or theretofore conferred.

"Sec. 10. That carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities, as com- mon carriers, whether arising under state or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control or with any order of the President. Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal government. Nor shall any such carrier be entitled to have transferred to a Federal court any action heretofore or hereafter instituted by or against it, which action was not so transferable prior to the Federal control of such carrier; and any action which has heretofore been so transferred because of such Federal control or of any act of Congress or official order or proclamation relating thereto shall upon motion of either party be transferred to the court in which it was originally instituted. But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control." Comp. Stat. § 3115½j.

If the words, "actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law," stood alone, it might well be contended that Congress intended to adopt a permanent policy, different from that outlined by the President in his proclamation. It, however, qualified such right, and made it conform to the policy of the President, by the insertion of the words which we have italicized in that section, and thereby gave it the force and effect only of a temporary expedient until a further order of the President.

"Sec. 16. That this act is expressly declared to be emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of war; and nothing herein is to be construed as expressing or prejudicing the future policy of the Federal government concerning the ownership, control, or regulation of carriers or the methods or basis of the capitalization thereof." Comp. Stat. § 3115 $\frac{1}{2}$ p.

The words which we have italicized show why Congress intrusted the exercise of so much power to the discretion of the President, and the agencies selected by him.

On the 29th of March, the President issued another proclamation, which, omitting the preamble, provides:

"Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, under and by virtue of the powers and authority so vested in me by said act and of all other powers me hereto enabling, do hereby authorize the said William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads as aforesaid, either personally or through such divisions, agencies, or persons as he may appoint, and in his own name or in the name of such divisions, agencies, or persons, or in the name of the President . . . to make any and all contracts, agreements, or obligations necessary or expedient and to issue any and all orders which may in any way be found necessary and expedient in connection with the Federal control of systems of transportation, railroads, and inland waterways as fully in all respects as the President is authorized to do, and generally to do and perform all and singular all acts and things and to exercise all and singular the powers and duties which in and by the said act, or any other act in relation to the subject hereof, the President is authorized to do and perform." 40 Stat. at L. 1764, Comp. Stat. § 3115 $\frac{1}{2}$ h, note.

"Except with the prior written assent of said Director, no attachment by mesne process or on execution shall be levied on or against any of the property used by any of said transportation systems in the conduct of their business as common carriers; but suits may be brought by and against said carriers and judgments rendered as hitherto until and except so far as said Di- rector may, by general or special orders, otherwise determine." Proclamation of December 26, 1917 (40 Stat. at L. 1735, Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note).

On the 11th of April, 1918, the President made another proclamation, which, after the preamble, contains the following provisions:

"It is hereby directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of such transportation systems, hereby by me undertaken, shall be exercised by and through William G. McAdoo, who has been duly appointed and designated Director General of Railroads. Said Director may perform the duties imposed upon him, so long and to such extent as he shall determine, through the boards of directors, officers, and employees of said systems of transportation. Until and except so far as said Director General shall from time to time by general or special orders otherwise provide, the boards of directors, officers, and employees of said transportation systems shall continue the operation thereof in the usual and ordinary course of the business of common carriers in the names of their respective companies.

"Until and except so far as said Director General shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine, such systems of transportation shall remain subject to all existing statutes of the United States and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to all statutes and orders of regulating commissions of the various states in which said systems or any part thereof may be situated. But any orders, general or special, hereafter made by said Director General, shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such." 40 Stat. at L. 1770, Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note.

These proclamations were issued after the Act of March 21, 1918, was approved. The words which we have italicized clearly show that the provision therein, as to actions at law and suits in equity against the carriers, was construed by the President to be temporary in its effect and subject to change by order of the Director General, whenever he deemed it advisable to inaugurate a different policy.

General Order No. 8, § 5, provides that "the government now being in control of the railroads, the officers and employees of the various companies no longer serve a private interest. All now serve the government and the public interest only."

General Order No. 50, made on the 28th of October, 1918, by William G. McAdoo as Director General, is as follows:

"Whereas by the proclamations dated December 26, 1917, and April 11, 1918, the President took possession and assumed control of systems of transportation and the appurtenances thereof and appointed the undersigned, William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, and provided in and by said proclamations that 'until and except so far as said Director shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine, such systems of transportation shall remain subject to all existing statutes and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and to all statutes . . . but any orders, general or special, hereafter made by said Director, shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such;' and

"Whereas the act of Congress, called the Federal Control Act, approved March 21, 1918, § 10 (Comp. Stat. § 3115½j), provided that 'carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control or with any order of the President;' and

"Whereas since the Director General assumed control of said systems of transportation, suits are being brought and judgments and decrees rendered against carrier corporations on matters based on causes of action arising during Federal control for which the said carrier corporations are not responsible, and it is right and proper that the actions, suits, and proceedings hereinafter referred to, based on causes of action arising during or out of Federal control, should be brought directly against the said Director General of Railroads and not against said corporations:

"It is therefore ordered, that actions at law, suits in equity, and proceedings in admiralty hereafter brought in any court based on contract, binding upon the Director General of Railroads, claim for death or injury to person, or for loss and damage to property, arising since December 31, 1917, and growing out of the possession, use, control, or operation of any railroad or system of transportation by the Director General of Railroads, which action, suit, or proceeding but for Federal control might have been brought against the carrier company, shall be brought against the Director General of Railroads, and not otherwise; provided, however, that this order shall not apply to actions, suits, or proceedings for the recovery of fines, penalties, and forfeitures.

"Subject to the provisions of General Orders numbered 18, 18A, and 26 heretofore issued by the Director General of Railroads, service of process in any such action, suit, or proceeding may be made upon operating officials operating for the Director General of Railroads, the railroad or other carrier in respect of which the cause of action arises in the same way as service was heretofore made upon like operating officials for such railroad or other carrier company.

"The pleadings in all such actions at law, suits in equity, or proceedings in admiralty, now pending against any carrier company for a cause of action arising since December 31, 1917, based upon a cause of action arising from or out of the operation of any railroad or other carrier, may on application be amended by substituting the Director General of Railroads for the carrier company as party defendant and dismissing the company therefrom.

"The undersigned Director General of Railroads is acting herein by authority of the President for and on behalf of the United States of America, therefore no supersedeas bond or other security shall be required of the Director General of Railroads in any court for the taking of or in connection with an appeal, writ of error, supersedeas, or other process in law, equity, or in admiralty, as a condition precedent to the prosecution of any such appeal, writ of error, supersedeas, or other process, or otherwise in respect of any such cause of action or proceeding."

General Order No. 50A, which is in all material respects similar to General Order No. 50, was issued on the 11th of January, 1919, by Walker D. Hines, Director General.

Our conclusion that William G. McAdoo, Director General, and Walker D. Hines, Director General, were vested with full power to make General Orders No. 50 and No. 50 A, <sup>Carrier—action against Director General.</sup> is sustained by the recent decision rendered by the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 250 U. S. 135, 63 L. ed. 897, P.U.R.1919D, 705, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502.

DETROIT, GRAND HAVEN, & MILWAUKEE RAILWAY COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.

Railroads — relation to Director General.

1. The relations between the railroad and the government, after the roads had been placed under the control of the Director General, were either technically those of landlord and tenant or analogous thereto.

[See note on this question beginning on page 969.]

— lease — liability for acts of lessee.

2. A railroad company which has leased its property to another is not liable for the negligent acts of such other.

[See 22 R. C. L. 1083.]

Pleading — affirmative defense — absence of negligence.

3. The defense in an action against a railroad company for negligently setting fire to property along its right of way, that it committed no negligent acts, but the acts which caused the injury were those of the agents of the Director General of Railroads, is not an affirmative one.

Evidence — judicial notice — acts of Congress.

4. The courts of a state take judicial notice of the acts of Congress and the proclamations of the President.

[See 15 R. C. L. 1064.]

Appeal — substitution of Director General for railroad.

5. An action against a railroad company to recover damages for injury by fire to property adjoining its right of way after the road had gone into the possession of the Director General of Railroads may be amended on appeal, after the suggestion of the counsel for the railroad company and the Director General that such amendment be made at the trial had been refused, so as to substitute the Director General for the railroad company as defendant.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shiawassee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injury to their property by fire alleged to have been negligently set out by defendant. Affirmed as amended.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Harrison Geer and W. K. Williams, for plaintiff in error:

The possession and control of the railroads taken under the acts of Congress and by proclamation of the President were complete and for all purposes. The authority so to do arose under the undivided character of the war power of the United States.

Northern P. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 250 U. S. 135, 63 L. ed. 897, P.U.R. 1919D, 705, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502; Rutherford v. Union P. R. Co. 254 Fed. 880.

Had the defendant leased its railroad to the Federal government, it would not, under the law of this state, have been liable to respond in damages for the torts of the lessee.

Ackerman v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 143 Mich. 58, 114 Am. St. Rep. 640, 106 N. W. 558, 8 Ann. Cas. 118.

The word "carriers," as used in the act of Congress, means nothing more or less than the Director General.

Rutherford v. Union P. R. Co. 254 Fed. 880; United States v. Nixon, 235 U. S. 231, 59 L. ed. 207, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 49; Schumacher v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 106 Misc. 564, 175 N. Y. Supp. 84.

The plea of the defendant was the general issue, which, under the practice as previously existing, was certainly broad enough to admit of the defense proffered.

Ackerman v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 143 Mich. 58, 114 Am. St. Rep. 640, 106 N. W. 558, 8 Ann. Cas. 118.

Persons must, in contemplation of law, have knowledge of the acts of Congress and proclamations of the President, and courts and officers thereof will take judicial notice of the fact that defendant was taken over by the United States Railroad Administration.

Jenkins v. Collard, 145 U. S. 546, 36

L. ed. 812, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 868; McMorrin Mill. Co. v. C. H. Little Co. 201 Mich. 301, 167 N. W. 990.

Messrs. Miner & Miner for defendants in error.

Fellows, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the Act of August 29, 1916, entitled "An Act Making Appropriations for the Support of the Army for the Fiscal Year Ending June Thirtieth, Nineteen Hundred and Seventeen, and for Other Purposes," the Congress of the United States, among other things, enacted (39 Stat. at L. p. 645, chap. 418, Comp. Stat. § 1974a, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1095): "The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable."

On December 26, 1917, this country was at war with Germany and with Austria. On that date the President issued a proclamation (40 Stat. at L. 1734, Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note). It is not necessary to quote it in full; but in it the President did "take possession and assume control at 12 o'clock noon on the 28th day of December, 1917, of each and every system of transportation and the appurtenances thereof located wholly or in part within the boundaries of the continental United States and consisting of railroads, and owned or controlled systems of coastwise and inland transportation, engaged in general transportation, whether operated by steam or by electric power. . . ."

And by the proclamation the President directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of such transportation systems should be exercised by and through William G. McAdoo, therein appointed and designated as "Director General of Railroads;" and such Director General of Railroads was authorized to control and operate such systems through the officers and employees thereof.

On March 21, 1918, the Congress, by an act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Operation of Transportation Systems While under Federal Control, for the Just Compensation of Their Owners, and for Other Purposes" (40 Stat. at L. 451 et seq., chap. 25, Comp Stat. §§ 3115½a-3115½p, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757), after reciting that the President had in time of war taken possession, use, control, and operation of the transportation systems, made quite comprehensive provisions with reference to such Federal control. So far as important here, the act provided for the execution of agreements for compensation to the owners while under Federal control, provided for control and compensation in the absence of agreements, declared the money and property derived from operating the systems to be the property of the United States, appropriated the sum of $500,000,000 for a revolving fund for the purpose of paying the expenses of Federal control. Among the provisions in § 10 of the act (§ 3115½j) is the following: "Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal government. . . . But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control."

Considering the Federal control over the transportation systems of the country, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through the Chief Justice in the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 250 U. S. 135, 63 L. ed. 897, P.U.R. 1919D, 705, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, said: "No elaboration could make clearer than do the Act of Congress of 1916, the proclamation of the President exerting the powers given, and the Act of 1918, dealing with the situation created by the exercise of such authority, that no divided but a complete possession and control were given the United States for all purposes as to the railroads in question. But if it be conceded that, despite the absolute clarity of the provisions concerning the control given the United States, and the all-embracing scope of that control, there is room for some doubt, the consideration of the general context completely dispels hesitancy. How can any other conclusion be reached if consideration be given the comprehensive provisions concerning the administration by the United States of the property which it was authorized to take, the financial obligations under which it came, and all the other duties and exactions which the act imposed, contemplating one control, one administration, one power for the accomplishment of the one purpose, the complete possession by governmental authority to replace for the period provided the private ownership theretofore existing?"

On October 28, 1918, the then Director General of Railroads promulgated what is known as "General Order No. 50." In it we find the following:

"It is therefore ordered, that actions at law, suits in equity, and proceedings in admiralty hereafter brought in any court, based on contracts binding upon the Director General of Railroads, claim for death or injury to person, or for loss and damage to property arising since December 31, 1917, and growing out of the possession, use, control or operation of any railroad or system of transportation by the Director General of Railroads, which action, suit, or proceeding, but for Federal control, might have been brought against the carrier company, shall be brought against William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, and not otherwise. . . .

"The pleadings in all such actions at law, suits in equity, or proceedings in admiralty, now pending against any carrier company for a cause of action arising since December 31, 1917, based upon a cause of action arising from or out of the operation of any railroad or other carrier, may on application be amended by substituting the Director General of Railroads for the carrier company as party defendant and dismissing the company therefrom."

The plaintiffs own land adjoining the right of way of the Detroit, Grand Haven, & Milwaukee Railway Company. Upon this land they had a considerable number of fruit trees. On March 22, 1918, and while said railroad property was under Federal control, sparks from a passing locomotive set fire to the grass either on the right of way or on plaintiffs' land. The fire spread, killing a large number of fruit trees and damaging others. On June 1st, this action was commenced by declaration against the railway company to recover for such damages. To the declaration the defendant pleaded the general issue. At the opening of the trial counsel for the defendant offered that the proceedings might be amended by making the Director General of Railroads defendant, stating that he would not ask for a continuance if the amendment was made, but did object to proceeding further against the railway company, and insisted that the wrong defendant was named. By appropriate motions and requests the objection to a recovery against the railway company was properly raised. Considering the act itself, what is disclosed by this record, and what occurred at the argument, it substantially appears that the attorney who tried the case was the attorney for both the railway company and the Director General of Railroads. No claim is made that the service of the declaration was defective, or that it was not made on the proper agent of the Director General of Railroads. The objections made were overruled, and the case proceeded as instituted, resulting in a verdict and judgment against the railway company.

The arguments revolve around the construction and validity of the act of Congress. On the part of the plaintiff, it is urged that the term "such carriers," found in § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918, has reference to the corporation owning the railroad, while defendant's counsel insists that it has reference to the Director General of Railroads. The statute has been considered by several courts, and a comparison of the decisions and the various constructions urged as the proper one are of interest. Among the cases are Johnson v. McAdoo, (D. C.) 257 Fed. 757; Jensen v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (D. C.) 255 Fed. 795; Postal Teleg. & Cable Co. v. Call, — C. C. A. —, 255 Fed. 850; Bryant v. Pullman Co. 188 App. Div. 311, 177 N. Y. Supp. 488; McGregor v. Great Northern R. Co. — N. D. —, 4 A.L.R. 1635, 172 N. W. 841; Lavalle v. Northern P. R. Co. — Minn. —, 4 A.L.R. 1659, 172 N. W. 918; Gowan v. McAdoo, — Minn. —, 173 N. W. 440; Rutherford v. Union P. R. Co. (D. C.) 254 Fed. 880; Schumacher v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 106 Misc. 564, 175 N. Y. Supp. 84; Hatcher v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (D. C.) 258 Fed. 952; Mardis v. Hines (D. C.) 258 Fed. 945; Castle v. Southern R. Co. — S. C. — ante, 959, 99 S. E. 846; Vaughn v. State, — Ala. App. —, 81 So. 417;

Haubert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (D. C.) 259 Fed. 361. Other constructions than those suggested by counsel in the instant case have been suggested or may be indulged in. It is possible that Congress thought to preserve to persons having causes of action antedating government control the right to proceed against the corporation during government control, or to expressly preserve the right to proceed against the corporation for its own acts which occurred or accrued during government control, and at the same time preserve the railroad property from seizure or process. But in the disposition we propose to make of the case we find it unnecessary to devote time or space to a consideration or discussion of the legislative intent.

Whatever the holding elsewhere, it is the settled law of this jurisdiction that a railroad company which has leased its property to another is not liable for the negligent acts of such other; that the recovery should be had against the company by whose negligent acts the damage was done. Ackerman v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. 143 Mich. 58, 114 Am. St. Rep. 640, 106 N. W. 558, 8 Ann. Cas. 118. While this record does not disclose whether or not a lease was entered into between the company and the government, it is unimportant so far as the rights of the parties to this litigation are concerned. By the act of Congress compensation was to be paid by the government to the railroad company, whether a lease was executed or not.

The relations were either technically those of lessor and lessee or analogous thereto.

The defense of the railroad company that it had committed no negligent act resulting in damage to the plaintiff, that any negligent acts proven were the negligent acts of the Director General of Railroads, was not an affirmative defense under § 2 of circuit court rule 23, nor would such defense be likely to take the plaintiff by surprise. The courts of this state take judicial notice of the acts of Congress (McMorran Mill Co. v. C. H. Little Co. 201 Mich. 301, 167 N. W. 990) and of the proclamations of the President (Jenkins v. Collard, 145 U. S. 546, 36 L. ed. 812, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 868).

But the Director General of Railroads by General Order No. 50 has ordered that "actions at law . . . for loss and damage to property arising since December 31, 1917, . . . shall be brought against William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, and not otherwise," and by the same order has given his consent to amendments substituting the Director General for the company and dismissing the railroad company from the action. We do not determine the validity or the propriety of an administrative order directing the method of procedure in the courts of the various states. What we do determine is that the Director General of Railroads cannot be heard to complain if this court, under the broad power conferred upon it by the Statute of Amendments, permits such amendment here. It is not pointed out that any defense was or is available to the Director General of Railroads upon the merits that was not permitted in the trial court. Indeed, there appears to have been no defense made on the question of negligence; that the locomotive set the fire resulting in the destruction of some of plaintiffs' fruit trees appears not to have been disputed; the amount of such damage was in dispute. The case was tried by the attorney for the Director General of Railroads. When the trial began he suggested that the amendment be then made as provided by General Order No. 50, and stated that it might be made without a continuance. Section 12,478, Comp. Laws 1915, provides: "The court in which any action or proceeding shall be pending, shall have power to amend any process, pleading or proceeding in such action or proceeding, either in form or substance, for the furtherance of justice, on such terms as shall be just, at any time before judgment or decree rendered therein. The court at every stage of the action or proceeding shall disregard any error or defect in the proceedings, which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties."

An order will be here entered, substituting the Director General of Railroads for the railway company dismissing the case as to the railway company. Upon the entry of such order the judgment will be affirmed. The railway company will recover its costs to be taxed.

I. Introductory.

In the present annotation it is proposed to review the recent cases dealing with the Federal control of public utilities, including a discussion of the validity, construction, and effect of the acts of Congress, proclamations of the President, and orders of the Director General relating to that control, in so far as they have been considered in these cases. The earlier cases are collected in the annotation in 4 A.L.R. beginning at page 1680.

II. Validity of measures for Federal control.

a. Acts of Congress.

The only provision of the Act of March 21, 1918, whose validity has been discussed in recent cases is the clause of § 10, authorizing suits against carriers under Federal control. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Ault (1919) — Ark. —, 216 S. W. 3, the court, in sustaining that provision, said: "It may be contended that the statute in question is unconstitutional because, if the claim is reduced to a judgment and enforced against the property of the corporation, it would amount to a taking of private property without due process of law, from the corporation, to pay a liability incurred by the act of the Federal authorities operating the road. We do not understand that such would be the effect of the act. Immunity from loss, as well as assurance of a reasonable return upon the investment, was guaranteed the railroad corporations by the government. Act March 21, 1918, chap. 25, 40 Stat. at L. 451, Comp. Stat. § 3115½a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757. Under such a guaranty, the enforcement of judgments against the property of the railroad corporations during the control by Federal authorities could not have the effect of confiscating their property. Immunity from loss and assurance of gain are a complete answer to any contention that the enforcement of such judgment would be the taking of private property without due process of law, or the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation. We think the act constitutional."

In Fitzhugh v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1920) — N. H. —, 109 Atl. 562, an action in which the plaintiffs attempted to summon the Director as trustee, it was held that § 10 of the Federal Control Act did not authorize an action against the Director General, but the only authority for suing him was to be found in General Order No. 50.

Other recent decisions apparently proceed on the theory that the provision in question is invalid because imposing a liability for acts in which the carrier is not a free agent. See Hatcher v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1919) 258 Fed. 952, and Haubert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 361, stated at length infra, II. d, 3; and see generally the cases discussed in that subdivision.

The case of Schumacher v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1919) 106 Misc. 564, 175 N. Y. Supp. 84 (set out in full in the original annotation), was followed in McGrath v. Northern P. R. Co. (1920) — N. D. —, 177 N. W. 383. In that case action was instituted and prosecuted against the railroad company alone, and no motion or proceedings were had, either by the plaintiff or defendant, to substitute the Director General as party defendant under his General Order No. 50. Judgment was rendered against the railroad company in the lowest court, but on appeal this judgment was reversed, and the case dismissed. The court said: "The verdict is well sustained by the evidence except on one point, which is that the defendant had nothing to do with the conversion. It did not operate or control its railway at the time of the conversion. The road was then operated by the United States government, and not by the Northern Pacific Railway Company. That point, like Aaron's rod, swallows up all the other points. Pursuant to the act of Congress and the order of the President, in November, 1918, and during all that year, under a Director General, all the railroads of the country were controlled and operated by the government. It matters not whether the government control was rightful or wrongful, the facts are that it did have the actual control, and the Northern Pacific Railway Company had no control over its road, and nothing to do with its operation. It did not receive the cattle from the plaintiff or from any other person. It did not carry away or convert the cattle. It did the plaintiff no wrong. But the contention is that under an act of Congress the road became liable for the wrongs of the government and the Director General. Section 10 of the Federal Control Act (Comp. Stat. § 3115j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762) is as follows: 'That carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control or with any order of the President. Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal government.' Now, if the purpose of that section was to make the railway company liable for the wrongs or contract of the government in the control and operation of the railway, then the effect would be to deprive the company of its property without due process of law, and to take the property for public purposes without compensation, and of course that is contrary to the plain words of the Constitution." Referring to the Schumacher Case, the court said: "That is a well-considered case, and the reasoning of the court is entirely satisfactory, if not conclusive. We have not come to the pass when the government can make a corporation or an individual liable for the government's own wrongs or its own contracts. The decision concludes that the Federal Control Act of March, 1918, so far as it authorizes judgment against carrier corporations for the defaults or liabilities of the government, violates the Federal Constitution, providing against the taking of private property without due process of law."

In State ex rel. Smith v. Burleson (1919) — Ala. —, P.U.R.1919F, 1, 82 So. 458, in a per curiam opinion, the case of Dakota Cent. Teleph. Co. v. South Dakota (1919) 250 U. S. 163, 63 L. ed. 910, 4 A.L.R. 1623, P.U.R.1919D, 717, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507, was cited and followed. In a separate opinion, Anderson, Ch. J., expressing his individual views, said: "While this case is decided upon the authority cited, and which is conclusive upon this court, and an opinion by this court or any member thereof would be superfluous under ordinary circumstances, yet I feel impelled, under existing conditions, to give expression to my individual views, upon the questions involved in this appeal, and which are set forth in an opinion heretofore prepared by me upon an interlocutory order prior to the decision of this question by our highest court. A comparison of this opinion with the one in the North Dakota case, supra, will disclose the same general result and the identical treatment of the questions respectively discussed, except as to the right or authority under which these lines were taken over by the government. My opinion in effect concedes that they could have been taken over under the war emergency powers, but preferred justifying the same under the postal authority reserved to Congress by the Constitution. Our highest court did not hold that they could not have been so taken over, but preferred justifying the resolutions taking over the railroads and wires as a war emergency measure, and which was no doubt the most practical treatment of the question, as the railroad and wire cases were treated as companion cases, the railroad case being first decided, and as to which the postal clause of the Constitution did not apply, and the resolution with reference to railroads was not involved in my opinion."

So, in State v. Tri-State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1919) — Minn. —, 173 N. W. 856, wherein the state sought to enjoin two telephone companies from putting into effect the intrastate telephone rates fixed by the Postmaster General, a temporary injunction was granted, but on appeal the orders were reversed on authority of Dakota Cent. Teleph. Co. v. South Dakota (U. S.) supra, the court saying: The holding of the Supreme Court definitely determines that the Postmaster General acted under authority properly delegated to him by the President by virtue of the joint resolution; that the specific exception in the joint resolution of lawful police regulations did not prohibit the fixing of intrastate rates, the exercise of the police power in a narrower sense being intended; and that the Postmaster General, in his exercise, through the President, of the control of the telephone systems, could fix intrastate rates."

In State ex rel. Smith v. Burleson (1919) — Ala. —, P.U.R.1919F, 82 So. 458, the court affirmed a decree of the lower court dismissing a bill by the state seeking to enjoin the Postmaster General from increasing the rates on intrastate business, citing in support of its ruling the case of Dakota Cent. Teleph. Co. v. South Dakota (1919) 250 U. S. 163, 63 L. ed. 910, 4 A.L.R. 1623, P.U.R.1919D, 717, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507, which held the proclamation of July 22, 1918, and the order affecting rates pursuant thereto, to be within the power granted by the joint resolution of Congress.

1. Orders Nos. 18 and 18a.

The validity of General Orders Nos. 18 and 18a, fully set out in the original annotation, was sustained, in Johnson v. McAdoo (1919) 257 Fed. 757, the court saying in this connection: "I think it competent for the Director General to stipulate in what jurisdictions he might be sued, but his authority to make rules and regulations would not authorize the setting aside of the plain provisions of the statute as to the companies."

So, in Russ v. New York C. R. Co. (1919) 190 App. Div. 37, 179 N. Y. Supp. 310, the validity of the order of April 18, 1918 (No. 18a) was sustained, the court saying: "Director General Hines declared by general order, bearing date April 18, 1918, 'that all suits against carriers while under Federal control must be brought in the county or district where the plaintiff resided at the time of the accrual of the cause of action, or in the county or district where the cause of action arose.' The courts will recognize the policy of the government to interfere as little as possible with the convenience of parties and witnesses in suits brought against railroads while under government control. This order required the action to be brought in Montgomery county. Not only that, but the plaintiff resided in Montgomery county. The accident took place there. All the witnesses resided there. The expense of getting the witnesses to Albany county and maintaining them there will be much greater than in Montgomery county. The plaintiff's attorney, in violation of the order, brought the action in Albany county, and seeks to maintain it there solely upon the ground of laches in asking that it be changed to the proper county. The laches are not sufficient to defeat the motion. Compelling the plaintiff to go to trial on October 18th in cases of such importance, and without more time of defendants' attorneys for preparation, strikes us as an unwise exercise of discretion. The motion should be granted without conditions, and the plaintiffs allowed to try the case where the cause of action arose."

But in Haubert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 361, it was held that the second sentence of § 10 of the Federal Control Act of March 21, 1918, permitting actions at law or suits in equity to be brought and judgments rendered, "as is now provided by law," could not be modified or limited by orders of the Director General, as was attempted by General Orders 18, 18a, and 26.

2. Order No. 26.

General Order No. 26 was disregarded by the court in El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Havens (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 216 S. W. 444, following the ruling made in El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Lovick (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 210 S. W. 283, wherein the court refused to continue the case during the Federal control of the railroad company, on the ground that General Order No. 26 could not deprive the courts of Texas of jurisdiction to try causes of action pending at the date of the issuance of the order, where the cause of action arose in another state.

So, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Ryan (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 214 S. W. 642, an action instituted in Texas to recover damages from a railroad company for personal injuries received in Illinois, application was made for a postponement of the trial during the period of Federal control in accordance with General Order No. 26. This application was refused by the trial court, and on appeal it was held that the granting or refusal of the continuance was within the discretion of the trial court. The court said: "We have examined the orders issued by the Director General, and there is nothing there to indicate he contemplated or intended to interfere with the jurisdiction and orderly procedure of courts of competent jurisdiction or the rights of litigants to have their day in court. Of course no judgment may be executed against or the possession of the government in any manner be disturbed. This is true in every case where property is in custodia legis. This suit was instituted prior to the possession and control by the government of the railroads, through the Director General of the United States, to which he has not become or been made a party. It therefore in no manner disturbs him or requires him to take notice thereof or concern himself with respect thereto in any manner whatever, unless an effort should be made to disturb the possession. But we fail to see how the court in this issue did anything contrary to the wishes and directions of the Director General. It could not at that time, by forcing the trial, cause serious interference with the physical operation of railroads under the control of the government."

The same view was taken in Haubert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 361, the court holding that Order No. 26 merely appealed to the discretion of the trial judge as to whether an action should be stayed or continued.

3. Order No. 50.

The recent cases are in conflict as to the validity of General Order No. 50 of the Director General, which is fully set out in the original annotation.

In Nash v. Southern P. Co. (1919) 260 Fed. 280, a motion was made by the Director General of Railroads, joined in by the defendant, that he be substituted as defendant and that the action be dismissed as to the railroad company, the motion referring to General Order No. 50 and proceeding on the theory that the substitution sought was warranted by the terms of that order. The court, in granting the motion, expressly held that General Order No. 50 was within the power of the Director General as the representative of the President, and was within the authority conferred on the President by the Act of March 21, 1918, and did not contravene in any respect the provisions of § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918.

The validity of General Order No. 50 was likewise sustained in Mardis v. Hines (1919) 258 Fed. 945, wherein it was said: "On October 28, 1918, by General Order No. 50, the Director General ordered 'that actions at law, suits in equity, and proceedings in admiralty hereafter brought in any court, based on contract binding on the Director General of Railroads, claim for death or injury to persons, or for loss and damage to property arising since December 31, 1917, and growing out of the possession, use, control, or operation of any railroad or system of transportation by the Director General of Railroads, which action, suit, or proceeding, but for Federal control, might have been brought against the carrier company, shall be brought against William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, and not otherwise.' In this case it is alleged that the injury was sustained on the 26th of January, 1918. That was after the Director General assumed control. This suit was brought in the Johnson county circuit court on January 21, 1919. This was after the date of General Order No. 50. The order of the Director General does not contravene the acts of Congress. It is authorized by the proclamation of the President, and directs a procedure that is in strict accordance with the actual facts and the rules of legal liability."

So, Hatcher v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1919) 258 Fed. 952, the railroad company moved to substitute the Director General of Railroads in its stead, in accordance with General Orders Nos. 50 and 50a. The plaintiff resisted the motion, basing its argument on § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918. It was held that in view of the Act of August 29, 1916, and the other provisions of the Act of March 21, 1918, liability could not be imposed on the railroad company by § 10 of Act of March 21 1918. The court, referring to the case of Vaughn v. State (1919) — Ala. App. —, 81 So. 417, said: "That court, however, appears to have taken the view that the congressional acts only authorized a superintending control and management by the government of the companies and their roads, and expressly said that there was no evidence in the case before them, showing that the companies had been excluded 'from the exercise of their functions in the operation of their respective systems,' which is not in accord either with the construction of the acts given in the North Dakota case nor with the actual facts, now of common knowledge. Certainly there is no power in Congress to make A liable and suable for the acts of B. Fundamental principles of justice cannot be overturned by legislative fiat, to say nothing of constitutional guaranties. Nonliability of the company was sustained at nisi prius in Schumacher v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1919) 106 Misc. 564, 175 N. Y. Supp. 84. The construction of the act there given is in accord with that in the Dakota case, and the reasoning on which the conclusion was reached appears to me sound. However, plaintiffs have a right to prosecute their case to final judgment against the railroad company, and in a sense the views above expressed may be premature. Indeed, they may be greatly modified at the final hearing. They are given now only that parties may be advised as to the present attitude of the court on the question raised when the motion was up. Further, a consideration of the effect of the answer may render wholly inapplicable to this case the views above expressed."

Similarly, in Haubert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 361, an action against the railroad company and the Director General of Railroads, the court, in sustaining a demurrer as to the defendant railroad company, said: "My conclusion is that liabilities due to operation by the agencies having possession by virtue of the acts creating and authorizing Federal control are not liabilities of the railroad companies that have been ousted from such possession and control, that suits cannot be brought against such companies and prosecuted to judgment against them, and that such claimants are limited to a right of action against the Federal control agency and to such sources of payment as are provided by the Federal Control Act. In this conclusion I am supported by District Judge Munger, in Rutherford v. Union P. R. Co. (1919) 254 Fed. 880, and Judge Benedict of the New York supreme court, in Sagona v. Pullman Co. (1919) 174 N. Y. Supp. 536, and Oyler v. C. C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (Cin. Super. Ct.) 17 Ohio L. Rep. 356. Such holdings to the contrary as I have seen do not seem to me to be based on sound reasoning, and should not be followed. This conclusion, it has been suggested, may leave injured persons without adequate redress when Federal control is terminated. It will not be assumed that the United States will terminate Federal control and cover into the United States treasury the residue of the revolving fund and excess income, if any, without providing for debts and liabilities incurred during Federal control. Yet if such a contingency happens the remedy must be sought otherwise than through judicial legislation."

In PEACOCK v. DETROIT, G. H. & M. R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 964, the appellate court substituted the Director General of Railroads for the railroad company, "under the broad power conferred upon it by the Statute of Amendments," without passing on the validity of the order so far as it attempts to control procedure in state courts.

In Cravens v. Hines (1920) — Mo. App. —, 218 S. W. 912, a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, in an action brought against the railroad company and the Director General of Railroads, was reversed as to the railroad company, and affirmed as against the Director General of Railroads, the court saying: "We think that the trial court should not have rendered judgment against the railroad company; but, on the other hand, we do not think the fact that the railroad company was considered throughout the trial as a party, and the instructions so framed as to permit a recovery against it, and the giving judgment against it, will require a reversal as to both defendants. We cannot see how the substantial rights of the Director General as a common carrier were in any wise prejudiced by joining the railroad company as a party defendant. Such does not require reversal of the whole judgment."

The court held in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Long (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 219 S. W. 212, that in view of the fact that the judgment rendered by the lower court against the defendant railroad company provided that "no execution shall issue herein, but such judgment is payable by the United States," the company was completely protected from any personal liability, and had not been in any wise prejudiced by the refusal of a peremptory instruction in its favor. "Under this view," the court said, "it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the validity of General Order No. 50, which has been upheld by some courts." The court said, however, that its validity was debatable.

In Baker v. Bell (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 219 S. W. 245, an action was brought against the receiver of a railroad and the Director General of Railroads jointly, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff. The receiver filed a motion to be dismissed from the suit, by virtue of the fact that the railroad, of which he was receiver, was at the time of the accident in the hands of the Director General of Railroads by virtue of General Order No. 50, promulgated by the Director General under and by virtue of the Federal Control Act. The motion was overruled and a judgment was rendered against the receiver and the Director General jointly. On appeal it was held that it was error to deny the motion to dismiss the suit against the receiver. "It will be observed," the court said, "that neither the railroad nor its receiver occupied with the appellee, at the time of the injury, the relation of master and servant, and it will be observed the maxim 'respondeat superior' has no place here. It was not the negligence of the railway or of its receiver at all, for surely it cannot be said they are to be held liable for acts of the government in operating the road independently of them. Under the provisions of the law the Director General has the very broadest possible powers conferred on him to manage and operate railroads. He may sue or be sued, or make himself party to any suit, direct and prescribe modes of procedure as to how he may be sued. This is made very clear by the acts of Congress, and especially by General Order No. 50, dated October 28, 1918."

The validity of General Order No. 50 was likewise sustained in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Wurzbach (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 219 S. W. 252. In that case action was brought by the plaintiff against the railroad company, and the Director General of Railroads made himself a party to the suit. Subsequently, the Director General moved that he be substituted as party defendant, pursuant to General Order No. 50, and that the defendant railroad company be dismissed from the suit. The motion to dismiss was overruled, and the Director General was permitted to remain in the case, and the cause was prosecuted to judgment against both the railroad company and the Director General. It was held, on appeal, that the action of the lower court in refusing to dismiss the railroad company from the suit, in accordance with the motion, was error.

But it seems that an order attempting to make the Director General of Railroads a party, without notice to him and without his consent, is erroneous.

Thus, in Grant v. Director General (1920) — S. C. —, 102 S. E. 854, action was brought against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and a section foreman, to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendants pleaded that at the time of the injury the railroad was being operated by the Federal government. The plaintiff then moved to dismiss the action against the defendant railroad company, and to substitute in lieu thereof the Director General of Railroads as the defendant. The defendants' attorneys objected, on the grounds that they had received no notice of the motion, and that they were without authority to represent the Director General. The amendment was allowed, however, and the attorneys for the defendants were offered the opportunity to answer in behalf of the Director General at once. This they declined to do, and the court declared the Director General to be in default, and the trial proceeded to judgment against the Director General and the section foreman. It was held that the order attempting to make the Director General a party without his consent, and without notice, was error.

In an official syllabus in the case of Robinson v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (1920) — Ga. —, 102 S. E. 532, the following appears: "Where an injury occurred between the dates of the President's proclamation and the act approved March 21, 1918, and a suit based thereon was instituted subsequently to the date of the act, but prior to the assent of General Order

No. 50, promulgated by the Director General of Railroads, which in effect gave directions that suits for injuries resulting from operation of railroads while under Federal control should be brought against the Director General, under proper construction of the Act of 1916, and the proclamation of the President, and the Act of 1918, such suit (of the character involved in this case) was maintainable against the government, without the aid of General Order No. 50 by the Director General of Railroads."

And in ¶ 3 of the syllabus in the same case it was said: "Where a suit of the character just indicated was instituted subsequently to the Act of March 21, 1918, and the name of the defendant was alleged as the railroad company, and the petition and process were served upon the agents engaged in operating the railroad company, inasmuch as the railroad was being operated by the government, and the government would be suable for any injuries caused by its agents and servants, the suit was in effect against the government. Westbrook v. Director General (D. C.) 263 Fed. 211. Accordingly, the petition could be amended by substituting the Director General of Railroads in his representative capacity, as defendant in lieu of the railroad company."

In Hines v. Zellner (1920) — Ga. App. —, 103 S. E. 97, action was brought by the plaintiff against the Director General of Railroads to recover damages for the death of her husband. The defendant demurred to the petition on the theory that such a suit was not maintainable against the Director General of Railroads for the reason that, at the time of the accident in question, there was no authority given by Congress authorizing the maintenance of a suit against the Director General of Railroads. This contention was overruled on authority of Robinson v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (Ga.) supra.

Other recent decisions, however, have held General Order No. 50 to be invalid. Thus, in Palyo v. Northern P. R. Co. (1920) — Minn. —, 175 N. W. 687, an action to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, the action was originally brought against the railroad company alone, but the company moved to substitute in its place the Director General of Railroads, and to dismiss as to it. The court granted the motion to the extent of making the Director General a party defendant, but refused to dismiss as to the company, and both defendants challenged the order. On appeal the court said: "We adhere to the decision in Lavalle v. Northern P. R. Co. (1919) — Minn. —, 4 A.L.R. 1659, 172 N. W. 918, until the question is set at rest by the Supreme Court of the United States. Hence the order refusing to dismiss the railway company must be sustained. As to the Director General, he apparently was willing to become a defendant, and the refusal to dismiss the company cannot prejudice him."

So, in Franke v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1919) — Wis. —, 173 N. W. 701, General Order No. 50 was declared to be invalid. The court said: "The power and authority of Mr. McAdoo as Director General of Railroads cannot exceed that which can be lawfully vested in him by proclamation or order of the President, and he in turn receives his power and authority over the subject-matter here concerned, by and through the legislative declaration embodied in the Federal Control Act of March 21, 1918. Whatever general language is used in this act conferring power on the President must be construed to be given for the purpose of enabling him to carry out the provisions of the act, and not to enable him, either by himself or by any appointee of his, to set aside any provisions of the legislative will, or to take away any rights or privileges granted to or recognized as validly existing in third persons by such legislation. When Congress in § 10 of that act used the following language: 'Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers, and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal government,'—it either granted or recognized as then lawfully existing the right to or of any person situated as was the plaintiff herein, to bring just such a cause of action against a defendant such as the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company. Such rights so granted or recognized cannot be taken away or destroyed except by Congress. We find no language in the act itself which warrants the conclusion that what was so expressly given or recognized by the quoted language above as a substantial right was to be destroyed or taken away by implication. This provision of § 10 of the Federal act, and provisions of General Order No. 50 issued by the Director General of Railroads and upon which the court below based its order, cannot both stand. The legislative declaration is the paramount authority and must control."

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Ault (1919) — Ark. —, 216 S. W. 3, the action was brought against the railroad company by an employee to recover wages and a statutory penalty for nonpayment. On appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff the railroad company insisted that it was erroneous to render any judgment against it, for the reason that the evidence showed that at the time of the employment and discharge of the plaintiff the railroad was being operated by the Director General, and not by the railroad company. Answering this contention, the court said: "If the word 'carriers' used in this act [Act March 21, 1918, chap. 25, § 10, 40 Stat. at L. 456, Comp. Stat. § 3115½j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762] had reference to the Director General, who was operating said railroad, then it was improper to render a judgment against the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company. We are unable to find anything in the language or context used that indicates that the word 'carriers' refers to the Director General. On the contrary, the plain meaning is that, so far as suing and being sued is concerned, the railroad occupied exactly the same status after being taken over by the government as before. The 8 A.L.R.—62.

case of Rutherford v. Union P. R. Co. (1919; D. C.) 254 Fed. 880, cited by appellant in support of its position that the statute in question had reference to the Director General, and not to the original corporation, argued that the Director General occupied the same position with reference to the railroad as receivers do. We do not think the position occupied by the Director General is analogous to that of a receiver. The attitude of a receiver is that of a trustee for the benefit of creditors. The attitude of the Director General is that of an agent of the government taking over the railroads as a necessity of war, under congressional and Presidential authority. A receivership implies insolvency; the operation of the railroad under a Director General does not carry such an implication. We think the later case of Jensen v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1919; D. C.) 255 Fed. 795, is the better-reasoned case."

Similarly, in Johnson v. McAdoo (1919) 257 Fed. 757, the plaintiff brought an action for damages against the Director General of Railroads and the railroad company. An exception to the venue as to the Director General was maintained, and thereupon the plaintiff dismissed the suit as to him. A similar exception of the railroad company was overruled, and the railroad company filed an exception to the petition, contending that no action would lie against the railroad company while it was under the control of the Director General of Railroads; that the word "carriers," in § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918, did not mean the railroad companies, but referred to the Federal administration. The court said: "I do not agree with this contention. I think it was the purpose of Congress in adopting the act to allow litigants to sue the railroad companies, just as they had theretofore been able to do, and in such courts as have jurisdiction under the general law."

Three recent cases have discussed the proviso in Order No. 50, excepting actions for penalties and the like. In Smith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1919) — S. C. —, 100 S. E. 148, an action brought against a railroad company by a consignee of goods to recover the value of the goods and a penalty of $44, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed, claiming that as the railroad was being operated by the United States government, and had been so operated for some time prior to the shipment referred to in the complaint, no penalty could be awarded against the defendant, as this would be in effect an award of a penalty against the United States. "In deciding this question," the court said, "it will not be necessary to consider whether the action should have been brought against the defendant, or against the Director General of Railroads. The record shows that the case was tried before the magistrate on the 27th of September, 1918. Therefore it was commenced, and the cause of action arose, before the issuance of General Order No. 50, on the 28th of October, 1918, which contains the proviso that 'this order shall not apply to actions, suits, or proceedings for the recovery of fines, penalties, and forfeitures.'" In Owens v. Hines (1919) — N. C. —, 100 S. E. 617, action was brought in justice's court to recover a penalty of $40 for delay in the delivery of two bags of corn, and the value of one bag of corn lost in transit. On an appeal from the justice of the peace to the superior court, the plaintiff was allowed to make the Director General of Railroads a party defendant, the action originally having been brought against the railroad company. In affirming a judgment of the superior court for $20 as a penalty, the court held that the statute (Revisal, § 2632) providing that in shipments of less than a carload there should be a penalty of $10 for the first day's delay, and a dollar per day for each succeeding day, was not impaired by the Federal Control of Railroads Act, in view of § 15 of the Act of March 21, 1918, declaring that nothing in that act should be construed to impair lawful police regulations of the state, and in view of General Order No. 50, providing that "this order shall not apply to actions, suits, or proceedings for the recovery of fines, penalties, and forfeitures."

A state statute, permitting the recovery of double damages for the killing of stock by railroads, is not applicable to an action against the Director General, but a statute allowing the recovery of attorney's fees as part of the costs is applicable. Hines v. Taylor (1920) — Fla. —, 84 So. 381.

III. Extent of Federal control.

The control assumed by the Federal government over the railroads is said in PEACOCK v. DETROIT, G. H. & M. R. Co. (reported herewith) ante, 964, to have been that of a lessee, or analogous thereto, and the same comparison was made in Bryant v. Pullman Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 311, 177 N. Y. Supp. 488. The cases seem to agree that it was not a mere superintendence, but was complete, ousting the control of the railroad companies and giving an undivided authority to the representatives of the government.

See to the same effect, Clements v. Southern R. Co. (1920) — N. C. —, 102 S. E. 399.

In Gilliam v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1920) — N. C. —, 103 S. E. 10, it was held that by virtue of the lease between the government and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, authorized by act of Congress, August 29, 1916, chap. 718 (Comp. Stat. § 1974a, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1095), the relation of lessor and lessee existed, and the company was liable for damages sustained in the transportation of freight or passengers.

Thus, in Mardis v. Hines (1919) 258 Fed. 945, an action to recover damages for personal injuries brought against a railroad and the Director General of Railroads, wherein the railroad company filed a separate demurrer, the court, in sustaining the demurrer, said: "From the time that the proclamation of the President became effective on December 28, 1917, the Director General as the representative of the President has been in the exclusive possession and control of the railroad. The railroad company exercises no control whatever. The railroad is operated under the orders of the Director General. The railroad company has nothing to do with such operation. When the Director General assumed control all the employees on the railroad ceased to be employees of the railroad company, and became employees of the Director General. At that time the relation of master and servant ceased to exist between the employees operating the railroad and the railroad company. That relation then began and still exists between such employees and the Director General. . . . The railroad, therefore, cannot be held for the negligence of the employees of the Director General, unless liability is imposed by § 10 of the Act of Congress of March 21, 1918 (40 Stat. at L. 456, chap. 25, Comp. Stat. § 3115j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762). That section provides 'that carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or Federal laws or at common law, except so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control or with any order of the President.' Is the liability sought to be fastened on the railroad company, under the facts alleged in the complaint in this case, inconsistent with the provisions of the acts of Congress referred to, or with the order of the President? In the proclamation of the President assuming control of the railroads it was provided that 'suits may be brought by and against said carriers and judgments rendered as hitherto until and except so far as said Director General may, by general or special orders, otherwise determine.' 40 Stat. at L. 1735, Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note. That proclamation, as indicated by the foregoing quotation, authorized the Director General to modify or change the permission given in the proclamation to bring suits against carriers. The Act of March 21, 1918, did not modify any of the provisions of the proclamation of the President."

So, in Haubert v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1919) 259 Fed. 361, the court said: "It is now conclusively settled that complete possession and control of all such railway lines as are under Federal control, and not a divided possession and control, have been transferred to the United States by virtue of the Act of August 29, 1916 (Comp. Stat. § 1974a, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1095), the proclamation of the President of December 26, 1917 (Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note), the Act of March 21, 1918 (Comp. Stat. § 3115j, and following sections, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757) and the President's proclamation of March 29, 1918. It seems equally clear that all liability for all actions of the Director General of Railroads during Federal control is imposed upon the United States, and does not remain upon the railroad company, which has thus been entirely ousted from the possession, control, and operation of its property. All moneys and other property derived from the operation of railway lines under Federal control are the property of the United States. A revolving fund of $500,000,000 is appropriated, which, together with any funds available from operating income, is to be used to pay the expenses and liabilities of the railway lines while under Federal control. All obligations and liabilities incurred or created during Federal control are to be paid therefrom by the Director General, and not by the railway company, excepting only such taxes as are excluded by § 1 of the Act of March 21, 1918, and certain other previously existing obligations of the railway company not necessary to be mentioned specifically. Section 1 also authorizes the making of agreements with the railway companies whereby they are insured compensation for the use of their property during Federal control, not exceeding a sum equivalent as nearly as possible to the average annual railway operating income for the three years ending June 30, 1917. Provision is also made for ascertaining and adjusting this compensation during the period, or in the event such agreements are not made. Manifestly it seems to me that in view of these conditions no liability exists against the railroad company itself for a personal injury due to operation under Federal control, and that no judgment can be rendered therefor which will become a lien upon the corpus of its property, or payment compelled therefrom. If this were done, the result would be that one person's property would be taken, without his consent and without compensation, to pay the debt of another. Liabilities thus arising during Federal control, it must be conceded, are in substance debts of the United States, notwithstanding, for purposes of administration, the control and operation of the railroads have been vested in an official called the Director General of Railroads. An action against the Director General, based upon any contract or act of his, it may be admitted, is in effect a suit against the United States. . . . An action cannot, of course, be maintained against the United States, except by its consent. This consent and authority to sue are conferred by Federal Control Act March 21, 1918, § 10 (Comp. Stat. § 3115*½*j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762). No difficulty is perceived why the remedy thus conferred is not adequate; but if inadequate, and further remedies, both in suing and obtaining payment, are needed to give full relief, they must be sought from that authority which confers the right to sue the United States. Section 10, it is true, subjects carriers, while under Federal control, to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or Federal law or common law, except so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of that act or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President. The second sentence of this section permits actions at law or suits in equity to be brought and judgments rendered as is now provided by law. The first sentence relates to liabilities, and the second to the manner in which they may be enforced. If the words 'common carriers' mean the railway companies themselves, as distinguished from the agency provided by the act for operating the railway lines, it is none the less true that they are made subject only to such liabilities as are not inconsistent with the provisions of the act itself. It may be consistent to subject the railway companies to liabilities created by themselves or existing before being ousted from the possession and control of the property; it would be inconsistent with all the provisions of the act to subject them to liabilities for the acts and conduct of public agents operating their property under Federal control. It follows that the provisions of this section do not impose a liability upon the railway companies for acts of the Director General of Railroads and his agents, because so to do would be inconsistent with the provisions of this act."

Similarly, in Hatcher v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1919) 258 Fed. 952, an action against the railroad company to recover damages for negligence in a shipment of goods, in passing on a motion to substitute the Director General for the railroad company, the court said: "At that time the construction of the applicable acts of Congress (Act August 29, 1916, chap. 418, 39 Stat. at L. 619, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1095, and Act March 21, 1918, chap. 25, 40 Stat. at L. 451, Comp. Stat. § 3115*½*a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757) by the Supreme Court in Northern P. R. Co. v. North Dakota (1919) 250 U. S. 135, P.U.R.1919D, 705, 63 L. ed. 897, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, was not at hand. Court and counsel were in agreement that if the congressional acts only gave the right and power of a superintending unification and control to the President, over railway companies and their properties, and if the President and the Director General went no further, and left the operation of the roads to the companies that owned them, there could be no doubt of liability in such a case as this. But if the acts contemplated more, and gave to the President and through him to the Director General, either expressly or by necessary implication, the right to take exclusive possession of the roads and operate them for the time being as a governmental agency, or if such exclusive possession and operation had been taken even without congressional authority, liability would be seriously doubted. But since the opinion in the North Dakota case there is no further doubt as to the extent of the power given the President by the congressional acts. . . . And we know, as a matter of public information, that the construction there given as to what was intended by Congress should be done, has in fact been done. The railroad companies have been entirely excluded from participation in the operation of their properties. They receive none of the income from them. It goes to the government. They have no voice in the employment and discharge of men engaged in the upkeep and repair of their roads and rolling stock, and the operation of trains. All of their properties, of every kind needful for transportation purposes, have been taken over by the government, and their possession and operation rest in the exclusive control of the Director General."

And in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Long (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 219 S. W. 212, it was said: "Under the acts of Congress commonly called the Federal Control Act the possession, control, and management of the railroad were completely and exclusively vested in the Director General. The relation of master and servant did not exist between the company and appellee during the period of government control. The appellee's cause of action having accrued during that period, the company is not liable therefor, and a personal judgment cannot be rendered against it for the damages sustained by Long."

In a syllabus by the court in the case of Robinson v. Central of Georgia R. Co. (1920) — Ga. —, 102 S. E. 532, the following appears: "In virtue of the Act of 1916 (Act August 29, 1916, chap. 418), and the proclamation of the President (Comp. Stat. § 1974a, note), which by its terms went into effect at 12 o'clock on the 28th day of December, 1917, the railroads contemplated in the act and proclamation passed into the possession and control of the Director General. . . . Section 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918 (Comp. Stat. § 3115½j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762), properly construed, recognizes liability of the government to suit, among other things, for injuries received on account of negligence of the agents and servants engaged in operating the railroad 'while under Federal control,' which, as above ruled, became operative immediately upon the President's proclamation becoming effective, and was a declaration of the assent of the government to the institution of a suit of such character against it."

This view has been applied in sustaining the power of the Director General to increase rates. Kneeland-Bigelow Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1919) 207 Mich. 546, 174 N. W. 606, wherein the court said: "The basic rate upon which this 25 per cent increase was authorized by Order No. 28 was the filed and published tariff rate then in effect and applicable to the public generally. The rates established and put in force by General Order No. 28 were initiated and authorized by proclamation of the President under and by authority of congressional legislation enacted as a war measure, in the exercise of a recognized paramount governmental power when a state of war exists. That the governmental power is ample in such emergency, and Federal authority plenary under the exigencies shown by the Presidential findings and proclamations, is not open to controversy. United States v. Russell (1872) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 623, 20 L. ed. 474. Judicial notice may be taken by the courts of such extraordinary conditions."

So, in State ex rel. Seattle v. Public Service Commission (1920) — Wash. —, 188 Pac. 7, it was held that during the period of possession, control, and supervision of the telephone and telegraph by the Postmaster General, in the exercise of the war power, the state Public Service Commission had no jurisdiction whatever over the subject-matter that would enable it to lawfully make any orders approving or making effective any tariff rate to be charged for services rendered by any such systems. "Of course," the court said, "the Postmaster General, as director of such systems for the government, was privileged to avail himself of the personal services of the members of our Public Service Commission, with a view to determining what the charges for such services to our citizens should be, and had our Public Service Commission, in making disposition of the matter for the Postmaster General, not assumed to do anything more than that, we would have no occasion to review its orders here."

On the same principle, the property in goods stolen from an interstate shipment during the period of Federal control need not be laid, the status of the government as bailee being judicially noticed. Block v. United States (1919) 261 Fed. 321. And the United States has a special property in goods being transported for hire by an express company operated under the Federal Control Act, which will sustain a prosecution for larceny of such property under § 47 of the Criminal Code (7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 612), making it an offense to steal any "property or valuable thing whatever of the goods, chattels, or property of the United States." United States v. Kambeitz (1919) 256 Fed. 247. Goods privately shipped on a railroad under Federal control are not, however, government property to such an extent as to preclude replevin by the consignee to recover the shipment. Salant v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 851, 177 N. Y. Supp. 475.

In Christian v. Great Northern R. Co. (1920) — Wis. —, 177 N. W. 29, it was said: "While the President took absolute and undivided control of the carriers of the country, and while, during the period of Federal control, they were wholly and absolutely within the jurisdiction of the Federal government, acting through the proper executive agencies, the purpose of the proclamation, as well as the clear intent and purpose of the law, was that the President should take possession of the carrier systems as systems. The President did not take control, and neither the language of the act nor the proclamation indicates that he undertook to take control, merely of the physical properties of the carriers, but he took over the complete system—that is, the entire organization, including the officers, directors, and employees who transacted the business in the name of the company. Men were hired and discharged, and their duties prescribed, and compensation paid, by the same organization which, prior to the time of Federal control, had performed the like offices. The power of the President was exerted not immediately and directly upon the employees, but through the organizations which theretofore had handled the various properties."

In Public Utilities Commission v. Springfield Terminal R. Co. (1920) — Ill. —, 127 N. E. 128, the issue raised was whether the United States government, in taking over the railroads from private ownership, assumed authority to regulate rates to the exclusion of the authority of the several states. The question arose from the judgment of the circuit court, confirming the decision of the Public Utilities Commission, permitting the Springfield Terminal Railway Company to increase its switching charge. The court affirmed an order of the Commission fixing the rates, and, after quoting the Act of March 21, 1918, and § 10 thereof (Comp. Stat. § 3115½j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762), which gave to the President the right to initiate rates, charges, etc., whenever in his opinion it became necessary, and § 15, which provided that nothing in the act should "be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect . . . the lawful police regulations of the several states, except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations [might] affect the transportation of troops, war materials, government supplies, or the issue of stocks and bonds," said: "No argument is necessary to make it clear that by these acts and proclamations the United States was given complete possession and control of all railroads for all purposes. . . . On the other hand, it will be noted the Act of 1916 was permissive, not mandatory. The intention of Congress was to empower the President to take possession and assume control and operation of any system or systems of transportation that in his discretion were needful for war purposes. By his proclamation of December 26, the President determined that it had become necessary in the national defense to take over and assume control of 'certain systems of transportation,' and to use them for needful and desirable purposes connected with the prosecution of the war. To provide the government with all means of transportation that might become necessary, the President made his proclamation broad enough to include 'each and every system of transportation,' but we do not think it was intended by that proclamation to assume control of every 'tap line,' or other short line of railroad, unless its use became necessary for the purposes for which the government assumed control and operation of railroads. By the Act of March 21, 1918, it will be seen that Congress did not understand that the President had taken over the control and operation of all railroad systems in the United States, because it provides for compensation to 'certain railroads and systems of transportation' of which the President had assumed control. It is conceded that the Director General of Railroads did not exercise jurisdiction over the Springfield Terminal Railway Company, and that of the hundreds of orders issued by the Director General from time to time, directing the affairs and operations of transportation systems under Federal control, no order was ever given concerning the operation of the appellee. The authority of the state to regulate rates to be charged by railroads is derived from its police powers."

Krichman v. United States (1920) 263 Fed. 538, was an appeal from a conviction for bribery of a railway porter. The indictment was brought under § 39 of the Criminal Code (Comp. Stat. § 10,203, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 602), which makes the offering or giving of money or anything of value to any person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any "official function" a crime. It was held that the indictment was sufficient, as at the time named the Director General was in control of the railroads, and in operating them he was in the performance of an official duty; and therefore, all persons assisting him, whether officers or mere employees, were, in so doing, persons acting for and on behalf of the United States in an official function. It was further held that the railroads were not taken over in pursuance of contracts made by the Director General of Railroads with the carriers, but that these contracts were merely agreements for compensation made under the Federal Control Act of March 21, 1918 (40 Stat. at L. 451, chap. 25, Comp. Stat. § 3115½a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757).

IV. Right of action against public utility.

The recent cases tend to support the rule laid down in the original annotation, that whatever uncertainty may exist as to the interpretation of the orders of the Director General imposing restrictions on litigation the right of action against railroads under Federal control remains unimpaired.

Thus, in Smith v. Babcock & W. Co. (1919) 260 Fed. 679, the court, in construing § 10 of the Federal Control Act, said: "The first sentence of the section makes all carriers, while in Federal control, subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or Federal laws or common law, except so far as inconsistent with the provisions of that act, or any other act applicable to Federal control, or with any order of the President. This means that lines of railway, while being operated under Federal control and by a Director General of Railroads, are subject to liability for injury due to a third person precisely to the same extent as if they were not under such Federal control or operation."

So in McAdoo v. Martin (1919) — Ga. App. —, 101 S. E. 312, an action to recover damages for the killing of a bird dog belonging to the plaintiff, the defendant contended that § 2780 of the Georgia Civil Code of 1910 which provided that a railroad company should be liable "for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property by the running of the locomotives, or cars, or other machinery of such company, or for damage done by any person in the employment and service of such company unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company," was inapplicable because the suit was brought against the Director General of Railroads. The court held, however, that there was no merit in this contention, in view of § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918.

Fitzhugh v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1920) — N. H. —, 109 Atl. 562, was an action for conspiracy against the defendant railway and another, begun by trustee process. The question to be determined was whether the Director General of Railroads could be summoned as trustee. It was held that (1) there is nothing in the act of Congress under which the Director General operates the railroads, nor in Pub. Stat. chap. 245, which provides either in terms or by reasonable implication that the money rights and credits of a third person in the possession of a railroad operated by the Director General may be attached by summoning him as trustee; and this was held to be true in respect to attaching the share or interest of the individual defendants in the defendant corporation. (2) If the defendants or any of them had a claim which they could enforce against the Director General in the state courts, and which could be adjudicated so that the trustee might be charged upon disclosure, the Director General might be summoned as trustee. (3) In order to summon the Director General as trustee, the claim of the defendants against the Director General must be one growing out of "the possession, use, control, or operation" of a railroad by him.

In Hines v. Zellner (1920) — Ga. App. —, 103 S. E. 97, which was an action brought against the Director General of Railroads to recover damages for the death of a person not a passenger or an employee, the defendant demurred to the petition on the ground that the liability alleged in the case was not the liability of a common carrier, which included only a breach of its duty safely to transport freight and passengers. The demurrer was overruled by the lower court, however, and its action was sustained on appeal. In an official syllabus the following appears: "The Act of Congress of March 21, 1918 (Comp. Stat. §§ 8115½a-8115½p, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. p. 757), and the rules promulgated by Federal authority in pursuance thereof, while limiting the interference of government control of railroads by prohibiting the enforcement of judgments and decrees through attachment or levy, did not intend either to extinguish or impair, but, on the contrary, expressly preserved, the rights of parties to prosecute to judgment, in the name of the Director General of Railroads, any cause of action against the railroad companies to which they as parties were entitled under the Federal, state, or common law. See Dantzler Lumber Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 119 Miss. 328, 80 So. 770, 4 A.L.R. 1669, 1710, note; McAdoo v. Martin, 24 Ga. App. 485, 101 S. E. 312. Under the power thus given the liability of the Director General is not limited to claims growing out of a breach of duty to safely transport freight and passengers."

But in Kneeland-Bigelow Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1919) 207 Mich. 546, 174 N. W. 605, an action by a shipper to compel the railroad company to perform specifically a contract entered into before the railroads were placed under Federal control, the court, in affirming a decree dismissing the plaintiff's bill, said: "Since this contract was entered into in 1911, a grave change of conditions, for which neither contracting party is responsible and neither anticipated, has imposed upon the defendant company impossibility of further performance on its part, whether temporary or permanent we need not inquire; while on plaintiffs' part the existence of a state of war, with resultant governmental interference in taking possession and control of defendant's transportation system, has only affected them by advanced traffic rates. This they seek relief from in a court of chancery, under a bill for specific performance, against a defendant deprived of power to perform by the Federal government, which is in absolute control of the transportation system essential to performance and with it fulfilling the contract, except as to the matter of rates, while none of its officials in control and imposing the conditions complained of are parties to the suit. Under such conditions, a decree of specific performance against the party ousted and incapable of performance would seem to be a vain thing. For disposition of the issue directly involved, we deem it sufficient to find and hold that, by a war-measure interposition of the sovereign governmental power, this contract was rendered unenforceable, for the time being at least, and so long as such interposition is maintained by vis major."

In affirming an award of compensation by the State Industrial Commission against the railroad company, the court in Fish v. Rutland R. Co. (1919) 189 App. Div. 352, 178 N. Y. Supp. 439, said: As to the claim that the award should have been made against the Director General, as the Rutland Railroad was then being operated by him, the matter was passed on adversely by this court in Bryant v. Pullman Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 311, 177 N. Y. Supp. 488. Furthermore the Rutland Railroad Company describes itself as the employer in the report of this injury, which is filed with the Commission." In Bryant v. Pullman Co. (N. Y.) cited in the foregoing case, a proceeding instituted under the Workmen's Compensation Law for compensation for injuries received by a porter on the defendant company's sleeping car, which was, at the time of the accident, being operated under Federal control, an award in favor of the claimant was upheld, on the ground that § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918, contemplated a continuing liability of the companies, and actions against them were not inconsistent with the act or the proclamation of the President. Kellogg, P. J., said: "The appellant raised no question with the government as to the effect or validity of the act of Congress or the proclamation of the President, but acquiesced in them and operated its cars as contemplated by the act. If, instead of so doing, it had contested the question with the government, a different situation might have arisen. But, having operated its cars under the act, it cannot now raise the question that the government could not compel it to do so. That question is in the past. It did operate its cars, and the claimant was its employee in that service. It was carrying on the express business by and under the direction of the Director General. In effect the government was the lessee of the cars, the company the lessor, and by the terms of the lease the business was carried on by it under government control. The question is not one of substance. If the lessee was carrying on its business through the lessor, and the latter is required to pay compensation under this award, it has ample recourse against the lessee, and undoubtedly any liability imposed upon it will be met in the adjustment of the rentals. We consider the question more one of technicality than of substance, and are prepared to hold that for the purposes of the protection of the claimant under the Workmen's Compensation Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 67) the appellant was his employer and that the award may stand."

While no provision similar to that of § 10 of the Federal Control Act was made in respect to telegraph and cable companies, the rule heretofore stated was applied in Witherspoon v. Postal Teleg. & Cable Co. (1919) 257 Fed. 758, an action for damages alleged to have been caused by delay in delivering a cable, at a time when its lines were being operated by the Postmaster General on behalf of the United States. The court said: "Neither in the joint resolution nor the proclamation of the President is there a provision similar to § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918, chap. 25, 40 Stat. at L. 456, Comp. Stat. § 3115½j, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 762, taking over the railroad systems of the country. It seems to me, however, that it was the intention of Congress, in authorizing the President to take over the lines, that the companies should go ahead with private business the same as theretofore.

This would contemplate the institution and defense of suits. If the company is allowed to take and send private messages, there should be some method of holding it liable for damages occasioned through negligence, notwithstanding the Postmaster General had the direction and control of the company. . . . The joint resolution provides for just compensation to the companies and the method of settling disputes as to same between them and the government. If the companies are held for damages occasioned while under government control, compensation will certainly extend to reimbursement. In the meantime litigants should not be delayed in liquidating their claims. Therefore I think it proper that the plaintiff in this case should be allowed to establish his liability against the company, if there is any. Delay in the trial of the case may result in hardship to either side."

But in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Davis (1920) — Ark. —, 218 S. W. 833, an action brought under statute against a telegraph company, to recover damages for mental anguish caused by the negligence of the company in transmitting a message, was dismissed on the ground that at the time of the negligent act complained of the telegraph lines were under control of the United States government. The court said: "The assumption of control by the Postmaster General was complete, and constituted a substitution of the government for the owners of the telegraph lines in the operation of the same. The possession and control of the owners was entirely displaced, and the act of negligence complained of was committed not by the servants and employees of the telegraph company, but by the servants and agents of the government. There was no liability resting upon the telegraph company for the act of the government, and no such liability was created by statute. . . . The statute, or rather the joint resolution, now under consideration, does not contain a word which would justify us in holding that it preserved the liability of the telegraph companies, nor does it authorize a suit against the telegraph companies. Compensation is to be paid by the government for the use of the property, but no authority is conferred to hold the owners of the respective lines responsible for injuries which occur under government control. We see no escape from the conclusion that there is no liability in this case for the injury complained of."

And in Foster v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1920) — Mo. App. —, 219 S. W. 107, the court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, in an action brought against the telegraph company and the Postmaster General to recover a penalty provided for by statute for failure to promptly transmit and deliver a telegraphic message. The court said: "No suit could possibly be instituted against the Western Union Telegraph Company, because it has been expressly held by the highest authority that when the President, acting under the power given him by Congress, took charge of the telegraph lines of the United States, such lines were then operated as a government agency. . . . It appears that no order was ever made with reference to telegraph lines, such as was made concerning the operation of railroads; that is, to permit litigants who based causes of action arising out of the operation of the railroads or carriers to substitute the Director General of Railroads in place of the carriers. Under the Supreme Court authorities . . . and under the recent case of Rochel Candidate v. Western Union Telegraph Co. — Ala. —, 83 So. —, decided by the supreme court of Alabama, at the October term, 1919, in an opinion by McClellan, J., we must hold that this penalty provision could not be enforced against the United States government while it was operating the telegraph lines."

Similar rulings have been made with respect to express companies. Thus, in Edwards v. American R. Exp. Co. (1919) — Mo. App. —, 216 S. W. 781, an action against an express company operated and controlled by the government under the Federal Control Act, for damages caused by delay in transporting a shipment of eggs, it was held that the express company was under the duty to give precedence to shipments of the United States government; and if, in so doing, it became impossible to deliver the shipment to the consignee at an earlier date than it did, the defendant was not liable. However, it was held that the evidence did not show any such volume of government business as to excuse the delay. And in Clapp v. American Exp. Co. (1919) — Mass. —, 125 N. E. 162, an action against an express company to recover damages for the loss and depreciation in value in a shipment of horses, it was held that the fact that the company was under government control was no defense to the action.

In Smith v. Babcock & W. Co. (1919) 260 Fed. 679, it was held that the citizenship of the railroad, and not of the Director General, determined the jurisdiction of the Federal court in an action against a railroad under Federal control, so that such an action might be brought in such courts only as would have had jurisdiction in the absence of Federal control. The court said: "This section [§ 10] further provides that no defense shall be made in any actions at law or in equity to enforce any liability on the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal government, and that no such carrier shall be entitled to transfer any action brought by or against it to any Federal court. Obviously, this means that right to sue in or remove to the Federal court is not restricted or enlarged in consequence of Federal control. Construing these provisions together with the entire act, it seems obvious that Congress intended to interfere as little as could be avoided with the situation existing at the time the railroads were taken over, and that the rights and remedies of all persons should be preserved and might be enforced with a minimum of interference with pre-existing rights and remedies. Assuming the existence of a liability, it seems evident that it was intended parties should have the right to assert the same in any court, and in the same manner as it might previously have been asserted. This intent extends not merely to the method of bringing the parties into court, but to the jurisdiction of the court." See also Hill v. Director General of Railroads (1919) — N. C. —, 101 S. E. 376, set out in the following subdivision.

VI. Service of process.

Christian v. Great Northern R. Co. (1920) — Wis. —, 177 N. W. 29, was an appeal from an order vacating the service of the summons and complaint in a personal injury action against a railroad company. The lower court sustained a motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, the motion being based on the fact that the freight agent on whom the service was made was not, at the time, in the employ of the defendant company, but was an agent and employee of the United States government, serving the Director General of Railroads, and therefore the service did not comply with subd. 6 of § 2637, Wis. Stat. 1917, which provided that "service may be had against a railroad company upon the station, freight, or ticket agent of the company who shall reside within the county." It was held on appeal that the trial court erred in vacating the service of the summons and complaint, as the agent was an agent of the defendant company, and a proper person upon whom service might be made.

The foregoing case was followed in Gilliam v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1920) — N. C. —, 103 S. E. 10, wherein it was held that service of process upon the local agent of a railroad company was service upon the Director General, and also upon the companies represented by him.

In Clements v. Southern R. Co. (1920) — N. C. —, 102 S. E. 399, it was held that, although the defendant railroad was being operated by the Director General as representative of the lessee, the railroad was a proper party to an action for damages brought by an employee, and that service upon the local agent of the company was equally service upon the corporation and on the Director General.

In State ex rel. Hines v. Calhoun

(1920) — Mo. —, 220 S. W. 6, General Orders 50 and 50a were said to be enabling orders, giving the courts jurisdiction over the Director General by proper service of process, but not warranting service in a district where no provision of law gives jurisdiction. Accordingly a court of a county where the railroad maintained no office for "its usual and customary business" was held to have no jurisdiction.

VII. Removal of cause to Federal court.

In Hill v. Director General of Railroads (1919) — N. C. —, 101 S. E. 376, action was brought against a domestic railroad corporation and the Director General of Railroads to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff from the negligent operation of the defendant's road in North Carolina, by its lessee, the Southern Railway Company, a foreign corporation. The Director General appeared and obtained a stay of the action as to the defendant road on the ground that under and by virtue of his own order (No. 50a) such suits might be prosecuted only against him. Thereupon the Director General filed a bond and petition for removal of the cause to the United States district court, on the ground that the controversy was wholly between a citizen of North Carolina and the defendant, "a citizen of New York, operating and controlling a corporation originally created, organized, and existing under and by virtue of the laws of Virginia, and not a citizen or resident of the state of North Carolina." It was held that as the plaintiff, in his complaint, had stated a cause of action only against a domestic corporation, the application for removal was properly denied in view of § 10 of the Act of March 21, 1918, providing as follows: "Nor shall any such carrier be entitled to have transferred to a Federal court any action heretofore or hereafter instituted by or against it, which action was not so transferable prior to the Federal control of such carrier." The court furthermore held that the Director General, "having become a party and accepted the position of defending the suit as being in the management and control of defendant, obtained a stay of proceedings against the corporation under an order that such suits are to be conducted in his official capacity, he should not be allowed to change his attitude and undertake a resistance as being in charge of the Virginia company."

By the express provision of the Federal Control Act no execution may be levied on railroad property under Federal control. Discussing the payment of judgments against the Director General in Johnson v. McAdoo (1919) 257 Fed. 757, the court said: "It will be incumbent upon the Director General to defend the suit, and to make payment, in the event of a recovery, out of his receipts. Section 12 of the act provides that the moneys received by the Director General shall not be covered into the Treasury of the United States, but shall remain in the custody of the same officers, and the accounting thereof shall be in the same manner, as before Federal control. Under the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission judgments for damages are chargeable to the operation of the roads, and are payable out of the general receipts. There is no doubt that the same action will follow in the event of recovery in this case as if the roads were not under government control, and the question of an adjustment as between the government and the railroad is one that will be settled when the roads are turned back to their owners, or other disposition made of them. In the meantime, should a recovery be had, no execution can issue against the physical property of the road under the plain terms of the act."

But the recovery of a shipment by replevin against the carrier is not inhibited. Salant v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 851, 177 N. Y. Supp. 475. In that case it appeared that the owner of shirt material delivered it to a bailee under the contract by which the bailee was to make the material into shirts, receiving payment for his work one week after the completed shirts were delivered. The bailee sent a shipment of shirts by the defendant railroad to the bailor, on an order bill of lading to which was attached a draft for the amount of a claim which was not a just lien on the goods. The bailor thereupon brought an action of replevin against the railroad company, which relied on General Order No. 43 of the Director General, providing as follows: "It is therefore ordered that no moneys or other property under Federal control or derived from the operation of carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to garnishment or like process in the hands of such carriers or any of them, or in the hands of any employee or officer of the United States Railroad Administration." The court did not agree with this contention, however, saying: "In my opinion, such construction does violence to the intent and meaning of the order, and, furthermore, that if it was intended to be so applied it would be void, being beyond the powers of the Federal administrator as conferred by the act of Congress. Act March 21, 1918, chap. 25, 40 Stat. at L. 451, Comp. Stat. § 8115½a, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, p. 757. The recitals contained in and preceding the order show that the purpose was to safeguard the wages of employees from garnishee process while in the possession of the Federal administrator, as such practice was prejudicial to the operation of the lines and systems of transportation.

Section 11 of the Act of March 21, 1918, which provides that "every person . . . or persons acting for or employed by a carrier, . . . or other person, . . . who . . . shall knowingly interfere with or impede the possession, use, operation, or control of any railroad property, railroad, or transportation system hitherto or hereafter taken over by the President . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished," etc., was under consideration in the case of United States v. Kambeitz (1919) 256 Fed. 247, wherein it was held that the conviction of an express employee, who stole express matter being carried by the express company for hire while under Federal control, could be sustained under the act. In overruling a demurrer to the indictment, the court said: "The possession, use, and operation of the system includes the right to carry and transport the goods entrusted to the carrier without unlawful obstruction or interference, and he who unlawfully interferes with and impedes the exercise of this right interferes with and impedes such possession, use, and operation of the system itself. If the goods being transported by the operation of the system are unlawfully taken and carried away, the system ceases to operate. The instrumentalities used in operating the system may still move, but the 'transportation system' does not operate."

Section 11 of the act of March 21, 1918, further provides as follows: "For the taking or conversion to his own use or the embezzlement of money or property derived from or used in connection with the possession, use, or operation of said railroads or transportation systems, the criminal statutes of the United States, as well as the criminal statutes of the various states where applicable, shall apply to all officers, agents and employees engaged in said railroad and transportation service, while the same is under Federal control, to the same extent as to persons employed in the regular service of the United States." The question also arose in United States v. Kambeitz (Fed.) supra, whether express matter, stolen by an employee from an express company which was being operated by the government, was "properly derived from" the "operation" of the transportation system. In answering this question in the affirmative, the court said: "The operation of this transportation system consisted and consists in drawing or obtaining or receiving from other goods, chattels, or other property for transportation for a compensation, and the transportation of such property. This is the main thing the transportation system does when in operation. It does not operate unless it does this, and only operates when it does this. Hence this property and its possession were derived from the operation of this transportation system. 'Derive' means (see Century Dict.): '(3) To draw or receive, as from a source or origin, or by regular transmission; as to derive ideas from the senses; to derive instruction from a book; his estate is derived from his ancestors.' Clearly the property stolen by defendants was derived from the operation of the transportation system; that is, by means of and because of the operation and use of the system. It was by operating this transportation system that the United States obtained and came into possession of such property. But for such operation of the system the United States would not have had it. So this property so stolen was derived from the possession and use of such transportation system. In operating such a transportation system, the one in possession and operating it holds himself or itself out as a common carrier for hire and invites custom—the delivery to it of property for transportation. This is a necessary part of the use and operation of the system of transportation. The words 'derived from' do not imply that the property stolen or converted by the employee must have been purchased with money earned in carrying on or operating or using the system, or that such property must be a part of that which came to the possession of the government when the transportation system was taken over." This case was affirmed in (1919) 262 Fed. 378, a majority of the court being of the opinion that the goods stolen were not "property derived from or used in connection with the possession, use or operation" of the New York Central Railroad, and that the act contemplated instrumentalities of transportation rather than merchandise carried for freight. However, the court was unanimous in holding that the stealing of the goods did not interfere with and impede the possession, operation, and control of the American Railway Express Company as charged in the third count.

The liability of railroads for acts of negligence occurring during the period of Federal control, and the recovery against them in such cases, will not be affected by the return of these corporations to their owners, or rather the abandonment of supervision by the government, which took place on March 1, 1920. Gilliam v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1920) — N. C. —, 103 S. E. 10; Clements v. Southern R. Co. (1920) — N. C. —, 102 S. E. 399. W. F. F.

FRANK L. BALLAINE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ALASKA NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.
UNITED STATES, Intervener.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit — July 7, 1919.

(259 Fed. 183.)

Railroads — property of United States — liability for tort.

1. No action can be maintained against a railroad company the stock, bonds, and property of which have been purchased by the United States under authority of Congress for public purposes, for a tort committed by the railroad officials, such as the institution of a malicious prosecution.

[See note on this question beginning on page 995.]

United States — liability for tort.

2. The United States cannot be sued for a tort, even though committed by its officers in the discharge of their official duties.

[See 26 R. C. L. 1460, 1461.]

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Third Division of the Territory of Alaska (Brown, Dist. J.) dismissing the complaint against the defendant in an action in which the United States intervened, brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Affirmed.

Statement by Hunt, Circuit Judge:

On April 29, 1915, in the district court for the territory of Alaska, third division, the Alaska Northern Railway Company sued the Alaska Central Railway Company and Frank L. Ballaine to declare a trust for the use of the Alaska Northern Railway Company in and to certain real estate at Seward, Alaska, the legal title to which was in Frank L. Ballaine. In November, 1915, after trial, the court dismissed the action, with costs to the defendant therein. Thereafter, on June 24, 1916, Ballaine brought the present action against the Alaska Northern Railway Company to recover damages, on the ground that the suit heretofore mentioned was maliciously instituted without probable cause. The railway company pleaded that the property of the corporation, at the time the action was brought, was owned by the United States, and that in the former suit the company had acted in good faith on the advice of counsel. Ballaine by reply put in issue the defense of advice by counsel.

Thereafter on October 23, 1916, the United States, by leave of court, intervened and set up that on April 6, 1915, under the Alaska Railroad Act, approved March 12, 1914, the United States had contracted in writing with certain proper parties for the purchase of the railway and the real and personal property of the Alaska Northern Railway Company, and all the stocks and bonds of that corporation; that such agreement "expressly excluded from the purchase made by the United States of America from the Alaska Northern Railway Company any claims of the Alaska Northern Railway Company or of the vendors in said agreement against any person or persons whomsoever, with reference to the title of the Seward town site, otherwise known as United States surveys 726 north and south, of all of which facts plaintiff had due notice;" that the United States has paid in full all moneys agreed by it to be paid under the agreement, and was a bona fide purchaser, owner, and holder of the stocks, assets, and bonds of the railway company, and has taken charge and controlled the road in behalf of the United States, and that the United States never has had any interest in the litigation commenced by the Alaska corporation on April 29, 1915, against Ballaine and others; and that that suit was commenced and prosecuted solely for and in behalf of the former trustees and owners of the Alaska Northern Railway Company. In due course Ballaine answered, and set up that the Alaska Northern Railway Company was operating and maintaining the railroad and that a corporate organization was then in existence; that the United States, through the Secretary of the Interior, knew of the claim of Ballaine against the railway company for damages for alleged malicious prosecution prior to the final payment by the United States for the stocks and bonds of the defendant corporation; that the United States has not exercised any of the rights of sovereignty in the conduct, operation, and maintenance of the railway company, but is engaged in a commercial business in the operation and conduct of the railway, and acquired the assets of the corporation subject to the unliquidated claim of Ballaine for damages sustained by reason of the acts of the former board of directors of the railway company.

The United States demurred to this answer to the complaint in intervention, and on December 3, 1917, the district court dismissed the complaint of Ballaine against the Alaska Northern Railway Company, upon the ground that Ballaine's action was one sounding in tort, and that the real party defendant is the United States, and that there was no jurisdiction to proceed with the cause. Ballaine then sued out a writ of error.

Argued before Gilbert, Ross, and Hunt, Circuit Judges.

Mr. L. V. Ray, for plaintiff in error:

The demurrer of plaintiff to complaint in intervention should have been sustained.

Litchfield v. Goodnow (Litchfield v. Crane) 123 U. S. 549, 31 L. ed. 199, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210.

The plaintiff is entitled to have determined upon testimony submitted, relevant thereto, whether, in the conduct, operation, and maintenance of the Alaska Northern Railway Company, the United States government has abandoned its sovereign capacity and has entered upon a commercial business.

The dismissal of plaintiff's complaint by the lower court, upon the ground that said court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, precludes plaintiff from submitting to a competent tribunal the question of fact as to damage sustained by him, and deprives him of any remedy.

Miss Annette Abbott Adams also for defendant in error and intervenor.

Hunt, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The authority of the United States to acquire the railroad came from the act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, chap. 37, 38 Stat. at L. 305, Comp. Stat. §§ 3593a-3593d, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 8 A.L.R.—63.

336-388, entitled "An Act to Authorize the President of the United States to Locate, Construct, and Operate Railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for Other Purposes."

The Secretary of the Interior, acting by authority of the President, made the written agreement of April 6, 1915, and one of later date for the purchase of the real and personal property of the railway company and of all the stocks and bonds of the corporation. The purpose of the agreement was to secure to the United States entire control and ownership, excluding, however, from the property purchased, any claims of the railway company or the vendors against persons with reference to title to the Seward town site.

Thus while, as between the United States and the railway corporation and its vendors, the United States became the owner of the railroad and stock, it did not purchase any claim that the railroad company had against Ballaine for any matter pertaining to the title to the Seward town site; and Ballaine knew of this agreement. If, under the situation, Ballaine can proceed with this action, and should recover a judgment against the railroad company, he would look for satisfaction to the property held in the name of the corporation. That property, however, is now owned by the United States. It is really the property of the United States; hence, if seized on execution, we would have a judgment creditor in an action in tort interfering with the property owned by the United States, held, it is true, in the name of the railroad company, yet so held for account of the United States by and through an agency in the form of a corporation. That the United States cannot be sued for a tort, even though committed by its officers in the discharge of their official duties, is thoroughly well settled. Peabody v. United States, 231 U. S. 580, 58 L. ed. 351, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159; Smith v. Reeves, 178 U. S. 436, 44 L. ed. 1140, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 919; Occidental Constr. Co. v. United States, 158 C. C. A. 157, 245 Fed. 817; Smith v. Rackliffe, 31 C. C. A. 328, 59 U. S. App. 427, 87 Fed. 964.

To overcome the application of the rule, plaintiff in error argues that in the operation and maintenance of the railroad the United States is carrying on a commercial business, and in such business has, to an extent, abandoned its sovereign capacity. We cannot uphold that view. Congress, in its power to regulate commerce, could construct, or could authorize a corporation or individuals to construct, a railroad, or to buy a railroad, and clearly, in the territories, has a plenary power to grant franchises, to create a railroad system, and to employ the agency of a corporation as a means of accomplishing such object. California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 39, 32 L. ed. 150, 157, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073. In Luxton v. North River Bridge Co. 153 U. S. 525, 38 L. ed. 808, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 891, the court held that Congress could create corporations as appropriate means of executing the powers of government, as, for instance, a railroad corporation, for the purpose of promoting commerce among the states. Indiana v. United States, 148 U. S. 148, 37 L. ed. 401, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564. The Act of March 12, 1914, chap. 37, heretofore cited, which authorizes the President to locate, construct, and operate railroads in Alaska, expressly provides that the Alaska railroad is for the settlement of public lands and for transportation of coal for the Army and Navy, for the transportation of troops, arms, munitions of war, the mails, and for "other governmental and public uses," and to transport passengers and property. The act (§ 4) also confers authority upon the President, through such agents as he may appoint or employ, to do all necessary acts, in addition to those specially authorized, to enable him to accomplish the purposes of the act. By § 1 the President is authorized to purchase or acquire other railroads to carry out the purposes of the act, and to employ officers and agents in order to accomplish the purpose of the legislation. Taking all these provisions together, they plainly show that the United States, in acquiring the stocks and bonds and property of the Alaska Northern Railway Company, acted in its sovereign capacity, and, in exercising entire control, possession, ownership, and management, has merely employed the corporate organization as an agency through which to execute the purposes of the statute.

Instances of where a state government was carrying on a private enterprise, but where it was held that a suit could not be maintained against the objection of the state, are found in Murray v. Wilson Distilling Co. 213 U. S. 151, 53 L. ed. 742, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458, and Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. 109 U. S. 446, 27 L. ed. 992, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 292, 609. Salas v. United States, 148 C. C. A. 440, 234 Fed. 842, cited by the plaintiff in error, is to be distinguished. There Burke and Salas were indicted for conspiring to defraud the United States. The United States owned all of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company, and, through the Isthmian Canal Commission and its subsistence department, food supplies were furnished to the employees on the Isthmus and to the commissary department of the railroad company, which bought and furnished all other supplies. Burke was manager of the commissary department of the railroad. The court of appeals was of opinion that the United States had entered into commercial business in the premises and was to be treated like any other corporation, and that the combination proved on the trial was not one intended to defraud the United States. Here, however, the United States holds the railroad and stock for public purposes under clear statutory authority, and it operates the road in the necessary discharge of its duty to the public, and in our judgment, in this, a civil action, can claim the privileges and immunities of a sovereign. See authorities heretofore cited: Murray v. Wilson

Our opinion is that the United States has, by the pleadings, shown itself to be the real party in interest, and can claim the immunity set up in the complaint in intervention.

The judgment is affirmed.

Suit against railroad owned by or in which interest is held by United States or state.

1. Introductory.

This annotation is confined to a discussion of the right of action against a railroad owned in whole or in part by a state or by the United States, or in which a state or the Federal government has an interest. Cases arising during the period of Federal control of railroads are not included, such cases being collected and considered in the annotation to L. N. Dantzler Lumber Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 4 A.L.R. 1680.

II. In absence of legislative permission.

Immunity from suit is an attribute of every sovereign, and it is well settled that neither the United States nor a state can be sued without its consent. Consequently a railroad owned or controlled by the United States or by a state is, as a general proposition, not subject to suit; and it seems that a suit will be dismissed if the United States or a state is an indispensable party, by reason of an interest which it holds in the corporation. Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. (1883) 109 U. S. 446, 27 L. ed. 992, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 292, 609; Christian v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. (1889) 133 U. S. 233, 33 L. ed. 589, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 260; *Swasey v. 185; Troy & G. R. Co. v. Com. (1879) 127 Mass. 43. And see the reported case (BALLAINE v. ALASKA NORTHERN R. Co. ante, 990). Compare Salas v. United States (1916) 148 C. C. A. 440, 234 Fed. 842; Panama R. Co. v. Curran (1919) 168 C. C. A. 114, 256 Fed. 768; Panama R. Co. v. Robert (1919) 168 C. C. A. 119, 256 Fed. 773.

The rule just stated has been applied in the case of a railroad in the possession of a state as mortgagor after default. Thus, in Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. (U. S.) supra, it appeared that the state assembly of Georgia passed an act authorizing the governor to indorse bonds of a railroad company. The governor indorsed the bonds, which were afterwards negotiated by the company. The statute under which this was done made the indorsement of these bonds operate as a prior mortgage on all the property of the company, which could be enforced by a sale by the governor, on default in payment of the bonds so indorsed, or of interest falling due on them. In addition to this the company executed and delivered to the governor a written mortgage, confirming the lien created by the statute, which was duly acknowledged and recorded. The company failed to pay the interest coupons on the bonds, and the governor of the state, under the power vested in him, took possession of the road, putting it into the hands of a receiver, who sold and conveyed it to the state. Thereupon the state, by its officers, took possession of and operated the road. Subsequently the holders of a second mortgage on the same property filed a bill to foreclose their mortgage and to set aside the sale made by the receiver as invalid, and to have priority of lien for reasons stated in the bill. The governor, the state treasurer, and the state directors of the road were made parties defendant. The Supreme Court of the United States held that as the state was an indispensable party the bill would not lie, saying: "In the case now under consideration, the state of Georgia is an indispensable party. It is in fact the only proper defendant in the case. No one sued has any personal interest in the matter or any official authority to grant the relief asked. No foreclosure suit can be sustained without the state, because she has the legal title to the property, and the purchaser under a foreclosure decree would get no title in the absence of the state. The state is in the actual possession of the property, and the court can deliver no possession to the purchaser. The entire interest adverse to plaintiff in this suit is the interest of the state of Georgia in the property, of which she has both the title and possession." So, in Troy & G. R. Co. v. Com. (1879) 127 Mass. 43, a bill in equity was filed, the object of which was to redeem the entire railroad franchise and property of the Troy & Greenfield Railroad Company, mortgaged by that corporation to the commonwealth, and surrendered to the commonwealth under a statute which provided that "the right of redemption shall not be barred until ten years have elapsed after said railroad and tunnel are completed and the same open for use." The statute in question made no provision as to the manner of asserting this right of redemption. A demurrer to the bill was sustained and the bill was dismissed, the court holding that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The court said: "It is a fundamental principle of our jurisprudence that the commonwealth cannot be impleaded in its own courts, except by its own consent, clearly manifested by act of the legislature; and this principle is applicable to actions to recover real estate, and to bills in equity to enforce trusts, or to foreclose or redeem mortgages."

In like manner the ownership of railroad stock by a state has been held to make it improper to adjudicate a lien on the railroad property, since the state, a necessary party, was immune from suit. Christian v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. (1889) 133 U. S. 233, 33 L. ed. 589, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 260. In that case the evidence showed that the state of North Carolina, under power conferred by statute, subscribed for stock in a railroad company, paying for it with the proceeds of state bonds issued for that purpose. It was provided in the act that all the stock held by the state should be pledged as security for the redemption of the bonds, and that any dividends which might from time to time be declared on the stock held by the state should be applied to the payment of the interest accruing on the bonds. The state being in default in the payment of interest, action was brought by a bondholder against the railroad company, its president and directors, the proxy representing the stock owned by the state, and the state treasurer, to obtain on behalf of the complainant and other bondholders, the adjudication of a lien on the stock held by the state and on the dividends on the stock, and the enforcement of that lien by requiring the dividends to be paid to the bondholders in satisfaction of the amount due on their bonds; and, if those were insufficient, by a sale of the stock, or so much as might be necessary, aided by the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the dividends, and an injunction to restrain the railroad company and its officers from paying to the state treasurer, or to any other person on behalf of the state, and to restrain the state treasurer from receiving, any moneys accruing and payable as dividends on the stock. It was contended for the complainant that the proceeding was in rem against the stock, to enforce a right in and to it, resulting from an alleged contract by which the stock was pledged for the benefit of the complainant, although the stock was not actually delivered to the alleged pledgee; and that in consequence it was not necessary to make the state a party. It was held that the mere declaration by the state, in a statute, that stock held by it was pledged, did not technically operate to create a pledge, but that this was nothing more than a promise that the stock should be held and set apart for the payment of the bonds, and that the dividends should be applied to the interest. As to the hypothesis that a mortgage of the stock was effected, the court said: "The proceeding is a suit against the party, to obtain by decree of court the benefit of the mortgage right. But where the mortgagor in possession is a sovereign state, no such proceeding can be maintained. The mortgagee's right against the state may be just as good and valid, in a moral point of view, as if it were against an individual. But the state cannot be brought into court or sued by a private party without its consent. It was at first held by this court that, under the Constitution of the United States, a state might be sued in it by a citizen of another state, or of a foreign state; but it was declared by the 11th Amendment that the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to such suits." But in Swasey v. North Carolina R. Co. (1874) 1 Hughes, 17, 71 N. C. 571, Fed. Cas. No. 13,679, a somewhat similar case, it appeared that the state subscribed to part of the stock of the defendant railroad. In an action against the railroad company it was insisted by the defendant that the state was in fact a party defendant, and in consequence the court could not entertain jurisdiction of the cause. To this contention, however, the court said: "The state, although directly interested in the subject-matter of the litigation, is not a party to the record. The 11th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that no suit can be prosecuted in this court against a state, or by citizens or subjects of a foreign state. It has long been held, however, that this amendment applies only to suits in which a state is a party to the record, and not to those in which it has an interest merely." It was held that, inasmuch as the stock which belonged to the state was pledged for the payment of complainant's bonds, it was held by the railroad company as trustee for the bondholders as well as the state, and that, since the trustee was a party to the suit, it was not necessary that the state should be a party.

In Meier v. Kansas P. R. Co. (1877) 4 Dill. 378, Fed. Cas. No. 9,394, a bill was originally filed in the state court to foreclose a mortgage on the railroad and property of the Kansas Pacific Railway Company. The United States, under an act of Congress, had certain rights in and liens on the property, and was made a defendant to the bill, but entered no appearance. After removal of the suit to the United States court, the complainant moved that a notice be issued, addressed to the Attorney General, notifying him that a suit had been instituted against the United States, accompanied by a copy of the complaint, and requesting him to appear and state whether the United States claimed any right in the premises which were the subject-matter of the action, and whether the United States desired any adjudication of its rights. The motion was granted, but the court did not commit itself to the proposition whether it could, on the final hearing, pronounce a decree against the United States, without an authorized appearance by the Attorney General.

The relation of the United States to the Panama Railroad Company seems to be such that the immunity of the government from suit does not attach to that railroad. Thus, in Panama R. Co. v. Curran (1919) 168 C. C. A. 114, 256 Fed. 768, action was brought against the defendant railroad company for the recovery of damages claimed to have resulted from injuries sustained by the plaintiff, in consequence of her slipping and falling on the floor of the defendant's commissary in the Canal Zone. The right of the plaintiff to maintain the action was brought into question on the ground that the commissary, at which the injury complained of occurred, was not being operated by the defendant under its charter and by-laws, but, at the time of the injury and for some years prior thereto, was operated by the defendant as an agency of the government of the United States in the construction and operation of the Panama Canal. It was held that an intention to preserve the existence of the Panama Railroad as a private corporation was clearly manifested in acts of Congress, and departmental regulations and rulings, and in consequence the suit would lie although the United States government owned all of the stock of the company. In this connection the court said: "From the fact that one owns all the stock of a private corporation it does not follow that the acts of the corporation are to be treated, not as its acts, but as the acts of its sole stockholder." See to the same effect, Panama R. Co. v. Robert (1919) 168 C. C. A. 119, 256 Fed. 773.

The same view is supported by Salas v. United States (1916) 148 C. C. A. 440, 234 Fed. 842, a case not strictly within the scope of this note, but which is cited and distinguished in the reported case (BALLAINE v. ALASKA NORTHERN R. Co. ante, 990). In that case it appeared that the defendant and one Burke, who was the manager of the commissary department of the Panama Railroad Company, were indicted for conspiring to defraud the United States. It was held that although the government owned all of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company, the combination proved was not one intended to defraud the United States, or when the United States entered into a commercial business it abandoned its sovereign capacity, and was to be treated like any other corporation.

But in the reported case (BALLAINE v. ALASKA NORTHERN R. Co.) it is held that the ownership by the Federal government of the Alaska Northern Railroad Company, under the Act of March 12, 1914 (1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 336), precludes an action against that company.

Though somewhat beside the purview of this discussion, it may be noted in this connection that state ownership of a railroad has been held to preclude proceedings to condemn an easement over the right of way. West- ern U. Teleg. Co. v. Western & A. R. Co. (1914) 142 Ga. 532, 83 S. E. 135. In that case condemnation proceedings were instituted by a telegraph company to condemn a right of way over a railroad line which was owned by the state, but was operated by a lessee. It was held that the proceedings were properly enjoined, since the lessee held only a usufructuary interest which could not be condemned separately and apart from the state, and the legislature had made no provision for the condemnation of property belonging to the state.

III. By legislative permission.

Permission has in some instances been granted by a state legislature, to sue a railroad which the state owns or has an interest in. Thus, in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1897) — Tenn. —, 51 S. W. 202, action was brought in Tennessee against certain railroad companies and the state of Georgia, owner of the Western & Atlantic Railroad. The state demurred to the complaint, insisting that she could not be sued because she was a sovereign state. It appeared that by a statute of Tennessee the state of Georgia was authorized to construct a railroad in Tennessee, and was given all the "rights, privileges, and immunities, with the same restrictions," which were granted by a former act to the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad Company. That act included, among the rights and restrictions, the right to sue and be sued. It was held that the state of Georgia was, under the act, subject to suit.

So in Western & A. R. Co. v. Carlton (1859) 23 Ga. 180, action was instituted against the superintendent of the Western & Atlantic Railroad for the recovery of damages to a shipment of freight. The state owned and operated the railroad. A statute provided that persons having claims against the railroad should present them to the superintendent of the railroad, and that, if a dispute should arise concerning any claim which could not be amicably settled, the claimant might bring suit against the superintendent of the railroad. It was insisted that, as the state was not a common carrier, it was not subject to the rules of law applicable to common carriers. Answering this contention, the court said: "When a state embarks in an enterprise which is usually carried on by individual persons or companies, it voluntarily waives its sovereign character and is subject to like regulations with persons engaged in the same calling. . . . We think, then, that the state, engaging in the carrying business, assumes the obligations and liabilities incident to that business when carried on by individuals, and the remedy is by suit against the superintendent of the road when the claim cannot be adjusted without."

Likewise, in Amstein v. Gardner (1883) 134 Mass. 4, action was brought against the manager of the Troy & Greenfield Railroad and the Hoosac tunnel to recover damages for injuries occasioned to the plaintiff's horse by falling into an opening between the ties of a bridge. The railroad, it appeared, was owned by the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and provision was made by statute for bringing suits for damages against the manager of the railroad. It was held that the action could be maintained against the defendant manager, although the injury occurred in consequence of defective construction, which was the fault of a former manager. *W. F. (— Mass. —, 125 N. E. 691.)

Mortgage — foreclosure — sale at less than value — effect.

1. A sale under mortgage foreclosure is not invalidated by mere absence of bidders other than a representative of the mortgagee, nor the fact that the property brought substantially less than its value.

Evidence — bad faith in mortgage foreclosure.

2. That a sale under mortgage foreclosure was held on a cold winter morning, with no one present but a representative of the mortgagee, does not establish that the mortgagee acted in bad faith with a purpose to secure the property to itself at its own price.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County (Hitchcock, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained from the foreclosure, under a power of sale, of certain mortgages owned by plaintiff, which resulted in a verdict in his favor. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William E. Clapp for defendant.
Messrs. James E. Cavanagh and Philip A. Hendrick for plaintiff.

Pierce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort to recover damages resulting to the plaintiff from the foreclosure, under a power of sale, of certain mortgages on five distinct parcels of land situated in Watertown, Massachusetts, and owned by the plaintiff. The declaration is in five counts. Each count, after describing a particular mortgaged parcel of land, set out as the grievance complained of "that in the acceptance of said mortgage the defendant was bound in the exercise of the power of sale therein contained to observe good faith and suitable regard for the interest of the plaintiff in any sale that might be made under or by virtue of said power of sale; that on or about [February 2, 1918] the defendant undertook and did sell said parcel of land with the buildings thereon at public auction, but in the conduct of said sale the defendant did not exercise good faith or suitable regard for the interest of the plaintiff in the manner and conduct of the said sale, or in the advertising thereof, nor in the time in which said sale took place, but on the contrary, and notwithstanding the protest of the plaintiff, the said premises were sold for a price far below its fair market value, and by reason of the lack of good faith on the part of the defendant, and the careless and negligent manner in which said sale was conducted, the plaintiff has been damaged."

Primarily the case is before this court, after a verdict for the plaintiff, on exceptions to the refusal of the presiding judge to direct a verdict for the defendant.

"The plaintiff admitted the legality of the mortgages, admitted that the same were overdue and that the bank had the right to foreclose, admitted that the notices of foreclosure were published in accordance with the requirements of the statute, and of the mortgage, and that the sale was made by a licensed auctioneer," and rested his case "wholly upon this proposition: That notwithstanding a literal compliance with the requirements of the mortgage and of the statute relative to foreclosure of mortgages, the bank did not exercise good faith and a reasonable regard for the interests of the plaintiff in the conduct of the sale." In essence, the allegation of the declaration, as interpreted by the plaintiff, is a charge of bad faith, evidenced by a dishonest intention to take an unconscionable advantage of the plaintiff through the forms of law and a literal compliance with the terms of the mortgage agreement. Clark v. Simmons, 150 Mass. 357, 23 N. E. 108; Bon v. Graves, 216 Mass. 440, 447, 103 N. E. 1023.

The circumstances bearing upon the good faith of the bank are as follows: In November, the notes and mortgages then being overdue four months, the bank told the plaintiff in substance that the work on the buildings in process of construction must go on more rapidly; that the interest of the bank was being jeopardized by letting the property be with only one or two men working on it; and that some action on foreclosing the property would be necessitated unless the work was carried on more rapidly. In the middle of January, 1918, the plaintiff was again told that the interest of the bank was jeopardized by the fact that no further work was done after the talk in the previous November. Foreclosure proceedings began January 11, 1918, by publication in a newspaper published in Watertown, Massachusetts, as required by the mortgages, and the notice was again published in the same paper on January 18 and 25. Saturday, February 2, 1918, was designated as the date of the sale of all the lots,—the first to be sold at 9 o'clock in the morning, and the others at ten-minute intervals until 10:40 A. M. As regards the notice the plaintiff testified: "I wasn't surprised that the bank took some action at the time they started foreclosure. The work stopped November 25, and practically five months the bank did nothing except protest to me before starting foreclosure proceedings. I received notice of the foreclosure sale of all these lots on January 17, 1918. I knew what it was. I had personal knowledge of this sale to take place on February 2, on January 16 or 17. I was personally present as a result of the notice of that sale."

In November, when the work had ceased entirely, efforts were made by the defendant with the knowledge and desire of the plaintiff, by advertisement in the papers, to interest contractors and at least one lumber dealer to take over the houses and finish them; and the plaintiff testified that he was glad to have somebody come to his rescue and to have the defendant make some effort to assist him at this time. No success, however, was attained, and after foreclosure proceedings were determined upon efforts were made by the defendant to interest people as customers to attend the sale and buy the property.

As advertised, the sales were held on February 2, 1918,—a very cold morning, clear and bright. There were present when the first sale began, the plaintiff, the auctioneer, and an attorney for the bank. The plaintiff testified: "After the first house was put up for bid there wasn't anybody there. I said, 'I protest this sale; this is a farce; this is not a sale.'"

When the second sale began he said: "I protest this sale; this thing should be postponed; there are no bidders here."

At the third sale the plaintiff again protested. No evidence was offered by the plaintiff or by others to establish or to warrant an inference that an adjournment of the sale would have been likely to have attracted a larger number of bidders, some one or more of whom would have been ready and willing to pay a substantially greater sum for any parcel of land than was in fact bid by the defendants. Of course the mere absence of bidders other than the representative of the mortgagee does not make the sale invalid; nor does the fact that the estate brought substantially less than its value, as found by the jury. Learned v. Geer, 189 Mass. 31, 29 N. E. 215; Vahey v. Bigelow, 208 Mass. 89, 92, 93, 94 N. E. 249; Taylor v. Weingartner, 223 Mass. 248, 248, 111 N. E. 909; Radley v. Shackford, 226 Mass. 435, 115 N. E. 924.

Mortgage—
foreclosure—sale at less than value—effect.

Upon a consideration of all the evidence, we are of opinion the facts, considered separably and collectively, do not warrant an inference, much less prove, that the defendant acted in bad faith, with a purpose to secure the property to itself at its own price "rather than to make a fair sale in accordance with the power, under such conditions as are rationally calculated to result in getting for the property as much as it reasonably may be made to bring." Bon v. Graves, supra. Nor do we think the evidence was sufficient to support the claim that the sale was conducted in a careless or negligent manner, or to warrant the submission of that issue to the jury.

Evidence—bad faith in mortgage
foreclosure.

The motion to direct a verdict for the defendant should have been allowed, and judgment should now be entered for the defendant. Stat. 1909, chap. 236, § 1.

So ordered.

Sale under power in mortgage or trust deed as affected by inadequacy of price.

I. Introductory.

It will be observed that many cases are cited below to the proposition that mere inadequacy of price alone is not sufficient to invalidate the sale of land under a power in a mortgage or deed of trust. These are cases where the rule is not qualified. The reader, however, will understand that these cases were not necessarily decided on the principle that no inadequacy of price could be great enough to demand the interference of a court of equity. Comparatively few of the cases are so definite. It will also be observed that there is a considerable number of cases where the court, while declining to interfere, suggests or declares that there might be an inadequacy of price great enough to require interference, but that, on the other hand, there are very few cases in which sales under such powers have been set aside for inadequacy of price alone. It is clear that the courts prefer to find some other element of attack than inadequacy of price, even when that is very great.

Sales of chattels, and sales, where the statute requires a certain percentage of an appraisement, are excluded.

II. The rule.

Mere inadequacy of price alone is not sufficient to invalidate a sale of land under a power in a mortgage or deed of trust.

"The fact that the lands sold at the foreclosure sale for a price greatly disproportionate to their real value does not invalidate or affect the sale." Hunter v. Mellen (1890) 127 Ala. 343, 28 So. 468.

In Harmon v. Dothan Nat. Bank (1914) 186 Ala. 360, 64 So. 621, the court said: "It has been repeatedly held by this court, and must now be regarded as settled law, that gross inadequacy of the price paid by the purchaser at a foreclosure sale will not of itself, even in a court of equity, invalidate or affect the sale."

It is only in conjunction with other facts that inadequacy of price is a ground to invalidate a sale. Hudgins v. Morrow (1886) 47 Ark. 515, 2 S. W. 104.

In Downing v. Brennan (1919) 282 Mass. 535, 122 N. E. 729, the court said: "The allegation that the property was worth much more than the indebtedness, standing alone, does not impair the validity of the foreclosure sale, where it appears that in making and conducting the sale the mortgagee acted in good faith and with reasonable regard for the interests of the mortgagor."

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (MANNING v. LIBERTY TRUST Co. ante, 999) that mere inadequacy of price does not justify the submission to the jury of the case of an action of tort by the mortgagor against the mortgagee for damages on account of its sale under the power, the court stating that such inadequacy does not make the sale invalid.

In Thornton v. Goodman (1919) — Tex. —, 216 S. W. 147, the court said: "The sale was valid, without taint of fraud, unfairness, or slightest irregularity, or any circumstances tending to prevent the property from bringing approximately its reasonable value. This being true, the sale cannot be avoided merely because of inadequacy of price."

Where one of the creditors bought the property for one half of its alleged value, the court said: "We do not say but what the facts in this case create suspicion of fraud upon our minds. But we cannot give plaintiff the relief demanded because we may suspect that there has been something wrong—fraud—in this transaction, on the part of the defendants." Monroe Bros. v. Fuchter (1897) 121 N. C. 101, 23 S. E. 68.

In Maloney v. Webb (1892) 112 Mo. 575, 20 S. W. 683, the court, in reversing a judgment setting aside a sale for one half the value of the property, said: "While sales made by a trustee, being a harsh mode of foreclosing the equity of redemption, have ever been watched by this court with a jealous eye, and a disposition not to sustain them unless conducted in all fairness is manifested in all the decisions, . . . yet no case can be found in which such a sale was set aside upon the sole ground that the price was inadequate. Nevertheless, it is strongly intimated in some of the opinions that this might be done where the inadequacy was so gross as to shock the moral sense. At forced sales, property is often sold for 50 per cent of its true value. While this fact may be the source of regret, and enlist our sympathies for the one whose property is sacrificed, yet its occurrence is so frequent that it can hardly be said to be unexpected, must less to shock the moral sense. To set aside sales for such inadequacy would have a tendency to impair, if not destroy, the value of such securities, to seriously embarrass business operations, be productive of incalculable injury, and is without precedent."

"It is to be regretted that the property in controversy brought, at most, not more than one fourth of its value at the trustee's sale, but such things frequently happen, and will continue to happen as long as people encumber property for debts which they do not or cannot pay." Roby v. Smith (1914) 261 Mo. 192, 168 S. W. 965.

It is no badge of fraud that property sold under a deed of trust to secure $750, and later sold for $700, brought only $25 at the sale. Routt v. Milner (1894) 57 Mo. App. 50. And in Betzler v. James (1910) 227 Mo. 375, 126 S. W. 1007, it was held to be error to set aside a sale for $275 of property worth $700.

Sometimes it is held that the creditor is never required to bid more than his debt and expenses. Thus the court upheld the purchase by the creditor of property worth $4,000, for $113.22. Bailey v. Hendrickson (1913) 25 N. D. 500, 143 N. W. 134, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 739. So the court sustained the purchase by the holder of a second mortgage, for the amount of the debt and expenses—about $100—of property worth about $3,000 above the first mortgage. Loomis v. Stoddard (1919) — S. D. —, 173 N. W. 859.

In Klein v. Glass (1880) 53 Tex. 37, the court sustained a sale to the creditor for $100, of property worth $2,000, where the trial judge charged the jury: "The validity of the trust sale, if in other respects valid, would not be affected by the mere fact that the lot at the sale may have brought much less than its value; but if property is sold at a grossly inadequate price, unless there be other evidence tending to show fraud in the sale, then such inadequacy of price cannot be taken into consideration for the purpose of showing the sale to be fraudulent."

In Eustis v. Frey (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 204 S. W. 118, the court sustained a sale to the creditor for 5 per cent of the value.

III. Cases supporting the rule, but stating or suggesting a qualification.

There are many cases which, while holding that the inadequacy of price is no ground to invalidate the sale, suggest or state that there might be an inadequacy of price so great as to require the interference of a court of equity.

Canada.—Saltman v. McColl (1910) 19 Manitoba L. R. 456.

(It is not clear whether or not a qualification of the rule is suggested or intended in Austin v. Hatch (1893) 159 Mass. 198, 84 N. E. 95; Keith v. Browning (1897) 189 Mo. 190, 40 S. W. 764; or in Charles Green Real Estate Co. v. St. Louis Mut. House Bldg. Co. (1906) 196 Mo. 858, 98 S. W. 1111.)

Thus it is suggested that the inadequacy may be so great as to shock the conscience of the court. Clark v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. (Clark v. Eaton) (1879) 100 U. S. 149, 25 L. ed. 573 (purchase by creditor); Martin v. Barth (1894) 4 Colo. App. 346, 36 Pac. 72; Anderson v. White (1894) 2 App. D. C. 408; Weyburn v. So, it is suggested or declared that the inadequacy may be so great as to raise a presumption or inference of fraud.

Virginia.—Hopkins v. Givens (1916) 119 Va. 578, 89 S. E. 871.

West Virginia.—Lallance v. Fisher (1887) 29 W. Va. 512, 2 S. E. 775 (as stating the rule); Copelan v. Sohn (1914) 75 W. Va. 83, 82 S. E. 1016 (obiter).

In Clark v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. (Clark v. Eaton) (1879) 100 U. S. 149, 25 L. ed. 573, the court, in refusing to set aside a sale to the mortgagee, said: "It is next contended that relief should be given because the price which the property brought was grossly inadequate. That fact alone does not constitute a sufficient reason to impeach the genuineness or validity of the sale. Besides, the inadequacy was not such as to shock the conscience, or raise a presumption of fraud or unfairness."

The general doctrine is that, where there are no other equitable incidents, a sale will not be set aside "because the price is inadequate, unless the case very clearly demonstrates that a difference between the value of the property and the price that it brought is such as to shock the judgment and conscience of the chancellor." Martin v. Barth (1894) 4 Colo. App. 346, 36 Pac. 72.

"The familiar doctrine as to inadequacy of price is that, before a sale will be set aside for inadequacy of price alone, it must appear that the price was so grossly inadequate as to shock the moral sense, and create at once, upon its being mentioned, a suspicion of fraud." Bailor v. Daly (1889) 7 Mackey (D. C.) 175. Evidently the same idea was in the court's mind in Starkweather v. Jenner (1902) 27 App. D. C. 348.

"Mere inadequacy of price is not sufficient to avoid a deed, unless so gross as to shock the conscience of the chancellor and raise a presumption of fraud." Hopkins v. Givens (1916) 119 Va. 578, 89 S. E. 871.

In Maryland, where the statute requires the report of sale and ratification, the same general rule applies.

Thus, there must be such inadequacy as to indicate misconduct or fraud. Shaw v. Smith (1908) 107 Md. 523, 69 Atl. 116 (purchase by creditor). This is, in substance, the theory of McCarty v. Hamburger (1910) 112 Md. 40, 75 Atl. 964, and probably of Chilton v. Brooks (1889) 71 Md. 445, 18 Atl. 868. In Condon v. Maynard (1889) 71 Md. 601, 18 Atl. 957, the court said: "Mere inadequacy of price is not sufficient to set aside a sale, unless it be so gross as to indicate want of reasonable judgment and discretion, or misconduct and fraud in the mortgagee, or some mistake or unfairness for which the purchaser is responsible." The same was held in substance on a sale to the creditor. Warfield v. Ross (1873) 38 Md. 85. In Davis v. Blackiston (1908) 108 Md. 640, 71 Atl. 89, it was held that a sale to the creditor for one half of the value is not so inadequate as to require the same to be set aside.

Gross inadequacy of price is required to set aside a sale. Hoyt v. Pawtucket Inst. for Sav. (1884) 110 Ill. 390. It must be sufficient to amount to evidence of fraud. Magnuson v. Williams (1884) 111 Ill. 450; Reedy v. Millizen (1895) 155 Ill. 636, 40 N. E. 1028. (as stating the rule). It must be so gross as to raise the inference of fraud or imposition. Harlin v. Nation (1894) 126 Mo. 97, 27 S. W. 330. The inadequacy must be very great. Atkinson v. Washington & J. College (1908) 54 W. Va. 32, 46 S. E. 253 (defeating action of subsequent lienor).

A sale for three fourths of the value is not grossly inadequate. Pence v. Jamison (1917) 80 W. Va. 761, 94 S. E. 383.

In Saltman v. McColl (1910) 19 Manitoba L. R. 456, it was held that "a sale by public auction of a property valued at $7,200, for $4,850," is not "one at a gross undervalue, calling for the interference of a court of equity."

A sale for $20,100 of property worth from $30,000 to $35,000 is not so inadequate in price as to shock the conscience or raise the suspicion of unfairness. Anderson v. White (1894) 2 App. D. C. 408.

Nor does a sale to a creditor for about four sevenths of the value indicate misconduct, unfairness, or fraud on the part of the trustee. Stockwell v. Barnum (1908) 7 Cal. App. 413, 94 Pac. 400.

Where the land was bought by the creditor for 40 per cent of its value, the court said: "It is settled law, however, in this state, that a sale of land made by a trustee, otherwise valid, will not be set aside for mere inadequacy of price, unless the inadequacy is such as to shock the conscience. While the sale of this land was for less than its actual value, we would be unwilling to disturb the sale on that account." Weyburn v. Watkins (1907) 90 Miss. 728, 44 So. 145.

In Markwell v. Markwell (1900) 157 Mo. 326, 57 S. W. 1078, the court said: "But the mere fact that the land brought about one third of its value was not such inadequacy of price as to justify the court in setting aside the sale upon that ground alone."

The price will not invalidate the sale, if not grossly inadequate. Singleton v. Scott (1859) 11 Iowa, 539, sustaining the sale for $150, of property valued at from $320 to $1,600.

A sale for $100 to the creditor, of property worth $500, is not so grossly inadequate as to raise the inference of fraud. Harlin v. Nation (1894) 126 Mo. 97, 27 S. W. 330.

IV. Qualification of rule.

It has been held in a few cases that inadequacy of price may be great enough to invalidate a sale. Vail v. Jacobs (1876) 62 Mo. 130; Wright v. Wilson (1829) 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 294, Rohrer v. Strickland (1914) 116 Va. 755, 82 S. E. 711; Hope v. Valley City Salt Co. (1885) 25 W. Va. 789. See also Horse v. Hough (1873) 38 Md. 130, infra, V.

Thus, a sale under a trust deed to the creditor, for $1,000, of property worth from $5,000 to $8,000, was set aside. Vail v. Jacobs (Mo.) supra.

So, a sale under a trust deed for $50, to a creditor, of land worth $500 or $600, was set aside in Wright v. Wilson (1829) 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 294. The complaining surety was out of the state at the time of the sale, but the court does not dwell on this fact.

So, sales under trust deeds to creditors, at from one fifth to one third of the value of the properties, were set aside as so grossly inadequate as to be almost conclusive evidence of fraud. Hope v. Valley City Salt Co. (1885) 25 W. Va. 789.

In Rohrer v. Strickland (1914) 116 Va. 755, 82 S. E. 711, relief was granted to the debtor where the creditor purchased for less than 40 per cent of the value, and the trustee was the creditor's son-in-law.

In reversing a decree dismissing a bill to set aside a sale, the court said: "The bill charges that Mr. Bell, the beneficiary in the trust deed, purchased the property for one seventh of its value; that complainant was not present at the sale, knew nothing about it, and did not even know that the trustee had accepted the duties imposed upon him by the instrument. These facts being true, the complainant will be entitled to set aside the sale for inadequacy of consideration." Fenton v. Bell (1899) — Tenn. —, 53 S. W. 984.

Strictly speaking, cases in which inadequacy of price is dealt with as only one of several grounds of attack on the sale are beyond the scope of this annotation, but a few out of the multitude of cases of this character are here referred to by way of illustration.

It is usual to see in the books statements to the effect that inadequacy of price, with other elements, is a cogent reason for setting aside a sale. This hardly seems a satisfactory way of stating the situation. In most cases inadequacy of price is the result complained of; it is usually only because of the inadequacy of price that the complaint is made. That is to say, there are few attacks on sales in which there is not a real or alleged inadequacy of price.

The inadequacy of price has been held material in sales—

—where there was evidence of fraud and oppression, and the price was about 5 per cent of the value, Ventres v. Cobb (1882) 105 Ill. 83;

—where there were circumstances of undue advantage, Elmslie v. Mayor (1903) — Miss. —, 35 So. 201; McPherson v. Davis (1909) 95 Miss. 215, 48 So. 625;

—where the sale was at an unusual time, and for one third of the value, Holdsworth v. Shannon (1893) 113 Mo. 508, 35 Am. St. Rep. 719, 21 S. W. 85;

—where the sale was not made in parcels, Dozier v. Farrior (1914) 187 Ala. 181, 65 So. 364; Montgomery v. Miller (1895) 131 Mo. 598, 33 S. W. 165 (perhaps this is the most common cause of complaint);

—where the purchaser deterred other bidders, Chew v. Baker (1919) 133 Md. 637, 105 Atl. 756 (where the statute required report of sale and ratification);

—where the mortgagee's president kept the bidder away, Loeber v. Eckes (1880) 55 Md. 1.

In a case where a sale for $2,000 of property worth about $7,000 was set aside as not made in parcels, the court said: "Mere inadequacy of price is not sufficient to set aside a sale, unless so gross and inordinate as to furnish in itself evidence of fraud or misconduct on the part of the trustee. This is the recognized rule; and if these objections stood alone upon the simple fact of a sale largely under value, there would be a strong disposition to set it aside on this ground." Hubbard v. Jarrell (1865) 23 Md. 66 (where the statute required report of sale and ratification).

The court set aside a sale for one fourth of the value in the absence of the debtor without fault (Meath v. Porter (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 224); and a sale for one ninth of the value, where the debtor mistakenly supposed that he had an agreement for a postponement (Daggett Hardware Co. v. Brownlee (1905) 186 Mo. 621, 85 S. W. 545); and a sale for $40, made under the supposition that there was an encumbrance of $900, when there was no encumbrance, and the property was worth $5,000 (Hoffman v. McCracken (1902) 168 Mo. 337, 67 S. W. 878).

Where the sale was made for at least one fifth less than the value, and was made in the dark, and not in parcels, the court, in setting it aside, said: "Without deciding that the insufficiency of price disclosed by the testimony in this case is so great as to amount to the 'gross inadequacy' referred to in the books, it is yet so serious that we must be satisfied the other charges of irregularities and improvidence in the conduct of the sale are not sustained by the proof, before the court can agree to confirm it." Fowler v. Taylor (1890) 8 Mackey (D. C.) 456.

In Montgomery v. Miller (1895) 131 Mo. 598, 33 S. W. 165, the court said: "It thus appears that the property was sold in bulk, for an inadequate price, at an unusual hour, and the plaintiff's entire interest in the property sacrificed thereby. While no one of these facts would of itself afford ground for setting aside the sale, yet when all of them are found concurring, as they do in this sale, otherwise not void of suspicion, the sale should be set aside, and the plaintiff be permitted to redeem."

Where a sale for one fifth of the value was set aside because the purchaser slandered the title, the court said: "It may be said generally that mere inadequacy of price, independent of other grounds of relief, will not invalidate a sale, but it is a cogent circumstance to be considered by the jury when it appears, in connection with it, that there has been unfairness, or that an undue advantage has been taken, or that there has been any other inequitable conduct, and a court of equity will readily seize upon any such incident as a ground of relief when the property has sold for a price so low as to result in hardship." Davis v. Keen (1906) 142 N. C. 497, 55 S. E. 359.

A sale was set aside when made for an inadequate price to a stockholder of the creditor, and there was evidence of favoritism by the trustee, who was president of the creditor, and the sale was made on the instant of the appointed time in a low voice, where a second mortgagee was prepared to bid for the benefit of himself and the debtor. Borth v. Proctor (1920) — Mo. —, 219 S. W. 72.

Purchases by creditor.

Inadequacy of price has been held material in sales to creditors—

—where there was oppression and unfairness, and the price was only 10 per cent of the value, Winbigler v. Sherman (1917) 175 Cal. 270, 165 Pac. 943;

—where there were circumstances of undue advantage, Martin v. Swoford (1881) 59 Miss. 328; Herring v. Sutton (1905) 86 Miss. 283, 38 So. 235 (a plain swindle);

—where there were elements of unfairness, and the price was grossly inadequate, Judge v. Booge (1871) 47 Mo. 544; —where there was not fair and reasonable notice, Clark v. Simmons (1890) 150 Mass. 357, 23 N. E. 108; Bon v. Graves (1913) 216 Mass. 440, 103 N. E. 1023 (purchased for 60 per cent);

—where the sale was at an unusual time, and for ten seventeenths of the value, Stoffel v. Schroeder (1876) 62 Mo. 147;

—where the sale was near dusk on a deserted beach, Long v. Richards (1878) 170 Mass. 120, 64 Am. St. Rep. 281, 48 N. E. 1083;

—where the sale was held in a severe storm, Chilton v. Brooks (1898) 69 Md. 584, 16 Atl. 273.

In Briggs v. Briggs (1883) 135 Mass. 306, the court showed a disposition to be exacting in the matter of notice upon a mortgagee who purchased, for $700, encumbered property having an equity of $1,150, and set the sales aside.

In Stewart v. Hamilton Bldg. & L. Asso. (1898) — Tenn. —, 47 S. W. 1106, a sale to the creditor for one third of the value, in the ignorance of the debtor, after advertisement in an obscure newspaper, was set aside as a fraud.

So, it has been held that the sale will be set aside if, owing to the manner thereof, the creditor buys at a grossly inadequate price, such as 30 per cent of the value. Lalor v. McCarthy (1878) 24 Minn. 417.

And the sale was set aside where the property was bought by the creditor for one seventh of its value, under circumstances not adapted to get the best price. Goode v. Comfort (1866) 39 Mo. 313.

In a case of great oppression, where the creditor purchased the land for a trifle, the court said: "While neither the publication of the notice of foreclosure sale at Minot nor the inadequacy of price at which the property was sold is, standing alone, sufficient to avoid the sale, we think all the facts, when considered together, clearly establish a want of good faith on the part of the Gjertsens in exercising such power of sale, and a total disregard of the rights of the mortgagor." Hedlin v. Lee (1911) 21 N. D. 495, 131 N. W. 390.

In setting aside a sale to the mortgagee for about one fourth of the value of the property, where other facts of unfairness appeared, the court said: "No sale will be set aside, in all other respects unexceptionable, for inadequacy of price, unless the sum reported by the trustee is so grossly inadequate as to indicate a want of reasonable judgment and discretion in the trustee. . . . We think the inadequacy of the price of the property in this case comes within the range of the above rule, and must be regarded, in connection with the other facts in the case, as a sufficient reason for affirming the order vacating the sale." Horsey v. Hough (1873) 38 Md. 130 (where the statute required report and ratification of the sale).

In Encking v. Simmons (1871) 23 Wis. 272, a purchase by the mortgagee for less than half the value, when the mortgagor was insane, was set aside as a fraud. And in James v. Chaney (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 679, the court, while basing its decision on another ground, inclined to the opinion that a sale to the creditor for $101, of property having an equity of over $1,000, when the debtor was insane, was properly set aside. But in Lundberg v. Davidson (1898) 72 Minn. 49, 42 L.R.A. 103, 74 N. W. 1018, where there was a right to redemption for a year after the sale, it was held that insanity of the mortgagor, with inadequacy of price, does not make cause for setting aside a sale, which was here to a subsequent lienor who had afterwards improved the property.

In Meyer v. Jefferson Ins. Co. (1878) 5 Mo. App. 245, the sale was set aside where the trustee was the secretary of the creditor, and, though knowing that it would pay $15,000, sold the property to it for $3,000. But in Million v. McRee (1880) 9 Mo. App. 344, where the trustee knew that the creditor would bid $15,000 for the property, it was held proper to sell it to her for $5,000.

Where creditor attacks sale.

In some of the cases the sale is attacked by the creditor.

Thus, where property worth $3,000 was fraudulently sold in the absence of the mortgagee, for less than $200, the sale was set aside on the mortgagee's suit. Hanson v. Neal (1908) 215 Mo. 256, 114 S. W. 1073.

So, a sale was set aside on the suit of one of the creditors, where he misunderstood the circumstances and the property was sold for about one fourteenth of the value. Orr v. McKee (1895) 184 Mo. 78, 34 S. W. 1087.

So, the sale was set aside where the creditor mistook the time of sale, and arrived a few minutes after the property had been sold for 3 or 4 per cent of its value, and asked a resale, which was refused. Middleton v. Baker (1914) 262 Mo. 398, 171 S. W. 328.

In Stacy v. Smith (1896) 9 S. D. 137, 68 N. W. 198, where there was a mistake of fact, the court said, in sustaining the creditor's suit to set aside the sale: "A court of equity, in the exercise of its equitable powers, will scrutinize with care sales made under powers of sale contained in the mortgage; and, where there is great inadequacy of consideration, it will be astute in extracting from the facts of the case sufficient to justify annulling the sale. . . . The inadequacy of the price bid, and for which the property was sold by Smith, is so great that no court of equity would permit the sale to stand. The fact that property of the value of $600 was sold for $10.60 clearly shows either mistake or fraud; and we apprehend no court of equity would refuse to relieve the party from such sale. In this case the evidence so clearly establishes a mistake on the part of the plaintiff's agents that we feel no hesitancy in holding that this fact, together with the inadequacy of consideration, fully justified the findings and judgment rendered in this case."

In Bullock v. Eldredge (1914) — R. L. —, 90 Atl. 737, the court declined the purchaser's demand for specific performance of a sale to him at an inadequate price, where there were circumstances of unfairness to the creditor.

VI. Miscellaneous.

Where a mortgagee sold for one half the value, without advertising or efforts to get more, the sale was set aside. Latch v. Furlong (1866) 12 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 303.

Where a debtor gave his creditor a deed as a mortgage, and the creditor sold the property to a third person, at private sale, the court said: "Durgan's position was that of a mortgagee with power to sell. To say that a mortgagee with power to sell, who has an encumbrance on the estate of less than one third its value—an encumbrance which five or six months' rent will discharge—has the right to sell the estate absolutely to the first man he meets who will pay the amount of encumbrance, without any attempt to get a larger price for it, would, in our opinion, be equivalent to saying fraud and oppression shall be protected and encouraged." Runkle v. Gaylord (1865) 1 Nev. 123.

It may be noted that in Warner v. Jacob (1882) L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 220, 18 Eng. Rul. Cas. 452, it was said: "The result seems to be that a mortgagee is, strictly speaking, not a trustee of the power of sale. It is a power given to him for his own benefit, to enable him the better to realize his debt. If he exercises it bona fide for that purpose, without corruption or collusion with the purchaser, the court will not interfere, even though the sale be very disadvantageous, unless, indeed, the price is so low as in itself to be evidence of fraud." Quoted in Haddington Island Quarry Co. v. Huson [1911] A. C. (Eng.) 722. B. B. B.

APPEAL by petitioners from an order of the Land Court for Suffolk County (Davis, J.) dismissing their petition for registration of title to a certain tract of land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robert Homans and Richard S. McCabe for appellants.

Messrs. Bolster, Vincent, & Wrightington for respondents.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record that Elizabeth P. Young, the mother of the petitioners, who died in 1910, testate, and her sister, Mary A. Rugg, owned the tract for which registration is sought in undivided halves, and that Mary A. Rugg, who died March 25, 1897, by her will dated September 23, 1870, which has been admitted to probate, devised and bequeathed all her estate to her husband for life, and "after the death of my husband my said estate is to go to my heirs at law." If nothing further were disclosed, the respondents concede that the petitioners are seised of the remainder. The testatrix and her husband, however, on November 27, 1871, legally adopted as their daughter a child who married John S. Whitaker, and had by him two children, the present respondents. The husband of the testatrix is dead, and the adopted daughter, Alice H. Whitaker, also having died in 1896, a widow and intestate, the question is whether the petitioners are seised of the whole estate, or only of an undivided half.

The petitioners contend that the children of Alice are not "heirs" within the meaning of the devise. The date of the death of the tenant for life does not appear. But this is unimportant. It is immaterial in view of the contention of the parties whether the remainder over was vested or contingent. The will speaks only at the death of the testatrix, and Pub. Stat. chap. 148, §§ 7-10, now by codification without any material change Rev. Laws, chap. 154, §§ 7-10, were then in force. By § 7: "As to the succession to property, a person adopted . . . shall take the same share of property which the adopting parent could have devised by will that he would have taken if born to such parent in lawful wedlock, and he shall stand in regard to the legal descendants, but to no other of the kindred of such parent, in the same position as if so born to him. In case the person adopted dies intestate, his property, acquired by himself or by gift or inheritance from his adopting parent, or from the kindred of such parent, shall be distributed, according to the provisions of chapters one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and thirty-five, among the persons who would have been his kindred if he had been born to his adopting parent in lawful wedlock.

This section is a re-enactment of Stat. 1876, chap. 213, §§ 8 and 9, the purpose of which "is to provide for cases where property comes to a man's children, not by inheritance, but under a settlement, trust deed, or will, and to establish a rule governing the rights of adopted children in such cases. There is no word which is exactly the equivalent of 'child,' so as to be interchangeable with it under all conditions. We think the intention was to provide that if, by a settlement, deed, or will, property is given by terms which embrace and include a child born in wedlock, and which, in their application to existing facts, have the same effect and mean the same thing as child or children, such as the terms 'issue,' 'descendant,' or 'heir at law,' the rules provided by this section shall apply in the construction of the instrument. Any other construction would give the statute a very narrow scope, and to a great extent defeat its purposes." Morton, Ch. J., in Wyeth v. Stone, 144 Mass. 441, 11 N. E. 729.

If we turn to Pub. Stat. chap. 125, § 1, now Rev. Laws, chap. 133, § 1, relating to the descent of real property, we find that land, tenements, or hereditaments, or any right therein shall descend, subject to his debts: "First. In equal shares to his children and to the issue of any deceased child by right of representation. . . ."

The testatrix was the adopting parent; the respondents are the lawful children and heirs of the adopted daughter: It is hardly conceivable, under the circumstances, the testatrix intended that if her adopted daughter survived, she should be disinherited, and the property pass to collateral relatives. The devise does not read to my "issue," or "heirs of my body," or "right heirs," but to "my lawful heirs." It is not what the testatrix might have said, but what she did say which governs. The word "heir" or "heirs" will be construed to mean a child or children, where such is the plain intention of the testator. Sewall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262, 278; Walcott v. Robinson, 214 Mass. 172, 174, 100 N. E. 1109, and cases collected. We cannot adopt the argument urged in the petitioner's behalf that, if the issue of a deceased illegitimate child could not inherit from the child's mother under Stat. 1828, chap. 139, the issue of a deceased adopted child cannot inherit under Pub. Stat. chap. 148, § 7. It was the purpose of the legislature to put an adopted child on the same footing as a child born in wedlock to the adopting parents, and the words "legal descendants," unless shorn of their ordinary meaning, include the legitimate offspring of an adopted child. Stearns v. Allen, 183 Mass. 404, 97 Am. St. Rep. 441, 67 N. E. 349; Delano v. Bruerton, 148 Mass. 619, 2 L.R.A. 698, 20 N. E. 308; Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 267, 37 Am. Rep. 321; Warren v. Prescott, 84

Me. 483, 17 L.R.A. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 370, 24 Atl. 948.

We are accordingly of opinion that by the words "my lawful heirs" she intended at her death to include her child by adoption, and under the statute, as we construe it, her children by right of representation take the estate to which their mother, if living, would have succeeded. Stearns v. Allen, 183 Mass. 404, 97 Am. St. Rep. 441, 67 N. E. 349; MacMaster v. Fobes, 226 Mass. 396, 399, 115 N. E. 487; Warren v. Prescott, 84 Me. 483, 17 L.R.A. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 370, 24 Atl. 948; Hartwell v. Tefft, 19 R. I. 644, 34 L.R.A. 500, 35 Atl. 882; Re Walworth, 85 Vt. 322, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 849, 82 Atl. 7, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1223. The cases of Wyeth v. Stone, supra, Blodgett v. Stowell, 189 Mass. 142, 75 N. E. 138, Brown v. Wright, 194 Mass. 540, 80 N. E. 612, Gammons v. Gammons, 212 Mass. 454, 99 N. E. 95, and Walcott v. Robinson, 214 Mass. 172, 100 N. E. 1109, where the status of children by adoption was under discussion, are contests between collateral kindred, and are plainly distinguishable from the case at bar, in which the testatrix is the adopting parent as well as the owner of the property devised. The decision of the judge of the Land Court, in which he very fully and clearly points out and follows the principles to which we have adverted, shows no error of law, and the order dismissing the petition should be affirmed.

So ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Right of children of an adopted child to take the share which the parent would have taken under a will if he had survived the testator.

Remarkably few cases seem to have passed upon the question here presented, but these cases, like those which pass upon the question whether or not general terms in a will include an adopted child, generally turn upon the intent of the testator as determined in view of the existing statutes.

The reported case (YOUNG v. STEARNS, ante, 1010) is illustrative of those cases which apply the ultimate test of intention, as determined under the statutes relating to adoption and succession to property. In this case which arose in Massachusetts it was held that in view of the fact that the Statute of Descent and Distribution provided that property should descend "in equal shares to his children and to the issue of any deceased child by right of representation," and that the Adoption Statute provided that a person adopted "shall take the same share of property which the adopting parent could have devised by will that he would have taken if born to such parent in lawful wedlock," etc., a testatrix, by bequeathing her estate over to her "heirs at law," intended at her death to include a daughter by adoption so that under the statutes the children of the adopted daughter who predeceased the testatrix were entitled to take by right of representation the estate to which their mother, if she had been living at the death of the testatrix, would have succeeded.

A similar conclusion was reached in the recent Missouri case of Williams v. Weber (1917) 271 Mo. 150, 195 S. W. 1009. Here the statute provided that the property of an intestate shall descend, "first, to his children or their descendants," which by interpretation was declared to include an adopted as well as a natural child, and it was held that the children of an adopted child who died before her adopting parents could take the same estate which their mother would have taken, had she outlived her adopting parents, by inheritance from her adopting mother, to whom the husband had willed certain personal property absolutely. In so holding, the court, among other things, said: "This question is determinable by a consideration of the first clause of the Statute of Descents, viz., 'first, to his children or their descendants' (Rev. Stat. 1909, § 332), which has been interpreted in Bernero v. Goodwin (1916) 267 Mo. 434, 184 S. W. 74, to include, under the term 'to his children' in the first subdivision thereof, an adopted child as well as a natural child. It necessarily follows from that ruling that the alternative term of said statute, viz., 'or their descendants,' likewise embraces the children of an adopted, as well as a natural, child. Hence, in case of the death of an adopted child prior to the death of the adopting parent, such child stands in the same relation of heirship to the estate possessed by the adopting parent at the time of his or her death that a natural and lawfully born child would occupy under similar circumstances. Applying this principle to the facts in the instant case, the result is that the Cline children, whose mother was lawfully adopted both by Thomas F. Ackerman and his wife Susan, are entitled to inherit the undisposed estate of either of her adopting parents at the time of their respective deaths, just as if they were natural and lawful grandchildren of the adopting parents of their mother. There was no residuary clause in the will of Thomas F. Ackerman; neither did his wife, Susan Ackerman, make any testament. It follows that the personal estate which was devised absolutely to his wife under the will of Thomas F. Ackerman descended, upon the death of his wife, to the Cline children as the lawful 'descendants' of Mary Cline, the adopted daughter of the deceased wife."

On the other hand, in Clarke v. Rathbone (1915) 221 Mass. 574, 109 N. E. 651, where a testator adopted a grandchild and bequeathed the remainder of a trust fund to his grandchildren, but in his will expressly provided that it was not his intention to have the adopted grandchild share as one of his "children," but that he should take only the share of a grandchild, and the adopted grandchild died before the termination of the trust, leaving a son, it was held that upon the subsequent distribution of the remainder the great-grandchild, claiming to be a grandchild by adoption of his father by testator, should be excluded, since the intent of the testator was that for the purpose of distribution by the will the adoption should be disregarded.

But the intention of the testator is not always controlling. This is illustrated by Phillips Estate (1901) 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 103, where, in determining the rights of the children of an adopted daughter of the testator, the court held that such children could not take any benefit from the devise to their deceased mother, even though it be assumed that the testator did not suppose that the gift to his adopted daughter would lapse by reason of her death in his lifetime. This decision was upon the theory that the Statute of 1833, which provided that no devise or legacy in favor of a child or other lineal descendant of a testator should be deemed or held to lapse by reason of the decease of such devisee or legatee in the lifetime of the testator, if such devisee or legatee "shall leave issue surviving the testator," did not contemplate a devise or legacy in favor of an adopted child, because at the time of its enactment it was not in the power of an individual to adopt the child of another as his own, that being first authorized by the Act of 1855; that there was no later act expressly extending the provisions of the Act of 1833 in favor of adopted children; and that the Act of 1837, which gives an adopted child all the rights of a child and heir of the adopting parent, does not make an adopted child a child within the intent and meaning of the Act of 1833. The court argued as follows: "Assuming that Maggie Morgan was the lawfully adopted child of the testator, it may be surmised that he did not suppose that the gift to her would lapse by reason of her death in his lifetime; for he made no provision for disposition of the property in case of her death, and where it is possible to construe a will so as to avoid intestacy as to any part of the estate, the courts favor that construction. But it is to be borne in mind, as pointed out in the opinion of the court below, that the testator's supposition that the legacy and the devise to her would not lapse would not prevent them from lapsing, if the 12th section of the Act of 1833, does not apply. . . . Referring again to the Act of 1855, as amended by the Act of 1877, which must control the decision of the present question, What right of Maggie Morgan is involved in this case? For whilst . . . a child adopted under that act becomes a child and heir of the person adopting him, so far as he can be made such by legislative enactment, yet . . . the act does not attempt the impossibility of making him a child in fact. It gives him the rights of a child, and in any litigation in which he is concerned he may assert them successfully. It does not undertake to define or determine what the rights of his children shall be. As we have already suggested, the 12th section of the Act of 1833, at the time of its enactment, only contemplated devises and legacies to children by birth, and every word of subsequent acts relative to the adoption of children can be given full effect without implying any amendment of that section or an abrogation of the common-law rule as to the lapsing of legacies. Until the death of the testator, Maggie Morgan could have no right under his will; and as she died before him, it is impossible to conclude that a right to the legacy and the devise was transmitted to her issue." v.

ESTATE OF ASA G. DUTTON.

(— Vt. —, 108 Atl. 515.)

Husband and wife — entireties — personal property.

1. A man and wife may hold personal property by entireties.
[See note on this question beginning on page 1017.]

Appeal — agreed facts — construction.

2. Agreed facts that property was paid for by the proceeds of real estate owned in entirety by a man and wife, "and by funds from the sale of personal property also owned by them," mean that the personal property was owned by them by entireties.

Executors and administrators — right to property held by entireties.

3. No part of store property purchased by a man and wife with funds derived from property held by entire-ties passes to his administrator where he predeceases her.

Husband and wife — partnership — effect on property held by entireties.

4. The entering by a man and his wife into a partnership business, with funds held by entireties, does not change the character of the estate.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a ruling of the Washington County Court (Waterman, J.) affirming an order of the Probate Court allowing the account of the administrator of the estate of Asa G. Dutton, deceased.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. Ward Carver and Walter A. Dutton for plaintiff.

Mr. Erwin M. Harvey, for defendant:

The whole conduct of the business, both as between Mr. and Mrs. Dutton and in their relation to the public, was a joint or partnership undertaking.

Watson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The store property, both real and personal, was purchased by Asa G. Dutton and Mary J. Dutton, his wife, and paid for (in language of the agreed facts) "by funds which were the proceeds of real estate owned in entirety by Asa G. Dutton and Mary J. Dutton, and by funds from the sale of personal property also owned by them." It will be observed that the character of the ownership of the latter funds is not more definitely nor otherwise stated. The word "also" is significant in this respect, relating back, as it does, to the character of the ownership of the real estate from the sale of which the funds previously mentioned were derived; and it has the meaning of "in like manner." To give it the force of indicating additional ownership makes the word redundant, for by the words "owned by them," immediately following, this is expressly stated. We think the agreed facts in this respect are to be understood as meaning the same as though they read, "and by funds from the sale of personal property in like manner owned by them." See Webster's New Int. Dict.

Appeal—agreed facts—construction.

The marital rights of the husband at common law, in the personal property acquired by his wife during coverture, are not inconsistent with the theory that estates by entirety may exist in personality; for the wife may hold such property by virtue of a gift or bequest to her sole and separate use; or she may so hold it by reason of a surrender and waiver by the husband of his marital rights therein; or, if her property consists of choses in action, the husband may not reduce it to possession within his lifetime. Barron v. Barron, 24 Vt. 375; Albee v. Cole, 39 Vt. 319; Child v. Pearl, 43 Vt. 224; Bent v. Bent, 44 Vt. 555. In addition to the foregoing, by Acts of 1884, No. 140, § 2, all personal property and rights of action acquired by a woman before coverture, or during coverture, except by her personal industry or by gift from her husband, shall be held to her sole and separate use, and neither a wife's separate property nor the rents, issues, income, and products of the same shall be subject to his disposal or liable for his debts. By Acts of 1888, No. 84, the foregoing section was amended by striking out the words, "by her personal industry or," thereby making the law as it hitherto has been and now is in § 3524 of the General Laws 1917.

That estates in entirety may exist in personal property growing out of real estate so owned was held in Citizens' Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Jenkins,

Husband and wife—entireties—personal property.

91 Vt. 13, 99 Atl. 250. And no good reason is apparent why such an estate may not exist in other personal property. We think it can. Although there is some difference in judicial opinion on the question in other jurisdictions, we think the better view is as here stated, and in support of it cite the following cases: Phelps v. Simons, 159 Mass. 415, 38 Am. St. Rep. 430, 34 N. E. 657; Boland v. McKowen, 189 Mass. 563, 109 Am. St. Rep. 663, 76 N. E. 206; Bramberry's Appeal, 156 Pa. 628, 22 L.R.A. 594, 36 Am. St. Rep. 64, 27 Atl. 405; Parry's Estate, 188 Pa. 33, 41 Atl. 448, 49 L.R.A. 444, 68 Am. St. Rep. 847; Johnston v. Johnston, 173 Mo. 91, 61 L.R.A. 166, 96 Am. St. Rep. 486, 73 S. W. 202; also 13 R. C. L. 1105, § 128.

It has been held by this court that the statute exempting from attachment or levy of execution for the sole debts of the husband, during coverture, the rents, issues, and profits of the real estate of a married woman, and the interest of her husband in her right in any real estate which belonged to her before marriage, or which she acquires by gift, grant, devise, or inheritance, during coverture, applies to estates by entirety, the court saying that such estate is the real estate of a married woman, although her husband is joined with her in the title; that it is the real estate of each; and that, under a holding that the statute applies only to real estate owned by the wife separately, the interest of the husband in his wife's right in her real estate could be taken upon the sole debt of the husband, which would annul the statute. Corinth v. Emery, 63 Vt. 505, 25 Am. St. Rep. 780, 22 Atl. 618; Laird v. Perry, 74 Vt. 454, 59 L.R.A. 340, 52 Atl. 1040. The same course of reasoning is equally forcible when applied to § 3524 of the statute relating to personal property and rights of action of a married woman, and we hold that estates by entirety are within the provisions of that section.

It is urged that it is still within the power of the wife to give to her husband the same rights to her personality that he took at common law, and that this is just what she does when she turns such property over to him to be used in carrying on a general mercantile business, with unlimited power to commingle her property with his and the right to dispose of the same at will. Whatever force this argument might have when appropriate to the circumstances of the case in hand, it has none here where the husband and his wife were engaged in carrying on the business together.

The fact that, with funds owned and held by the husband and wife as tenants by entirety, they engaged in mercantile business ostensibly as partners, did not change the character of the estate. In law, as between themselves, the business was carried on by them as such tenants, and the property purchased for that purpose, including goods as needed, and the proceeds from the sales were owned and held in the same manner; and on the death of the husband the wife took the whole estate by right of sur-vivorship. Laird v. Perry, supra; Citizens' Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Jenkins, 91 Vt. 13, 99 Atl. 250.

It follows that since none of such property belonged to deceased husband's estate, none could by right enter into the administrator's account.

Other questions were presented in argument, but it is unnecessary to consider them.

Decree affirmed. To be certified to the Probate Court.

ANNOTATION.

Estates by entirety in personal property.

I. Scope, 1017.

II. Introduction, 1018.

III. Estate by entirety may exist in personal property, 1018.

IV. Rule that estate by entirety cannot exist in personal property, 1022.

I. Scope.

The present annotation is mainly confined to cases wherein there was a gift or bequest by a third person to a husband and wife, or there was a mutual investment by them in personal property title to which was taken in their joint names, or real estate held by them as tenants by the entirety was sold and choses in action taken back by them. With respect to cases where either the husband or wife turns individual property into personal property the title to which is taken in the names of both, it has been stated (Re Albrecht (1892) 186 N. Y. 91, 18 L.R.A. 329, 32 Am. St. Rep. 700, 32 N. E. 632) that "there are many authorities holding that where the husband purchases a security, or makes a deposit, or subscribes for stock in the joint name of himself and wife, and pays therefor with his own funds, upon his death the entire security belongs to the wife, if she survives him," but that "the decision in all these cases is put upon the ground that it is apparent from the character of the transaction that the husband intended to give the property to his wife in the event of her survivorship, and hence the transfer possesses all the essential qualities of a gift causa mortis which he may revoke in his lifetime, and which does not take effect until his death, if not previously recalled." Decisions of this kind, which are upon the ground that there was a gift, do not expressly discuss the question from the viewpoint, and evidently have no real bearing on the question, of a tenancy by the entirety in such personal property, and consequently are not treated in this annotation. Illustrations of the class of cases thus excluded are afforded by Draper v. Jackson (1820) 16 Mass. 480; State Bank v. Johnson (1908) 151 Mich. 538, 115 N. W. 464; Craig v. Craig (1848) 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 76; Borst v. Spelman (1850) 4 N. Y. 284; Sanford v. Sanford (1871) 45 N. Y. 723, on subsequent appeal in (1874) 58 N. Y. 69; Fowler v. Butterly (1879) 78 N. Y. 68, 34 Am. Rep. 507; Platt v. Grubb (1886) 41 Hun (N. Y.) 447; McElroy v. Albany Sav. Bank (1896) 8 App. Div. 46, 40 N. Y. Supp. 422; Wilcox v. Murtha (1899) 41 App. Div. 408, 58 N. Y. Supp. 783; West v. McCullough (1908) 123 App. Div. 846, 108 N. Y. Supp. 493, affirmed without opinion in (1909) 194 N. Y. 518, 87 N. E. 1130; Wegmann v. Kress (1912) 141 N. Y. Rep. 50; and Smith v. Haire (1915) 133 Tenn. 848, 181 S. W. 161, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 529. However, a few cases involving similar facts have not taken this position, and consequently have been included herein.

II. Introduction.

Strictly speaking, it would seem that a tenancy by the entireties in personal property could not exist at common law, for the reason that under its rules all personal property of the wife was regarded as reduced or reducible to the possession of the husband, which would prevent the existence of such an estate in a true sense. However, under the modern statutes which allow her to retain possession of and control over her separate property, there would seem to be, as a general rule, no valid reason why such a tenancy may not exist as regards personal property. As subsequently shown, the decided weight of authority is to the effect that such statutes merely destroy the husband's absolute right to possession of, or to reduce to possession, the wife's personal property, without destroying or affecting estates by the entireties or the common-law incidents thereof; in other words, such statutes merely permit the wife to hold property to the exclusion of the common-law marital rights of the husband therein.

In fact, it has been held that, neither at common law nor where the statutes permit a married woman to hold her separate property as if sole, are the marital rights of the husband in personal property acquired by the wife during coverture necessarily inconsistent with the theory that estates by entirety may exist in personal property. See the reported case (GEORGE v. DUTTON, ante, 1014).

Among text-writers there seems to be a wide difference of opinion as to whether or not estates by entirety may exist in personal property. For instance, Bishop, in § 211 of his Law of Married Women, in speaking of estates by the entirety, says "that nothing of this sort is known in respect of personal property," and on the other hand, Freeman in § 68 of his work on Cotenancy & Partition, says that "the reports, English and American, new and old, abound in cases recognizing tenancy by entirety in all kinds of personal property."

III. Estate by entirety may exist in personal property.

As stated in the next preceding subdivision of this annotation, the decided weight of authority is to the effect that estates by the entirety may exist in personalty as well as in realty.

This rule has been applied to many forms of personal property. For example, it has been so held in a number of cases where the personal property in question did not arise out of or represent real property held by the estate. Such a holding has been made with respect to a bank deposit standing in the joint names of a husband and his wife (Brewer v. Bowersox (1901) 92 Md. 567, 48 Atl. 1060; Baker v. Baker (1914) 123 Md. 82, 90 Atl. 776; Craig v. Bradley (1910) 153 Mo. App. 586, 184 S. W. 1081; Sloan's Es-

Jonet* (1917) 165 Wis. 554, 162 N. W. 664); a certificate of bank stock issued to a husband and wife, "and to the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor" (Phelps v. Simons (1893) 159 Mass. 415, 38 Am. St. Rep. 430, 34 N. E. 657); a promissory note (Shields v. Stillman (1871) 48 Mo. 86; Re Greenwood (1919) 201 Mo. App. 39, 208 S. W. 685); a note and mortgage given for land, and as to which both husband and wife furnished a part of the consideration (Fiedler v. Howard (1898) 99 Wis. 388, 67 Am. St. Rep. 865, 75 N. W. 163); an obligation executed to a husband and wife jointly in payment for land belonging to the wife (McMillan v. Mason (1868) 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 263, 98 Am. Dec. 401); a judgment obtained in an action brought by a husband and wife (Coppin v. — (1728) 2 P. Wms. 496, 24 Eng. Reprint, 832); a judgment assigned to husband and wife jointly (Homburger v. Whitely (1892) 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 10); a mortgage assigned to husband and wife jointly (Young's Estate (1894) 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 296); a lease of property (Rezabek v. Rezabek (1917) 196 Mo. Ward* (1880) L. R. 14 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 506, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 409, 42 L. T. N. S. 523, 28 Week. Rep. 943, holding that "the interest which the husband and wife take is that curious kind of joint tenancy which is called a tenancy by entirety;" and see Cowper v. Scott (1731) 3 P. Wms. 119, 24 Eng. Reprint, 993; a chose in action the nature of which is not reported (Norton v. Glover, Noy, 149; 74 Eng. Reprint, 1110); a saloon business conducted by a husband and wife (Flaherty v. Columbus (1914) 41 App. D. C. 525); and even to a letter of credit purchased by a husband with his own money, and made payable to himself and wife with the intent of being used by them to travel (Parry's Estate (1898) 188 Pa. 33, 49 L.R.A. 444, 68 Am. St. Rep. 847, 41 Atl. 448). In fact, in the reported case (GEORGE v. DUTTON, ante, 1014), it was expressly held that estates by entirety may exist in personal property other than personal property growing out of real estate so owned. And it has been held that an estate by entirety may exist in personal property other than that growing out of real estate so held, although such estates, with their incidents, are regarded as continuing in the jurisdiction, as they existed at the common law, unaffected by a Married Women's Statute. Brewer v. Bowersox (1901) 92 Md. 567, 48 Atl. 1060; Phelps v. Simons (1893) 159 Mass. 415, 38 Am. St. Rep. 430, 34 N. E. 657; Craig v. Bradley (1910) 153 Mo. App. 586, 134 S. W. 1081; Parry's Estate (1898) 188 Pa. 33, 49 L.R.A. 444, 68 Am. St. Rep. 847, 41 Atl. 448, supra; Jupp v. Buckwell (1888) L. R. 39 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 148, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 774, 59 L. T. N. S. 129, 36 Week. Rep. 712). And see West v. Aberdeen & R. F. R. Co. (1906) 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477, 6 Ann. Cas. 360.

And the rule that there may be an estate by the entirety in personal property has been applied to personality derived from real estate held in entirety, even though the statutes in regard to the separate property and separate rights of married women are regarded as not affecting the common law in regard to estates by entirety. It has been so held with respect to a note given for land held by entirety (Allen v. Tate (1881) 58 Miss. 585; Craig v. Bradley (1910) 153 Mo. App. 586, 134 S. W. 1081); a note secured by a purchase-money mortgage taken jointly by a man and wife upon the sale of real estate held by the entirety (Boland v. McKowen (1905) 189 Mass. 563, 109 Am. St. Rep. 663, 76 N. E. 206); and to a purchase-money bond and mortgage taken under similar circumstances (Bramberry's Estate (1893) 156 Pa. 628, 22 L.R.A. 594, 36 Am. St. Rep. 64, 27 Atl. 405); and a purchase-money mortgage and the proceeds thereof (Leet v. Miller (1896) 6 Pa. Dist. R. 725). At least, this has been held to be the rule in equity in a jurisdiction where the Married Woman's Law was regarded as entitling a wife to hold property, to the exclusion of the common-law marital rights of her husband therein. Citizens' Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Jenkins (1916) 91 Vt. 13, 99 Atl. 250. In this case, in holding that timber cut from an estate by entirety was personal property and itself constituted an estate by entirety, the court said: "Estates by entirety may exist in personal property growing out of real estate, as well as in real estate strictly, and the cutting of the timber by mutual consent effected, in equity, only a transmutation of property from real to personal, but did not change the character of the estate in the timber cut." In Allen v. Tate (1881) 58 Miss. 585, the court, after referring to a number of authorities which established the rule that the surviving wife is entitled, as against the representative of the husband, to paper payable to the husband and wife, where it was given for property or money of the husband alone, argued as follows: "A fortiori would that rule apply where, as in this case, the note was given for land held by entirety, and made payable to the husband and wife. The presumption is irresistible that in selling the land and taking notes for the purchase money, payable to themselves, they intended the notes to represent the land, and, in case of the death of one of them, to survive to the other, as the land would have done in like case."

In a considerable number of jurisdictions in which it has been held that estates by the entirety exist in personal property, it has also been held that such estates either were not abolished by the respective Married Woman's Acts (to this effect are Flaherty v. Columbus (1914) 41 App. D. C. 525; and West v. Aberdeen & R. F. R. Co. (1906) 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477, 6 Ann. Cas. 360), or that such statutes do not prevent the holding of personal property by the entireties (Brewer v. Bowersox (1901) 92 Md. 567, 48 Atl. 1060; Phelps v. Simons (1893) 159 Mass. 415, 38 Am. St. Rep. 430, 34 N. E. 657; Boland v. McKowen (1905) 189 Mass. 563, 109 Am. St. Rep. 663, 76 N. E. 206; Craig v. Bradley (1910) 153 Mo. App. 586, 134 S. W. 1081; Bramberry's Estate (1893) 156 Pa. 628, 22 L.R.A. 594, 36 Am. St. Rep. 64, 27 Atl. 405; Leet v. Miller (1896) 6 Pa. Dist. R. 725; GEORGE v. DUTTON (reported herewith) ante, 1014; Jupp v. Buckwell (1888) L. R. 39 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 148, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 774, 59 L. T. N. S. 129, 36 Week. Rep. 712). In Bramberry's Estate (Pa.) supra, the court said: "It has been contended, and some jurisdictions held, that the legislation which secures to the wife the enjoyment of her separate estate is destructive of the legal unity of husband and wife on which tenancies by entireties depend. But the better view is that such tenancies are not destroyed or impaired by it." It was also stated that such acts are intended to protect the property of the wife from the dominion or control of the husband, but not to change the nature of her estate or to destroy the legal unity of person which characterizes the relation of husband and wife to each other. Statements to the same effect are found in Leet v. Miller (Pa.) supra. And in Jupp v. Buckwell (Eng.) supra, in discussing the effect of the English Married Women's Property Act of 1882 upon estates by entirety, Kay, J., among other things, said that the following statement: "It is said that it destroys the doctrine of the common law by which there was what has been called a unity of person between husband and wife. Again, I answer, I do not see why. It confers in certain specified cases new powers upon the wife, and in others new powers upon the husband, and gives them in certain specified cases new remedies against one another. But I see no reason for supposing that the act does anything more than it professes to do, or either abrogates or infringes upon any existing principles or rules of law in cases to which its provisions do not apply,"—expressed perfectly his opinion; and continued as follows: "The capacity of a married woman to take property is not altered as between her and the grantor. That was always complete. Whatever property, real or personal, was devised, bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned to a married woman, as between her and the grantor, passed absolutely. The act only enlarges her capacity to take such property 'as her separate property.' That is, as I read it, as between her and the grantor she takes the same as before, but as between her and her husband what she takes is 'her separate property.' . . . In my opinion, as I have said, the capacity of a married woman to take property is only altered between herself and her husband. The true view seems to me to be that the wife had an unlimited capacity before the act to acquire property, but that upon its acquisition the marital right of the husband gave him certain interests in it which the act has interfered with. This seems to me to be the extent to which her status, if that be the right word, is intended to be altered. But for collateral purposes, that is, for any purpose in respect of property, except altering her right to property as between herself and her husband, I do not find in the act any intimation of an intention to change her legal position. If that had been the intention, I should have expected to find in the act an express provision to the effect, for example, that in all questions relating to property the husband and wife should be considered, not only as between themselves, but also as between them and third persons, two separate individuals, and that the old law of unity of person should be abolished."

Another view has been advanced in Missouri, where the rule is that estates by the entirety may be created in personal property as well as realty, it having been declared that the statutes placing the husband and wife on the same footing as regards the right to have and hold personal property in effect abolish the legal unity which gave rise to estates by the entirety, without abolishing the estate itself, and that now "a husband and wife must be held to have the same right to hold a joint estate, an estate by the entirety, with the incident of survivorship, that any other persons have." Johnston v. Johnston (1902) 173 Mo. 99, 61 L.R.A. 166, 96 Am. St. Rep. 486, 73 S. W. 202.

IV. Rule that estate by entirety cannot exist in personal property.

In seeming conflict with many of the decisions treated in the preceding subdivision, are a few cases which maintain that there can be no estate by the entirety in personal property. Re Berry (1917) 247 Fed. 700 (holding such to be the law of Michigan); Abshire v. State (1876) 53 Ind. 64; Fogleman v. Shively (1891) 4 Ind. App. 197, 51 Am. St. Rep. 213, 30 N. E. 909; Wait v. Bovee (1877) 35 Mich. 425; Morrill v. Morrill (1904) 138 Mich. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 306, 101 N. W. 209, 4 Ann. Cas. 1100; Polk v. Allen (1854) 19 Mo. 467 (but see other Missouri cases set out supra, some of which state that the Polk Case is no longer the law of the state); Re Albrecht (1892) 136 N. Y. 91, 18 L.R.A. 329, 32 Am. St. Rep. 700, 32 N. E. 632, reversing (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 193, 10 N. Y. Supp. 388, which affirmed (1888) 1 Connolly, 12, 4 N. Y. Supp. 462; Re McKelway (1917) 221 N. Y. 15, L.R.A. 1917E, 1143, 116 N. E. 848, reversing (1917) 176 App. Div. 929, 162 N. Y. Supp. 1129, which affirmed (1916) 95 Misc. 473, 160 N. Y. Supp. 788; Re Baum (1907) 121 App. Div. 496, 106 N. Y. Supp. 113, appeal dismissed in (1908) 190 N. Y. 564, 83 N. E. 1122; Re Kaupper (1910) 141 App. Div. 54, 125 N. Y. Supp. 878.

In Re Albrecht (N. Y.) supra, the court, referring to estates by the entirety, said: "That relation can only exist where there is a conveyance of a vested interest in or title to real property." And in Re Baum (1907) 121 App. Div. 496, 106 N. Y. Supp. 113, it was again said that "the law of ownership or tenancy by the entirety does not apply to personal property."

At common law, this was upon the theory that the entire personal estate of the parties to a marriage was vested in the husband. See Polk v. Allen (1854) 19 Mo. 467.

And under the statutes which enlarge a married woman's rights so as to make her sole with respect to her property rights, it has been declared that such legislation places the parties to a marriage contract upon the same footing, with respect to the acquisition and control of their individual properties, as if the conjugal relation did not exist, and therefore that "the rights of husband and wife in the personal property of each other, or in that which may be transferred to them jointly, rest upon different grounds than those which support a tenancy by the entirety." Re Albrecht (1892) 136 N. Y. 91, 18 L.R.A. 329, 32 Am. St. Rep. 700, 32 N. E. 632.

The view that an estate by the entirety cannot exist in personal property has been held to apply not only where the wife's common-law disabilities and the husband's control over her whole property existed (Ashire v. State (1876) 53 Ind. 64; Morrill v. Morrill (1904) 138 Mich. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 306, 101 N. W. 209, 4 Ann. Cas. 1100; Polk v. Allen (Mo.) supra), and where the personal property in question either grew out of or represented real property held by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety (Morrill v. Morrill (1904) 138 Mich. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 306, 101 N. W. 209, 4 Ann. Cas. 1100, supra, which involved crops grown on land held by entirety), or was acquired by gift or bequest to the husband and wife (Polk v. Allen (Mo.) supra); but also under some of the more modern statutes which allow a married woman to hold separate property, or which entirely free her from all restrictions (Fogleman v. Shively (1891) 4 Ind. App. 197, 51 Am. St. Rep. 213, 30 N. E. 909), where cash was received by an agent in payment for real estate held by the entireties, upon a sale made by him at the voluntary request of the tenants; Wait v. Bovee (1877) 35 Mich. 425, where separate moneys were pooled and securities were bought in the joint names of the husband and wife; Morrill v. Morrill (Mich.) supra, where crops were grown on land held by entireties; Re Albrecht (1892) 136 N. Y. 91, 18 L.R.A. 329, 32 Am. St. Rep. 700, 32 N. E. 632, reversing (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 198, 10 N. Y. Supp. 338, which affirmed (1888) 1 Connoly, 12, 4 N. Y. Supp. 462, where a husband and wife each furnished half of a loan and took as security therefor a bond and mortgage payable to them jointly; Re Baum (1907) 121 App. Div. 496, 106 N. Y. Supp. 113, where real estate held by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety was sold, and a purchase-money bond and mortgage were made payable to both of them). In Re Baum (N. Y.) supra, the court said that the fact that the land was owned by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety did not make a different case, and that "when it was sold such tenancy was ended."

In fact it has been declared (Wait v. Bovee (Mich.) supra) that statutes enabling a married woman to hold separate property as though she were sole are repugnant to a blending, and inconsistent with the common-law doctrine of estates by the entireties. The court said: "The bare fact that the securities were taken in the joint names could no more change the holding into one by entirety than it would if the parties had not been married. Indeed the tenure was just what it would have been if the parties had been unmarried. Her right was separate and distinguishable up to her husband's death, and under the impress of the statute it continued so, and his right was therefore necessarily separate and distinguishable from hers, and so continued." But that, under the Michigan statutes in force in 1904, estates by entirety remained as at common law, see Morrill v. Morrill (Mich.) supra.

And of course, in jurisdictions where estates by entireties, as known at the common law, have never been recognized, there can be no such estate in personal property. For an illustrative case, see Semper v. Coates (1904) 98 Minn. 76, 100 N. W. 662. G. J. C.

CADILLAC MOTOR CAR COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit — November 12, 1919.

(261 Fed. 878.)

Appeal — ruling on first appeal — law of case.

1. A court will not, on second appeal, follow a ruling on the first appeal which is an error, resulting in injustice and at the same time laying down a principle of law for future guidance which is unsound and contrary to the interests of society.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1033.]

Pleading — theory of case — judgment must follow complaint.

2. A complaint seeking damages for negligence in the construction of an automobile will not sustain a judgment for fraudulent concealment of defects.

[See 15 R. C. L. 604.]

Negligence — duty of manufacturer of automobile to consumer.

3. A manufacturer of an automobile owes to the purchaser from a middleman the duty of exercising care in inspecting parts bought for use in constructing the car, failure to perform which will render him liable for the injury thereby inflicted upon the purchaser.

[See 24 R. C. L. 512-519.]

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York (Ray, District Judge) to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Ward, Rogers, and Manton, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Homer J. Borst, Andrew J. Nellis, and Daisy L. Snook for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. William Van Dyke and William L. Carpenter, for defendant in error:

The "law of the case" applies, on second writ of error, to the same case with the same facts from the very record used on appeal on the first writ.
